PROCEEDINGS

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FOURTH CONGRESS, HELD IN THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 7, 1795.

MONDAY, December 7, 1795.

The following Senators appeared, and took their seats:

JOHN LANGDON and SAMUEL LIVERMORE, from New Hampshire;

CALEB STRONG and GEORGE CABOT, from Massachusetts;

THEODORE FOSTER, from Rhode Island;

OLIVER ELLSWORTH and JONATHAN TRUMBULL, from Connecticut;

MOSES ROBINSON, from Vermont;

RUFUS KING, from New York;

JAMES ROSS and WILLIAM BINGHAM, from Pennsylvania;

HENRY LATIMER, from Delaware;

HENRY TAZEWELL and STEPHENS T. MASON, from Virginia;

ALEXANDER MARTIN and TIMOTHY BLOODWORTH, from North Carolina;

PIERCE BUTLER and JACOB READ, from South Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a PRESIDENT pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and HENRY TAZEWELL was duly elected.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and acquaint him that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, they have elected HENRY TAZEWELL, President pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business; and that, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, they have elected HENRY TAZEWELL President pro tempore.

Ordered, That MESSRS. READ and CABOT be a joint committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as the House of Representatives may appoint on their part to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House is assembled; that they have elected JONATHAN DAYTON their Speaker; and that they have concurred in the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and acquaint him that the two Houses of Congress are assembled, and are ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to lay before them.

Mr. READ from the joint committee appointed for that purpose, reported that they had waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and had notified him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress were assembled: and the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES acquainted the committee that he would meet the two Houses in the Representatives' chamber at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, December 8.

HUMPHREY MARSHALL, from the State of Kentucky, attended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House are now ready to meet the Senate in the Chamber of that House, to receive such communications as the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES shall be pleased to make to them.

Whereupon, the Senate repaired to the Chamber of the House of Representatives for the purpose above expressed.

The Senate then returned to their own Chamber, and a copy of the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress was read, as follows:

*Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I trust I do not deceive myself while I indulge the persuasion that I have never met you at any period, when, more than at the present, the situation of our public affairs has afforded just cause for mutual congratulation, and for inviting you to join with me in profound gratitude to the Author of all Good for the numerous and extraordinary blessings we enjoy.

The termination of the long, expensive, and distressing war in which we have been engaged with certain Indians Northwest of the Ohio, is placed in the option of the United States, by a Treaty which the Commander of our Army has concluded, provisionally, with the hostile tribes in that region.

In the adjustment of the terms, the satisfaction of the Indians was deemed an object worthy no less of the policy than of the liberality of the United States, as the necessary basis of durable tranquility. The object, it is believed, has been fully attained. The articles agreed upon will immediately be laid before the Senate, for their consideration.

The Creek and Cherokee Indians, who alone, of the Southern tribes, had annoyed our frontiers, have lately confirmed their pre existing treaties with us, and were giving evidence of a sincere disposition to carry them into effect, by the surrender of the prisoners and property they had taken; but we have to lament that the fair prospect in this quarter has been once more clouded by wanton murders, which some citizens of Georgia are represented to have recently perpetrated on hunting parties of the Creeks which have again subjected that frontier to disquietude and danger; which will be productive of further expense, and may occasion more effusion of blood. Measures are pursuing to prevent or mitigate the usual consequences of such outrages, and with the hope of their succeeding, at least, to avert general hostility.

A Letter from the Emperor of Morocco announces to me his recognition of our Treaty made with his father the late Emperor, and, consequently the continuance of peace with that Power. With peculiar satisfaction I add, that information has been received from an agent deputed on our part to Algiers, importing that the terms of the Treaty with the Dey and Regency of that country had been adjusted in such a manner as to authorize the expectation of a speedy peace, and the restoration of our unfortunate fellow-citizens from a grievous captivity.

The latest advices from our Envoy at the Court of Madrid, give, moreover, the pleasing information that he had received assurances of a speedy and satisfactory conclusion of his negotiation. While the event, depending upon unadjusted particulars, cannot be regarded as ascertained, it is agreeable to cherish the expectation of an issue which, securing, amicably, very essential interests of the United States, will, at the same time, lay the foundation of lasting harmony with a Power, whose friendship we have uniformly and sincerely desired to cultivate.

Though not before officially disclosed to the House of Representatives, you, gentlemen, are all apprised that a Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, has been negotiated with Great Britain; and that the Senate have advised and consented to its ratification, upon a condition which excepts part of one article. Agreeably thereto, and to the best judgment I was able to form of the public interest, after full and mature deliberation, I have added my sanction. The result, on the part of His Britannic Majesty, is unknown. When received, the subject will, without delay, be placed before Congress.

This interesting summary of our affairs, with regard to the foreign Powers between whom and the United States controversies have subsisted, and with regard also to those of our Indian neighbors, with whom we have been in a state of enmity or misunderstanding, opens a wide field for consoling and gratifying reflections. If, by prudence and moderation on every side, the extinguishment of all the causes of external discord which have heretofore menaced our tranquility, on terms compatible with our national rights and honor, shall be the happy result, how firm and how precious a foundation will have been laid for accelerating, maturing, and establishing the prosperity of our country.

Contemplating the internal situation, as well as the external relations, of the United States, we discover equal cause for contentment and satisfaction. While many of the nations of Europe, with their American dependencies, have been involved in a contest unusually bloody, exhausting, and calamitous; in which the evils of foreign war have been aggravated by domestic convulsions and insurrection; in which many of the arts most useful to society have been exposed to discouragement and decay; in which scarcity of subsistence has embittered other sufferings; while even the anticipations of a return of the blessings of peace and repose are alloyed by the sense of heavy and accumulating burdens which press upon all the departments of industry, and threaten to clog the future springs of Government; our favored country, happy in a striking contrast, has enjoyed general tranquility—a tranquility the more satisfactory, because maintained at the expense of no duty. Faithful to ourselves, we have violated no obligation to others. Our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, prosper beyond former example; the molestations of our trade (to prevent a continuance of which, however, very pointed remonstrances have been made) being overbalanced by the aggregate benefits which it derives from a neutral position. Our population advances with a celerity which, exceeding the most sanguine calculations, proportionally augments our strength and resources, and guarantees our future security. Every part of the Union displays indications of rapid and various improvement; and with burdens so light as scarcely to be perceived; with resources fully adequate to our present exigencies; with Governments founded on the genuine principles of rational liberty; and with mild and wholesome laws—is it too much to say that our country exhibits a spectacle of national happiness never surpassed, if ever before equalled?

Placed in a situation every way so auspicious, motives of commanding force impel us with sincere acknowledgment to Heaven, and pure love to our country, to unite our efforts to preserve, prolong, and improve, our immense advantages. To co-operate with you in this desirable work, is a fervent and favorite wish of my heart.

It is a valuable ingredient in the general estimate of our welfare, that the part of our country which was lately the scene of disorder and insurrection, now enjoys the blessings of quiet and order. The misled have abandoned their errors, and pay the respect to our Constitution and laws which is due from good citizens to the public authorities of the society. These circumstances have induced me to pardon generally, the offenders here referred to, and to extend forgiveness to those who had been adjudged to capital punishment. For, though I shall always think it a sacred duty to exercise with firmness and energy the Constitutional powers with which I am vested, yet it appears to me no less consistent with the public good than it is with my personal feelings, to mingle, in the operations of Government, every degree of moderation and tenderness which the national justice, dignity, and safety, may permit.

Gentlemen :

Among the objects which will claim your attention in the course of the session, a review of our Military Establishment is not the least important. It is called for by the events which have changed, and may be expected still further to change the relative situation of our frontiers. In this review, you will doubtless allow due weight to the considerations that the questions between us and certain foreign Powers are not yet finally adjusted; that the war in Europe is not yet terminated; and that our Western posts, when recovered, will demand provision for garrisoning and securing them. A statement of our present military force will be laid before you by the Department of War.

With the review of our Army Establishment is naturally connected that of the Militia. It will merit inquiry, what imperfections in the existing plan further experience may have unfolded. The subject is of so much moment, in my estimation, as to excite a constant solicitude that the consideration of it may be renewed until the greatest attainable perfection shall be accomplished. Time is wearing away some advantages for forwarding the object, while none better deserves the persevering attention of the public council.

While we indulge the satisfaction which the actual condition of our Western borders so well authorizes, it is necessary that we should not lose sight of an important truth, which continually receives new confirmations, namely; that the provisions heretofore made with a view to the protection of the Indians from the violence of the lawless part of our frontier inhabitants are insufficient. It is demonstrated that these violence can now be perpetrated with impunity; and it can need no argument to prove, that, unless the murdering of Indians can be restrained by bringing the murderers to condign punishment, all the exertions of the Government to prevent destructive retaliations by the Indians will prove fruitless, and all our present agreeable prospects illusory. The frequent destruction of innocent women and children, who are chiefly the victims of retaliation, must continue to shock humanity, and an enormous expense to drain the Treasury of the Union.

To enforce upon the Indians the observance of justice, it is indispensable that there shall be competent means of rendering justice to them. If these means can be devised by the wisdom of Congress, and especially if there can be added an adequate provision for supplying the necessities of the Indians, on reasonable terms—a measure, the mention of which I the more readily repeat, as in all the conferences with them they urge it with solicitude—I should not hesitate to entertain a strong hope of rendering our tranquility permanent. I add, with pleasure, that the probability even of their civilization is not diminished by the experiments which have been thus far made under the auspices of Government. The accomplishment of this work, if practicable, will reflect undecaying lustre on our national character, and administer the most grateful consolations that virtuous minds can know.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The state of our revenue, with the sums which have been borrowed and reimbursed pursuant to different acts of Congress, will be submitted from the proper Department, together with an estimate of the appropriations necessary to be made for the service of the ensuing year.

Whether measures may not be advisable to re-enforce the provision for the redemption of the Public Debt, will naturally engage your examination. Congress have demonstrated their sense to be, and it were superfluous to repeat mine, that whatsoever will tend to accelerate the honorable extinction of our Public Debt, accords as much with the true interest of our country as with the general sense of our constituents.

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

The statements which will be laid before you relative to the Mint will show the situation of that institution, and the necessity of some further Legislative provisions for carrying the business of it more completely into effect, and for checking abuses which appear to be arising in particular quarters.

The progress of providing materials for the frigates, and in building them; the state of the fortifications of our harbors; the measures which have been pursued for obtaining proper sites for arsenals, and for replenishing our magazines with military stores; and the steps which have been taken towards the execution of the law for opening a trade with the Indians—will likewise be presented for the information of Congress.

Temperate discussion of the important subjects which may arise in the course of the session, and mutual forbearance where there is a difference of opinion, are too obvious and necessary for the peace, happiness, and welfare, of our country, to need any recommendation of mine.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 8, 1795.

Ordered, That MESSRS. KING, ELLSWORTH, and CABOT, be a Committee to report the draft of an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech this day to both Houses of Congress.

WEDNESDAY, December 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States attended.

The following motion was made by Mr. MARTIN:

Resolved, That, in conformity to a resolution of the Senate of the United States, passed the 20th day of February, 1794, the gallery of the Senate Chamber be permitted to be opened every morning, subject to the restrictions therein mentioned, a suitable gallery having been erected and provided in the Senate Chamber, in the late recess of Congress, for that purpose."

And, the motion being amended, it was

Resolved, That in conformity to a resolution of the Senate of the United States, passed the 20th day of February, 1794, the gallery of the Senate Chamber be permitted to be opened every morning, subject to the restrictions in said resolution mentioned.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have resolved that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Whereupon, the Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution; and

Resolved, That they do concur therein, and that the Right Reverend Bishop WHITE be the Chaplain on the part of the Senate.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied during the present session with copies of three such newspapers, printed in any of the States, as he may choose, provided that the same are furnished at the rate of the usual annual charge for such papers.

SENATE.]

Address to the President.

[DECEMBER, 1795.]

THURSDAY, December 10.

JOHN BROWN, from the State of Kentucky, and FREDERICK FRÉLINCHUYSEN, from the State of New Jersey, severally attended.

Mr. KING from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported the draft of an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, at the opening of the session, which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, December 11.

ELIJAH PAINE, from the State of Vermont, attended.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The Senate took into consideration the report made by the Committee, of an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, at the opening of the session, which is as follows:

SIR: It is with peculiar satisfaction that we are informed by your Speech to the two Houses of Congress, that the long and expensive war in which we have been engaged with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio is in a situation to be finally terminated; and, though we view with concern the danger of an interruption of the peace so recently confirmed with the Creeks, we indulge the hope, that the measures that you have adopted to prevent the same, if followed by those Legislative provisions that justice and humanity equally demand, will succeed in laying the foundation of a lasting peace with the Indian tribes on the Southern as well as on the Western frontiers.

The confirmation of our Treaty with Morocco, and the adjustment of a Treaty of Peace with Algiers, in consequence of which our captive fellow-citizens shall be delivered from slavery, are events that will prove no less interesting to the public humanity, than they will be important in extending and securing the navigation and commerce of our country.

As a just and equitable conclusion of our depending negotiations with Spain will essentially advance the interest of both nations, and thereby cherish and confirm the good understanding and friendship which we have at all times desired to maintain, it will afford us real pleasure to receive an early confirmation of our expectations on this subject.

The interesting prospect of our affairs, with regard to the foreign Powers between whom and the United States controversies have subsisted, is not more satisfactory, than the review of our internal situation: if from the former we derive an expectation of the extinguishment of all the causes of external discord, that have heretofore endangered our tranquility, and on terms consistent with our national honor and safety, in the latter we discover those numerous and wide-spread tokens of prosperity which, in so peculiar a manner, distinguish our happy country.

Circumstances thus every way auspicious demand our gratitude, and sincere acknowledgments to Almighty God, and require that we should unite our efforts in imitation of your enlightened, firm, and persevering example, to establish and preserve the peace, freedom, and prosperity, of our country.

The objects which you have recommended to the notice of the Legislature will, in the course of the session, receive our careful attention, and, with a true zeal for the public welfare, we shall cheerfully co-operate in every measure that shall appear to us best calculated to promote the same.

JOHN ADAMS,
*Vice President of the United States,

The Address was taken up by paragraphs.

The fourth and fifth paragraphs were moved to be struck out by Mr. MASON.

Mr. MASON observed that he had hoped nothing contained in the Address reported as an answer to the PRESIDENT'S Speech, would have been such as to force the Senate to precipitate decisions. The two clauses he objected to disappointed him in that hope. They were calculated to bring again into view the important subject which occupied the Senate during their June session. This he conceived could answer no good purpose; the minority on that occasion were not now to be expected to recede from the opinions they then held, and they could not therefore join in the indirect self-approbation which the majority appeared to wish for, and which was most certainly involved in the two clauses which he should hope would be struck out. If his motion were agreed to, the remainder of the Address would, in his opinion, stand unexceptionable. He did not see, for his part, that our situation was every way auspicious. Notwithstanding the Treaty, our trade is grievously molested.

Mr. KING observed, that the principal features observable in the answer reported to the PRESIDENT'S Address, were to keep up that harmony of intercourse which ought to subsist between the Legislature and the PRESIDENT, and to express confidence in the undiminished firmness and love of country which always characterize our chief Executive Magistrate. He objected to striking out especially the first clause, because founded on undeniable truth. It only declares that our prospects, as to our external relations, are not more satisfactory than a review of our internal situation would prove. Was not this representation true, he asked; could it be controverted? This clause, he contended, contained nothing reasonably objectionable; it did not say as much as the second, to which only most of the objections of the member up before him applied, an answer to which he should defer, expecting that a question would be put on each in order.

The clause he said appeared to him drawn up in such terms as could not offend the nicest feelings of the minority on the important decision in June; it was particularly circumspect and cautious. If liable to objection it was in not going as far as the truth would warrant.

Some conversation took place as to the mode required by order of putting the question; whether it should be put on each clause separately, or whether upon striking out both at once.

The Chair requested that the motion should be reduced to writing. Mr. MASON accordingly reduced it to writing, and it went to striking out both clauses at once.

Mr. MASON agreed most cordially that the situation of our external relations were not more a cause of joy than our situation at home. But the obvious meaning of the clause, he conceived, was an indirect approval of our situation relative to external concerns; and to this he could not give his assent, as he did not consider their aspect as prosperous or auspicious.

Mr. BUTLER said, that when the committee was appointed to draft an answer, he hoped they would have used such general terms as to have secured an unanimous vote. He was willing to give the Chief Magistrate such an answer as respect to his station entitled him to, but not such a one as would do violence to his regard for the Constitution and his duty to his constituents. He could not approve of long and detailed answers, however unexceptionable the Speech might be in matter, and however respectable the character might be from whom it came. He had hoped, from the peculiar situation of the country, and of the Senate, that nothing would have been brought forward in the answer, on the subject which agitated the June Executive session, calculated to wound the feelings of members. He had been disappointed; it was evident that some members of the Senate could not give their voice in favor of the Address in its present shape, without involving themselves in the most palpable inconsistency.

He had long since, for his own part, declared himself against every article of the Treaty, because in no instance is it bottomed on reciprocity, the only honorable basis. After this declaration, how could he, or those who coincided in opinion with him, agree to the present Address without involving themselves in the most palpable inconsistency?

He did not agree with the gentleman of New York in his exposition of the meaning of the clauses objected to. They certainly declare our situation as to our external relations to be favorable. Our situation, as far as it respects Great Britain, he contended, was not in the least ameliorated. Their depredations on our commerce have not been less frequent of late than at any period since the beginning of her war with France. Her orders for the seizure of all our vessels laden with provisions cannot surely be a subject for congratulation. When it became authenticated that our trade was relieved from these embarrassments, then he was confident the members of the Senate, who were with him in sentiment, would readily express their satisfaction at the auspicious prospect opened for this country to the enjoyments of tranquility and happiness. But, until that happy time should arrive, he could not give his voice to deceive the inhabitants of the United States, remote from the sources of information, to hoodwink them by sanctioning with his vote a statement unwarranted by truth, and presenting to them a picture of our public happiness not sanctioned by fact.

The sentence objected to, notwithstanding the explanation of the gentleman from New York, appeared to him so worded as to lead the citizens at large to believe that the spoiliations on our commerce were drawing to a fortunate close. This was not, he conceived, warranted by the existing state of things. Indeed, he protested, he knew no more of the actual situation of the Treaty negotiation than the remotest farmer in the Union; could he then declare, he asked, that it was drawing to a happy close? Indeed, from the latest information received, far from our situation having been ameliorated by the negotiations of our Executive, he conceived our trade as much in jeopardy as ever.

As to the internal prosperity, he owned there was some cause for congratulation; but even in this his conviction could not carry him as far as the clauses in the Address seemed to go. In a pecuniary point of view, the country had made a visible progress; but he saw in it no basis of permanent prosperity. There were no circumstances attendant on it that gave a fair hope that the prosperity would be permanent. The chief cause of our temporary pecuniary prosperity is the war in Europe, which occasions the high prices our produce at present commands; when that is terminated, those advantageous prices will of course fall.

Mr. B. now came to speak of the second objectionable clause. He regretted whenever a question was brought forward that involved personality in the most indirect manner. He wished always to speak to subjects unconnected with men; but the wording of the clause was unfortunately such as to render allusion to official character unavoidable. He objected principally to the epithet firm, introduced into the latter clause, as applied to the Supreme Executive. Why firmness? he asked. To what? or to whom? Is it the manly demand of restitution made of Great Britain for her accumulated injuries that called forth the praise? for his own part he could discern no firmness there. Is it for the undaunted and energetic countenance of the cause of France, in her struggle for freeing herself from despotic shackles? He saw no firmness displayed on that occasion. Where then is it to be found? Was it in the opposition to the minority of the Senate and the general voice of the people against the Treaty that that firmness was displayed? If it is that firmness in opposing the will of the people, which is intended to be extolled, the vote shall never, said Mr. B., leave the walls of the Senate with my approbation.

He could not approve, he said, that firmness that prompted the Executive to resist the unequivocal voice of his fellow-citizens from New Hampshire to Georgia. He would have applauded the firmness of the PRESIDENT, if, in compliance with the unequivocal wish of the people, he had resisted the voice of the majority on the Treaty, and refused his signature to it.

This was, he understood, (and it should be mentioned in honor of the PRESIDENT,) his first intention; why he changed it, time, he said, must disclose.

He concluded by proposing an amendment to be substituted in lieu of the objectionable clauses, should they be struck out.

Mr. READ said, he was not in the habit of giving a silent vote, and, as many of his constituents were adverse to the instrument to which he had given his assent, he thought this a fit opportunity to say something on the subject.

Address to the President.

Gentlemen on the other side had spoken of their feelings; did they suppose, he asked, that those who were in the majority had not feelings? Also, gentlemen declared they would not recede from their former determinations; did they expect that the majority would recede?

He had, he said, taken the question of the Treaty in all its aspects, and considered it maturely, and though he lamented that he differed in opinion on that subject with his colleague, and a portion of the people of his State, he nevertheless remained convinced that the ratification of it was advisable: It rescued the country from war and its desolating horrors.

After reading that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech to which the clauses objected to were an echo, he asked, whether any one could say, under the conviction that the measures of Government had prevented a war, that our view of foreign relations was not consolatory? On all hands, he observed, the idea of a war was deprecated; both sides of the House wished to avoid it; then is it not a consolatory reflection to all that its horrors have been averted? Is there a man who does not believe that, had the Treaty not been ratified, we should have had war? If the country had been plunged into a war, would it be as flourishing as it is?

The trifling vexations our commerce has sustained are not to be compared to the evils of hostility. What good end could have been answered by a war? The Address, in the part under discussion, says no more than that we rejoice at the prospect that the blessings of peace will be preserved; and does not this expectation exist?

Great Britain, in the plenitude of her power, had availed herself of the right she had, under the Law of Nations, of seizing enemy's goods in neutral vessels; but has allowed compensation to some Americans, and a system of mild measures on our part is the best security for further.

He adverted to that part of Mr. BUTLER'S observations which related to the probable fall of provisions at the peace. We ought not to be grieved if Europe was rid of the calamities of war at that price. But he contended that, from the measures of the Administration, permanent advantages were secured to this country. The value of our soil has been enhanced; wealth has poured in from various parts of the globe, and many permanent advantages secured.

There had been one assertion made, which, by repetition, had by some almost been taken for granted, but which required proof to induce him to believe it, and that was, that a majority of the citizens of the United States are opposed to the Treaty. In the part of the country he came from, he owned there might be a majority of that opinion, but he believed the contrary of the United States at large; he expressed a conviction that, when his constituents came to consider the measure maturely, they would change their opinions, and, indeed, he understood that the false impressions by which they were at first actuated, were already wearing off.

But the Senate and PRESIDENT are the Constitutional Treaty-making powers. If mistaken in their decisions, they cannot be accused of having been misled by sudden and immaturred impressions. He should conceive himself unfit to fill a chair in the Senate, if he suffered himself to be carried away by such impressions. The people could not, in their town meetings, deprived of proper information, possibly form an opinion that deserved weight, and it was the duty of the Executive not to be shaken in their determination by tumultuous proceedings from without. Upon this ground he much approved the PRESIDENT'S conduct, and thought it entitled to the epithet firm.

In local questions, affecting none but the interests of his constituents, he should attend to their voice, but on great national points, he did not consider himself as a Representative from South Carolina, but as a Senator for the Union. In questions of this last kind, even if the wishes of his constituents were unequivocally made known to him, he should not conceive himself bound to sacrifice his opinions to theirs. He viewed the PRESIDENT as standing in this situation, and though he might hear the opinions of the people from every part of the United States, he should not sacrifice to them his own conviction; in this line of conduct he has shown his firmness, and deserves to be complimented for it by the Senate.

The Address reported, he said, contained nothing that could wound the feelings of any member. The Senate would not, in his opinion, act improperly if they expressed opinions coincident with their act in the June session. The feelings of the majority should be as much consulted as those of the minority. The minority are not asked to retract; but there is a propriety in the Senate's going as far in their Address as the Speech went, though it should be styled a vote of self-approbation. He hoped the clauses would not be struck out.

Mr. ELLSWORTH was opposed to striking out. The clause records a fact, and if struck out the Senate deny it. The PRESIDENT asserts it, in the Address reported, the Senate assent, a motion is made to strike out, is it because the truth of it is doubted? It cannot be called an unimportant fact, therefore its omission will not be imputed to oversight. The latter part of the clause expresses our gratitude to Almighty God. Will the Senate refuse to make an acknowledgment of that kind? Do they not admit that He is the source of all Good, and can they refuse to acknowledge it? And if so, is it possible that, in admitting the fact and expressing the sentiment, which so naturally flows from it, the Senate should wound the feelings of any friend to his country?

The truth of the fact is as clear as that the sun now shines; the sentiment is unexceptionable; he, therefore, recommended to his friend the mover, not to insist upon striking out merely, but that he should vary the motion, and propose a substitute.

To bring the mind to the point with precision,

DECEMBER, 1795.]

Address to the President.

[SENATE.]

it was necessary to attend to the wording of the clause. He read it. As to the signification of that part which relates to our foreign concerns, he did not consider it as hypothetical, but a positive declaration of a conviction that their situation is satisfactory, and on that ground he wished to meet the question.

The clause objected to expresses an expectation that the causes of external disagreement which have unhappily existed, will be peaceably done away. He said he had that expectation; many have it not. Those who have it not will negative the clause; those who have it will vote in its favor; the result will be the sense of a majority; the Senate could not be expected, more than on other occasions, to be unanimous; if the declarations contained in those clauses are supported, they will be considered as the sense of the majority of the Senate, others may dissent; but because unanimity could not be obtained it was no reason why the majority should give a virtual negative to the declaration which they conceived founded on truth.

He examined in detail the situation of our external relations, to show the foundation on which he rested his expectation of a satisfactory arrangement of them, and of our general prosperity in that respect. With Morocco, our treaties are renewed. With Algiers, assurances are given by the Executive that a peace is not far distant. With Spain, on the same authority, it is understood that our prospects are favorable in that quarter. With the hitherto hostile Indians, a peace is within reach; and the only quarter in which doubt can arise is from Great Britain. But even with respect to that nation, his expectation was, that our differences there would terminate amicably; and he believed this to be the expectation of the Senate, as a collective body.

Mr. E. then went into the examination of some other parts of the clauses objected to, and vindicated the propriety of the epithets, enlightened, firm, persevering, and concluded by lamenting that there existed a difference of opinion, but hoped that this would not deter the majority from an expression of their sense.

Mr. TAZEWELL said, the discussion had taken a turn different from that which he expected when he heard the motion. He understood the motion at the time it was made, and still so understood it, as not intending to question the propriety of any thing which was contained in the PRESIDENT's communication to both Houses of Congress. But from what had been said (by Mr. READ, of South Carolina) that part of the answer to the PRESIDENT's communication which had given rise to the motion, was intended to have a further operation than he originally believed. He asked what had given rise to the practice of returning an answer of any kind to the PRESIDENT's communication to Congress in the form of an Address? There was nothing, he said, in the Constitution, or in any of the fundamental rules of the Federal Government which required that ceremony from either branch of the Congress. The practice was but an imitation of the ceremonies used upon like occasions in other countries, and was neither required by the Constitution, nor authorized by the principles upon which our Government was erected. But having obtained, he did not intend now to disturb it. To allow the utmost latitude to the principle which had begotten the practice, it could only tolerate the ceremony as a compliment to the Chief Magistrate. It could not be permitted to arrest all opinions previous to regular discussions, nor to operate as a means of pledging members to the pursuit of a particular course, which subsequent and more full inquiries might show to be extremely improper. Every answer, therefore, to the PRESIDENT's communication ought to be drawn in terms extremely general, neither seducing the PRESIDENT into a belief that this House would pursue a general recommendation into points not at first contemplated by them, nor pledged themselves to the world that that state of things was just, which time had not permitted them thoroughly to examine. The clauses now under consideration had, at least in one instance, deviated from this principle. They declare to the world, "That the interesting prospect of our affairs with regard to the foreign Powers, between whom and the United States controversies have subsisted, is not more satisfactory than the review of our internal situation." The communications from the PRESIDENT have not uttered so bold a sentiment, nor is there any thing in those communications that justifies the assertion of this fact: Placing the Treaty with Great Britain out of the question, which seems to have been the uppermost consideration when this sentence was penned, the seizure of our provision vessels since the signature of that Treaty, and the unwarrantable imprisonment of our seamen, are acts which cloud our prosperity and happiness. The minds of the Americans must be brought to consider these things as trivial incidents in our political affairs, before the sentence under consideration can be approved. He said he must, therefore, vote for the motion to strike out the two clauses of the answer, in order that some more fit expressions might then be introduced to succeed them. He hoped the answer might be couched, in terms just and delicate towards the PRESIDENT, without wounding the feelings of any Senator; and he believed both might be done without any difficulty after the two clauses were expunged.

After some further observations from Messrs. MASON, BUTLER, and BLODOWORTH, in which the latter expressed the opinion that he did conceive the terms of our peace with Great Britain consistent with the dignity and honor of the United States, the question was put, and decided for striking out—ayes 8, noes 14.

On a further attempt to amend one of the clauses some conversation took place more remarkable for ingenuity than interesting for solidity, being chiefly a debate upon words. The Senate divided on it—7 to 15.

On the question, of agreeing to the Address, it was carried—14 to 8, as follows:

Frelinghuysen, King, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Paine, Read, Ross, Strong, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Butler, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

Ordered, That the Committee who prepared the Address wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and desire him to acquaint the Senate at what time and place it will be most convenient for him that it should be presented.

Mr. KING reported, from the committee, that they had waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and that he would receive the Address of the Senate to-morrow at 12 o'clock. Whereupon, resolved, that the Senate will, to-morrow at 12 o'clock, wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES accordingly.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have proceeded to the choice of a Chaplain to Congress on their part, and the Rev. ASHBEL GREEN is duly elected.

SATURDAY, December 12.

Agreeably to the resolution of yesterday, the Senate waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and the VICE PRESIDENT, in their name, presented the Address then agreed to.

To which the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was pleased to make the following reply :

GENTLEMEN: With real pleasure I receive your Address, recognising the prosperous situation of our public affairs, and giving assurances of your careful attention to the objects demanding Legislative consideration; and that, with a true zeal for the public welfare, you will cheerfully co-operate in every measure which shall appear to you best calculated to promote the same.

But I derive peculiar satisfaction from your concurrence with me in the expressions of gratitude to Almighty God, which a review of the auspicious circumstances that distinguish our happy country have excited; and I trust the sincerity of our acknowledgments will be evinced by a union of efforts to establish and preserve its peace, freedom, and prosperity.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Senate returned to their own Chamber, and soon after adjourned.

MONDAY, December 14.

JOHN RUTHERFURD, from New Jersey, attended.

The petition of John Blanch was presented and read, praying Congress to grant him a patent, for executing and vending a new hydrostatic pump or engine, for such length of time as may be judged expedient.

Ordered, That this petition be referred to Messrs. BUTLER, STRONG, and READ, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary for the Department of State, with copies of two reports, made by the Directors of the Mint, to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; which were read, and referred to Messrs. CABOT, BINGHAM, and RUTHERFURD, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 15.

AARON BURR, from New York, and JOHN VINING, from Delaware, severally attended.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Department of War, with the following statements:

No. 1. Of the present Military force of the United States.

No. 2. A report of the measures which have been pursued to obtain proper sites for Arsenals.

No. 3. A report of the measures which have been taken to replenish the magazines with military stores.

No. 4. A report of the measures taken for opening a trade with the Indians; and,

No. 5. A report of the progress made in providing materials for the frigates, and in building them.

Which statements were severally read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

WILLIAM BRADFORD, from Rhode Island, attended.

Ordered, That Messrs. BURR, BROWN, and ELLSWORTH, be a committee to take into consideration the report from the Department of War, of the measures taken for opening a trade with the Indians, and report thereon to the Senate.

The petition of Samuel Jones, and others, in behalf of some hundreds from Wales, who have left their native country with a view of forming a permanent establishment in America, praying liberty to purchase a certain tract of land mentioned in the petition, was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THURSDAY, December 17.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter from Samuel Meredith, Treasurer, together with his accounts, ending 31st December, 1794, 31st March, 1795, and 30th June, 1795.

Also, his accounts in the War Department, ending 31st March, 30th June, and 30th September, 1795; which were read, and ordered to lie for inspection.

Ordered, That Messrs. STRONG, LIVERMORE, and BURR, be a committee to inquire what business remained unfinished at the last session, and report such part thereof as is proper to be taken into consideration the present session.

On motion, that it be produced his credentials, and, the oath required by law being administered, he took his seat in the Senate.

The motion made yesterday, that the Secretary of War be requested to lay before the Senate an account of the expenditures in the late military operations against the insurgents, was resumed, and it was agreed that the consideration thereof be further postponed.

Mr. STRONG, from the committee appointed to inquire what business remained unfinished at the last session, which, in their opinion, it is proper should be taken into consideration at the present session, reported —

That the following bills originated in the Senate, and were postponed until the present Congress, or had only two readings, and remained unfinished, viz :

1. A bill authorizing the purchase of Indian goods.

2. A bill to punish frauds committed on the Bank of the United States.

3. A bill to regulate proceeding in cases of out-lawry.

4. A bill declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Virginia, passed the 25th of December, 1794, for the support of a marine hospital.

5. A bill to authorize the holding of special Courts in certain cases.

Which bills, upon the motion of any member of the Senate, may be taken up at the present session.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the Report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund; which was read, as follows :

"The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund respectfully report to Congress:

"That, pursuant to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States,' and in conformity to resolutions agreed upon by them, and severally approved by the President of the United States, they have caused purchases of the said Debt to be made, through the agency of Samuel Meredith, Esq., Treasurer of the United States, subsequent to their report, dated the 18th day November, 1794, to the amount of $42,639 14, for which there have been paid, including a sum of $160 allowed for commissions on purchases formerly made and reported, the sum of $37,612 37, in specie.

"That the documents accompanying this report, marked A, B, C, show the aforesaid purchases generally and in detail, including the places where, the times when, the prices at which, and the persons of whom, the purchases were made.

"That the purchases now and heretofore reported amount, together, to $2,307,661 71, for which there have been paid, in specie, $1,618,936 04, as will more particularly appear from the document marked A.

"That there remains at this time in the hands of their said Agent, the sum of $70,968 15, arising from dividends subsequent to the 1st day of April last, on stock heretofore purchased and redeemed, which sum, with the dividends to be made thereon at the close of the present year, and other funds appropriated by law, will be applied, on the 1st day of January ensuing, to the reimbursement of the six per cent. stock, bearing a present interest, pursuant to the directions contained in the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of Public Credit and for the redemption of the Public Debt.'

"On behalf of the Board,

"December 18, 1795.

JOHN ADAMS."

MONDAY, December 21.

The motion made on the 17th instant, "that the Secretary of War be requested to lay before the Senate an account of the expenditures in the late military operations against the insurgents," was withdrawn, and the following motion substituted :

"That the Secretary of War be requested to lay before the Senate a statement of the military force actually employed against the insurgents in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania, and an account of the expenditures in that expedition; showing, in particular, the periods of time for which the militia of the respective States drew pay; also, a list of the general and regimental staff, with the pay respectively received by them, and an account of the pay and disbursements of the Commander-in-Chief."

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, December 22.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday that the Secretary of War be requested to exhibit certain accounts of the expenditures for the militia employed against the insurgents in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to lay before the Senate a statement of the military force actually employed against the insurgents in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania, and an account of the expenditures in that expedition; showing, in particular, the periods of time for which the militia of the respective States drew pay; also, a list of the general and regimental staff, with the pay respectively received by them, and an account of the pay and disbursements of the Commander-in-Chief.

Mr. BURR, from the committee to whom was referred the report from the Department of War, of the measures taken for opening a trade with the Indians, reported, "That, in the opinion of the committee, it will be expedient to appropriate a further sum for the purposes of Indian trade; and that a bill should be introduced for that purpose."

And, the report being adopted, the committee was directed to bring in a bill accordingly.

WEDNESDAY, December 23.

Mr. BURR, from the committee yesterday instructed to that purpose, reported a bill making provision for the purposes of trade with the Indians; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Ordered, That Messrs. ELLSWORTH, STRONG, and TAZEWELL, be a committee to prepare and report a bill to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry.

[JANUARY, 1796.]

Ordered, That the Secretary for the Department of Treasury be requested to lay before the Senate returns of the imports and exports of the United States, similar to those heretofore exhibited, up to the latest periods to which he has received the accounts from the several districts, and commencing from the last returns made.

THURSDAY, December 24.

The bill making provision for the purposes of trade with the Indians, was read the second time; and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

Ordered, by unanimous consent, that Mr. TAZEWELL have permission to introduce a bill declaring the consent of Congress to "An act of the State of Virginia, passed the 25th of December, 1794, for the support of a Marine Hospital;" which bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BUTLER reported, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of John Blanch, and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

MONDAY, December 28.

The bill declaring the consent of Congress to "An act of the State of Virginia passed the 25th of December, 1794, for the support of a Marine Hospital," was read a second time, and referred to Messrs. TAZEWELL, STRONG, and BINGHAM, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill making provision for the purposes of trade with the Indians.

Ordered, That this bill be referred to Messrs. ELLSWORTH, TAZEWELL, BURR, ROSS, and BROWN, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 29.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of John Blanch; which is as follows:

"That, in their opinion, it will be proper to permit aliens, who are residents in the United States, to obtain an exclusive property in any useful art, machine, or manufacture, they may have invented, in case such aliens, before their application for such exclusive property, shall have taken an oath that it is their intention to become citizens of the United States, in the manner pointed out in the first section of the act, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject;' and that a bill be brought in for that purpose."

On motion to amend the report, by adding, after the word "subject," the following words: "and, also, that he has not obtained a patent for such invention or improvement from any foreign Prince or State," it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the report be adopted, and that the committee be instructed to bring in a bill accordingly.

WEDNESDAY, December 30.

The Senate assembled, but transacted no business.

THURSDAY, December 31.

The Senate assembled, and, in order to give the committees opportunity to perfect their reports, adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 1, 1796.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

MONDAY, January 4.

The bill to regulate proceeding in cases of outlawry was read the second time, and its further consideration postponed until to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. Danbridge, his Secretary. Captain Sedam, of the first Sub-Legion, bearing the Colors mentioned in the Message:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

A Letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, received on the 22d of the last month, covered an Address, dated the 21st of October, 1794, from the Committee of Public Safety to the Representatives of the United States in Congress: and also informed me that he was instructed by the Committee to present to the United States the Colors of France. I therefore proposed to receive them last Friday, the first day of the new year, a day of general joy and congratulation. On that day the Minister of the French Republic delivered the Colors with an Address, to which I returned an answer. By the latter, the Senate will see that I have informed the Minister that the Colors will be deposited with the archives of the United States. But it seemed to me proper previously to exhibit to the two Houses of Congress these evidences of the continued friendship of the French Republic, together with the sentiments expressed by me on the occasion in behalf of the United States. They are herewith communicated.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 4, 1796.

The Message and papers were read; after which the Colors were withdrawn, and the Message and papers ordered to lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, January 5.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry, and proceeded to the consideration thereof in paragraphs; and, after progress, the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

PRESENTATION OF FRENCH FLAG.

A motion was made by Mr. TAZEWELL, seconded by Mr. LANGDON, that it be—

"Resolved, by the Senate of the United States in Congress assembled, That the President be informed the

JANUARY, 1796.]

Presentation of the Colors of France.

[SENATE.]

Senate have received, with the purest pleasure, the evidences of the continued friendship of the French Republic, which accompanied his Message of yesterday.

"That he be requested to assure that magnanimous nation, through the proper organ, that the Senate unite with him in all the feelings expressed to the Minister of France, on the presentation of the Colors of his Nation, and devoutly wish that this symbol of the triumphs and enfranchisement of that great people, given as a pledge of faithful friendship, and placed among the evidences and memorials of the freedom and independence of the United States, may contribute to cherish and perpetuate the sincere affection by which the two Republics are so happily united.

Mr. ELLSWORTH moved that these resolutions should lie on the table until to-morrow, that members should have an opportunity of perusing attentively the papers accompanying the Message of the PRESIDENT.

Mr. BUTLER said, that he should very reluctantly, in general cases, oppose a motion of the kind now made; but, on the present occasion, he could not give it his assent. If the resolutions were intricate, or by the question the judgment of the Senate could be committed, he should accord in the wish expressed by the mover; but, as the resolutions go merely to an expression of the sentiments of the House respecting the French Republic, their feelings and judgment must be as ripe for such expression now as they can be at any future period. It was not like a law that was to affect the Senate hereafter; it had nothing to do with the internal situation of the country or municipal regulations; but they only went to express a sympathetic feeling for the French Republic, and a wish to see them enjoy every happiness under the form of Government they have lately chosen.

This cannot commit the Senate, he conceived. If the motion for postponement prevailed, it might convey a distrust of the sense of the Senate respecting that Republic. He felt a lively sense towards that nation on account of the glorious cause in which they had embarked; of their gallantry and spirit in their arduous struggle to place men upon a footing they were entitled to, raising them from a state of the most abject and debasing slavery.

He declared himself always ready to express his feelings on the magnanimity of such a people. If other members of the Senate possessed not those feelings, they could now give the resolutions their negative. He did not wish for a postponement, as it might be viewed as in a manner slighting the Republic.

Mr. ELLSWORTH believed there was no real difference of opinion on the subject. All felt an ardent friendship for the French; but one mode of expressing it might be more proper than another. Besides, it might be a doubt whether an expression of the feelings of the Senate on this occasion was necessary—the Representatives had already spoken. He was not, as the member who spoke before him, ready on all occasions to express his sentiments; but only on fit occasions, and then he wished to do it in the most proper manner. The operations of his mind, he confessed, were slow. He wished more time for the perusal of the documents laid before the Senate by the PRESIDENT.

Mr. LIVERMORE was also in favor of postponement.

Mr. LANGDON observed, that since members did so earnestly require time, he should not urge an immediate decision; he should no longer object to a postponement till to-morrow. He was happy to hear gentlemen say there was no difference of sentiment upon the present occasion; he hoped that, upon subjects relative to France, this might always be the case, and that the Senate would not confine itself to empty professions of attachment, but would evince it by substantial deeds.

Mr. TAZEVELL did not wish to press the business to an immediate decision, since members desired time. He confessed he did not expect a motion for a postponement would be made, as the resolutions he offered contained nothing more than the PRESIDENT had expressed on the occasion. However, if it was wished that the Senate should express their sentiments in still stronger language than the PRESIDENT, he should not object.

The opposition to the motion for postponement being withdrawn, it was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, January 6.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday on the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 4th instant, and the presentation of the flag of the French Republic; and,

On motion of Mr. CABOT, seconded by Mr. ELLSWORTH, to expunge these words from the second paragraph of the motion: "that he be requested to assure that magnanimous nation, through the proper organ"—

Mr. STRONG was in favor of striking out. He observed that the communication made to the Senate by the PRESIDENT consisted of two distinct parts, the letter from the French Committee of Safety and the address accompanying the flag. In the letter not one word was said about the flag; it was written in October, '94, and there was probably then no idea of sending one. The letter and the flag only happened to be delivered at the same time; there was no other connexion between them. The letter, he said, was in answer to one from this country, and was meant to close a complimentary correspondence. It required no answer; it would puzzle any one to make an answer to it. An attempt was made by the resolution offered, which proved it impossible to answer it. The resolution forsook the contents of the letter, which, he repeated, closed the correspondence. The United States had presented to the National Convention our flag; or rather our Minister (and he was unwilling to question the propriety of his so doing) presented it on behalf of this Government; a French flag was sent in return; then the propriety of an answer on this ground became the sole question. This flag had been delivered to the PRESIDENT, who made an answer on the presentation of it—a complete and perfect answer. He communicated his answer to the Senate. Then was it proper, he asked, that the Executive should be requested to make a second answer, and nearly in the same words? The PRESIDENT, in his answer, expressly says, that he speaks not only his own sentiments, but those of the citizens at large, including, no doubt, the Senate. In this situation of the transaction nothing can be proper to be done by the Senate but to express their opinion of the propriety of his answer; and this would be accomplished by adopting the substance of the resolution, after striking out the words proposed.

There could be (he concluded, by observing) no difference of feeling in the Senate on the occasion. The only difference was in the mode of expressing it, and he inclined, for the reasons given, to that which was the object of the motion for striking out.

Mr. ELLSWORTH was also of opinion that the subject divided itself into two distinct parts. The first object was an expression of the pleasure of the Senate at this new evidence of the friendship of France, and joining with the PRESIDENT in all the feelings he had expressed on the occasion. This would be effectually done by entering on the Journals the resolution as proposed to be amended. The PRESIDENT received the flag and answered, then communicated the transaction to the Senate.

It appeared, by the papers communicated, he contended, that there was no connexion between the letter of the Committee of Public Safety and the flag. He would not say that both were not very important transactions, but they were disconnected. The letter was written much antecedent to the sending of the flag—it was written in '94, and was intended to close a correspondence. The correspondence began by an address from the Convention, while Robespierre was an active member of it. This address was to Congress: the PRESIDENT transmitted it to each House, and they sent it back to the Executive, requesting he would answer it, with expressions of the friendly dispositions of the United States towards France. The resolutions of the Houses and the letter of the Executive were transmitted through Mr. Monroe. The letter now in the view of the Senate is in answer to that, and closes the complimentary correspondence, if it ever can close. Propriety did not require another word from the Senate; indeed, decency did not admit it, for it could not be contended that the correspondence should be kept up ad infinitum.

As to the flag, how can it require an answer from the Senate? It was not presented to them by the French Minister, but to the PRESIDENT, who had answered, not only for himself, but for the citizens of the United States; and he imagined it would not be contended that the members of the Senate were not citizens.

It is not advanced, he said, that the PRESIDENT did not express the sentiments of the Senate in the answer to the Minister; on the contrary, his words are borrowed in this resolution. But it is wished he should answer again in the same strain, and this was, in his opinion, neither necessary nor even proper.

Mr. ELLSWORTH next combated the resolution as originally offered as unconstitutional. Nothing, he contended, could be found in the Constitution to authorize either branch of the Legislature to keep up any kind of correspondence with a foreign nation. To Congress were given the powers of legislation and the right of declaring war. If authority beyond this is assumed, however trifling the encroachment at first, where will it stop? It might be said, that this was a mere matter of ceremony and form, and, therefore, could do no harm. A correspondence with foreign nations was a business of difficulty and delicacy—the peace and tranquility of a country may hinge on it. Shall the Senate, because they may think it in one case trifling, or conceive the power ought to be placed in them, assume it? If it was not specially delegated by the Constitution, the Senate might, perhaps, but it is positively placed in the hands of the Executive. The people who sent us here, (said Mr. E.,) placed their confidence in the PRESIDENT in matters of this nature, and it does not belong to the Senate to assume it.

So forcibly, he said, were both Houses impressed with the impropriety of the Legislature corresponding with any foreign Power, that, when it was announced to them that the unfortunate Louis XVI. had accepted the Constitution of '89, the communication was sent back to the PRESIDENT, with a request that he would answer it on their behalf, with congratulations and best wishes.

But even this, he considered, they had not strictly a right to do. It was only saving appearances. Neither branch had a right to dictate to the PRESIDENT what he should answer. The Constitution left the whole business in his breast. It was wrong to place him in the dilemma of disobliging the Legislature or sacrificing his own discretion. But if such practices had inadvertently been followed, it was full time to recede from them.

He recapitulated, in a few words, and concluded, by observing, that should the motion for striking out prevail, members would still be in order to amend the resolution, if they chose, by adding to the warmth of expression it already contained.

Mr. BUTLER considered the situation into which the member up before him seemed desirous that the Senate should be placed, as highly degrading; they were to be deprived of the right of expressing their own sentiments, they were to have no voice, no will, no opinion of their own, but such as it would please the Executive to express for them.

The only fault he found in the resolve was, that it was not full and expressive enough. He observed, that it appeared the studied desire of one part of the House to cut off all communication between the people of the United States and the people of the French Republic. Their representatives are now told, that they can have no will, no voice, but through the Executive. Their constituents never intended that they should be placed in this ridiculous point of view, and he declared he never could sit under it silently.

He turned to the Journals of the Senate to show that in the proceedings in the case of the answer to the communication from Robespierre and others, there was a considerable division in the Senate, and the mode adopted was by a majority only; but did not meet the sense of the Senate very generally.

Upon the presentation of the flag to the PRESIDENT, the Minister particularly observes, that it is for the people of the United States. The PRESIDENT in his answer, speaks of himself and his own feelings. He read part of his answer—"Born in a land of Liberty," &c. He does intimate, he observed, in a cursory manner, that he trusts he speaks the sentiments of his fellow-citizens: but does not attempt to make any professions of either branch of the Legislature, thinking, no doubt, that when the subject came before them, they would speak for themselves.

Suppose, he asked, that the expression of friendship contained in the PRESIDENT's Address on the occasion, fell short of the feelings of the Senate, would they, he asked, adopt the expressions for their own? For his own part, he declared, he could not leave it to others to speak his sentiments, but chose to reserve that right to himself. Even if no communication had been received from the French Republic, no token of attachment, the present period in their affairs, the establishment of a new Government, would warrant an address of congratulation. There could be no impropriety in it, unless there were objections to drawing nigher to the Republic. Besides, the address of the Committee of Safety, was certainly intended for the Legislature, being directed to the Representatives, unless it could be denied that the Senate were Representatives of the people of the United States.

There was nothing in the Constitution, he contended, that could prevent the Legislature from expressing their sentiments: it was not an Executive act, but a mere complimentary answer to a complimentary presentation. If this right was denied them, where would the principle stop, the Senate might be made in time mere automata. It was as proper, he contended, for the Senate to express an opinion on the occasion as for the PRESIDENT or House of Representatives.

He concluded by observing, that the resolution as offered, said as little as could be said on the occasion, and he never could consent to the striking out, which would cause it to be entered only on the Journal, and would be an indirect slight of the French Republic, as the sentiments of the Senate would not be communicated to them.

Mr. TAZEWELL was happy to find no difference in the Senate as to the substance of the resolution. As the form, however, had been made matter of debate, some importance had been given to it which its intrinsic consequence perhaps did not deserve, and it became the Senate to weigh well their decision. It certainly, he said, could not be unknown to the Senate, that unfavorable impressions had travelled abroad respecting their feelings and sentiments towards the French, and he suggested to their consideration whether if the present motion for striking out prevailed, even in the face of their own precedents, it would not give countenance to the surmise. On a former occasion he stated a communication was made to the Senate through the PRESIDENT, informing that the King of France had accepted the Crown under the Constitution of 1789. The Senate were not content on that occasion with barely approving what the PRESIDENT had done, but requested the PRESIDENT to say in their behalf, that they were happy at the event, and to assure the King, of their good will for the prosperity of the French nation and his own. What difference, he asked, was there on that occasion and the present, when the French just adopted and organized a new Government? Will it not be said, he asked, that the robes of royalty have charms with the Senate, which the humble habiliments of Democracy do not possess in their eyes, if on the present occasion they should deviate from a precedent established before royalty was abolished? This would be naturally implied, and the Senate, he conceived, should avoid the imputation. There was no necessity pleaded in favor of striking out, if the motion was not insisted on, it would remove impressions which it was useful should be removed, and which he trusted would be removed.

He dwelt on the impropriety of the Senate's rejecting a form of proceeding in this case, not only sanctioned by their own precedent, but by the practice of both the PRESIDENT and Senate. Why, especially, he asked, should they give rise to invidious comparisons between themselves and the other branch? He hoped the motion for striking out would not prevail.

Mr. ELLSWORTH conceived there existed a material difference between the present case and that cited by the member last up. The communication was then to Congress, now to the PRESIDENT, who had only given an account of the transaction to the Senate. He added, however, that the line of conduct pursued by the Senate on the former occasion did not meet his approbation; they expressed hopes which he never thought could be realized, and in the event it proved so; for before the sentiments of the Senate could cross the Atlantic, the unfortunate King and Constitution were both overthrown. This, he argued, should make the Senate wary in their proceedings in analogous cases. Upon the communication from Robespierre, Barrere, and others, the Senate were more cautious, they said nothing about the Constitution, but only requested the PRESIDENT to express in their behalf the sentiments of friendship, &c., which the Senate entertained for France. The Senate gave the PRESIDENT a short text on that occasion; and he wrote according to his own discretion, and perhaps expressed more than the Senate would have said. If a short text was given this objection occurred; if the Senate amplified, then they dictated improperly to the PRESIDENT what he should write.

The example of the House of Representatives had been mentioned; he conceived it was no rule of proceeding for the Senate. The fact was, that the resolve carried in that House was upon a very slight view indeed of the papers communicated. Indeed, it would appear upon the face of it, that it was penned before the papers were read. This was, in his opinion, no example for imitation; the Senate ought to proceed with their usual deliberation.

It had been said that doubts had gone abroad, whether the Senate were friendly to France. Those doubts had been raised by writers among us, the same who also endeavor to convince the Americans that the friendship of France towards them was not cordial. This must appear unfounded from the proceeding now the object of debate, and the former suspicion must be removed by an insertion of the substance of the resolution now before the Senate on their Journals.

Mr. TAZEWELL said a few words to show that there was no difference between the case he had already cited, the proceeding of the Senate, when they expressed their satisfaction at the manner in which the National Convention had honored the memory of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, and the present case.

Mr. ROSS differed. In the former instances, the PRESIDENT made the original communications to the Senate before he had answered them; now he has answered and only communicates an account of the transaction.

Mr. BURR was against striking out. The National Convention, he observed, might, when they received the answer to the first communication, have said, as is now said on the floor of the Senate, that the correspondence there ended, and that it was not necessary to make us a reply; but they acted differently, and he hoped the Senate would acknowledge the receipt of their pledge of friendship. Indeed, he said, he could not see that any great harm would arise in the two branches of the Legislature interchanging even once a year a letter of friendship and good will with the Republic. It was objected that the present resolution was no answer to the letter. A few lines would make it so, and they might easily be added. The omission did not prove, as had been asserted by one member, that it was impossible to answer it. That it was not impossible was testified by the proceedings of the other branch. He did not intend to slight the dignity of the Senate, however, he said, by quoting the proceedings of the other House as a binding rule of proceeding for this; but their proceedings certainly proved the possibility of making an answer; and besides, there was full as much propriety in looking for precedents in their conduct, as in the proceedings of a British Parliament. Each, however, in their place might deserve weight though not implicit reliance.

He advocated the rights of the Senate to answer for themselves, and the propriety of acknowledging the receipt of the Colors, which were not sent to the Executive exclusively.

He concluded by citing the Senate's own precedents in analogous cases, and he hoped, that it would not be insisted that the practice of two or three successive years deserved to be laid to the charge of inadvertency.

After a few words more from Messrs. STRONG, BURR, REED, and BUTLER, the yeas and nays were called upon striking out, which were taken and stood—yeas 16, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Gunn, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Paine, Reed, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Walton.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Langdon, Martin, Robinson, and Tazewell.

Whereupon, it was Resolved, unanimously, that the PRESIDENT be informed that the Senate have received, with the purest pleasure, the evidences of the continued friendship of the French Republic, which accompanied his Message of the 4th inst.

That the Senate unite with him in all the feelings expressed to the Minister of France on the presentation of the Colors of his nation, and devoutly wish that this symbol of the triumphs and enfranchisement of that great people, given as a pledge of faithful friendship, and placed among the evidences and memorials of the freedom and independence of the United States, may contribute to cherish and perpetuate the sincere affection by which the two Republics are so happily united.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

THURSDAY, January 7.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry, in paragraphs; and, after consideration, the bill was further postponed.

FRIDAY, January 8.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I transmit to you a memorial of the Commissioners appointed by virtue of an act, entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent Seat of the Government of the United States," on the subject of the public buildings under their direction.

Since locating a district for the permanent Seat of the Government of the United States, as heretofore announced to both Houses of Congress, I have accepted the grants of money and of land stated in the memorial of the Commissioners. I have directed the buildings therein mentioned to be commenced, on plans which I deemed consistent with the liberality of the grants and proper for the purposes intended.

I have not been inattentive to this important business intrusted by the Legislature to my care. I have viewed the resources placed in my hands, and observed the manner in which they have been applied: the progress is pretty fully detailed in the memorial from the Commissioners; and one of them attends to give further information if required. In a case new and arduous, like the present, difficulties might naturally be expected: some have occurred; but they are in a great degree surmounted; and I have no doubt, if the remaining resources are properly cherished, so as to prevent the loss of property by hasty and numerous sales, that all the buildings required for the accommodation of the Government of the United States may be completed in season, without aid from the Federal Treasury. The subject is therefore recommended to the consideration of Congress, and the result will determine the measures which I shall cause to be pursued with respect to the property remaining unsold.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 8, 1796.

The Message and memorial therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry, and, after progress, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter from Samuel Meredith, Treasurer of the United States, together with his specie account for the quarter ending the 30th December, 1795; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

RICHARD POTTS, from Maryland, attended.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, in consequence of the order of the 28d of December last, with a return (marked A) of the exports of the United States, supplemental to that transmitted on the 26th of February, 1795, which completes the returns of exports to the 30th of September, 1794:

A statement (marked B) showing the specific articles imported into the United States in each calendar year, commencing with the establishment of the revenue, and ending on the 30th of December, 1794; and

An abstract (marked C) containing a list of the articles of merchandise enumerated in the laws of the United States, as being subject to ad valorem rates of duty, prior to the year 1795; which papers were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry, and, after agreeing to sundry amendments, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

TUESDAY, January 12.

The bill to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry, was read the third time, and passed.

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

MR. BUTLER, from the committee instructed to that purpose, reported a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose;" which was read and ordered to a second reading.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you an official statement of the expenditure to the end of the year 1795, from the sums heretofore granted to defray the contingent charges of the Government.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 13, 1796.

The Message and statement were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Ordered, That MESSRS. READ, ELLSWORTH, ROSS, STRONG, and LIVERMORE, be a committee to revise the Judiciary system of the United States, and to report what alterations or amendments may be necessary in the same.

THURSDAY, January 14.

WEDNESDAY, January 20.

No business was transacted in the Senate to-day.

THURSDAY, January 21.

Mr. KING attended to-day.

Ordered, That MESSRS. ELLSWORTH, BROWN, and BRADFORD, be a committee to inquire what laws will expire before the next session of Congress, and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. ELLSWORTH reported, from the committee appointed to consider the bill making provision for the purposes of trade with the Indians, that the bill pass without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill lie on the table.

FRIDAY, January 22.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the committee appointed yesterday, to inquire what laws will expire before the next meeting of Congress, reported the following:

The "Act for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to the officers of both Houses;" passed September 22d, 1789.

The "Act declaring the consent of Congress to a certain act of the State of Maryland, and to continue, for a longer time, an act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, so far as the same respects the States of Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations," passed March 10th, 1793.

The "Act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes;" passed March 1, 1793.

The "Act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations; and further to continue in force the act, entitled, 'An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations,'" passed March 20th, 1794.

The "Act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States;" passed May 9th, 1794.

And the "Act to continue in force for a limited time the acts therein mentioned;" passed March 2, 1795.

The provisions of the "Act to regulate the compensation of clerks," extended only to the 31st of December last; passed March 3, 1795.

The report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House had passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, with a statement from the Commissioner of the Revenue, of the exports of the United States, to the 30th of September, 1795, which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, January 26.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six," was read the second time, and referred to MESSRS. RUTHERFORD, ELLSWORTH, and CABOT, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, January 27.

On motion,

"That the proper officer be directed to furnish Senate with an accurate return of the imports and exports into and from the United States, from the period to which the last returns were made, and, in a similar manner, to the latest period to which returns are made by the different districts."

It was agreed that this motion should lie until to-morrow for consideration.

THURSDAY, January 28.

Mr. RUTHERFORD, from the committee appointed to take into consideration the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six," reported amendments, which were in part adopted; and the consideration of that part of the bill which respects the appropriations for the Mint was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, for a return of the exports and imports of the United States, which was amended, by inserting "Secretary of the Treasury," in lieu of "proper officer."

Ordered, That the further consideration of this motion be postponed until Monday next.

benefit of the United States, provided that the reduction should not exceed two pennyweights in each cent, and in the like proportion in a half cent, I have caused the same to be reduced, since the twenty-seventh of last December; to wit, one pennyweight and sixteen grains in each cent, and in the like proportion in a half cent, and I have given notice thereof by proclamation.

By the Letter of the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States held at Boston in June last, and the enclosed application of the under-keeper of the jail at that place—of which copies are herewith transmitted—Congress will perceive the necessity of making a suitable provision for the maintenance of prisoners committed to the jails of the several States, under the authority of the United States.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 29, 1796.

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives :*

I send herewith, for the information of Congress—

1. An Act of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, ratifying an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to prevent suits in certain cases against a State.

2. An Act of the State of North Carolina, making the like ratification.

3. An Act of the State of North Carolina, assenting to the purchase, by the United States, of a sufficient quantity of land on Shell Castle Island, for the purpose of erecting a beacon thereon, and ceding the jurisdiction thereof to the United States.

4. A copy from the journal of proceedings of the Governor, in his Executive Department, of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, from July 1, to December 31, 1794.

5. A copy from the records of the Executive proceedings of the same Governor, from January 1, to July 30, 1795; and

6 and 7. A copy of the journal of the proceedings of the Governor, in his Executive Department, of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, from September 1, 1794, to September 1, 1795.

8. The Acts of the 1st and 2d sessions of the General Assembly of the same Territory.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 29, 1796.

Ordered, That the last recited Messages of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with the papers therein mentioned, be severally referred to Messrs. LIVERMORE, WALTON, and MARSHALL, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. CABOT presented the petition of Jose Roiz Silva, praying that the officers of the revenue for the State of New York may be authorized to refund him two thousand five hundred and twenty-one dollars, overrated duties, on a cargo of Graciosa wines, imported in the brigantine Mary, in June, 1793.

The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, February 1.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six," was read the third time and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 27th of January last, that the Secretary of the Treasury make a return of imports and exports; and, on motion, permission was given to withdraw the motion, for the purpose of substituting the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish, for the use of the Senate, a statement of the imports into the United States, from the 30th of September, 1791, to the latest period to which he may have received returns from the different districts; specifying therein, as particularly as the returns admit of, the articles imported; the cost thereof, and the countries from which they have been imported; together with the tonnage employed in the import trade, and the Kingdoms or States to which the vessels belong."

On motion, it was agreed that this motion should be referred to Messrs. KING, BUTLER, ELLSWORTH, CABOT, and LANGDON, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

TUESDAY, February 2.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary of the Department of War, in reference to the order of Senate of the 22d December last, respecting the expenditures on the expedition against the insurgents in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives :*

I transmit herewith the copy of a Letter, dated the 19th of December last, from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, stating the avowed and daring designs of certain persons to take possession of lands belonging to the Cherokees, and which the United States have, by treaty, solemnly guaranteed to that nation. The injustice of such intrusions, and the mischievous consequences which must necessarily result therefrom, demand that effectual provision be made to prevent them.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 2, 1796.

The Message and Letter were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, February 3.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes," was read the second time; and, after consideration, the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

he House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes;" and, having amended the same, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of John Howell, commander of the revenue cutter of the United States for the port of Savannah, and the coasts of the State aforesaid, which was read, praying that he, and the other commanders of the revenue cutters, may be placed on the full Naval Establishment.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. BUTLER, LANGDON, and WALTON, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

FRIDAY, February 5.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes," was read the third time; and on motion, it was agreed to expunge the 5th section, which is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That six thousand dollars be appropriated, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the purpose of paying the agents and clerks; which agents shall be allowed to draw out of the public supplies two rations each, and each clerk, one ration per day."

On motion, it was agreed to amend the last section, by adding, after the word "years," the words, "and to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter."

On motion, to add, after the word "aforementioned," section 6, these words, "and to defray all salaries, commissions, and charges, attending the same," it passed in the negative.

On motion, to amend the proviso, in the 7th section, by adding, after the word "reside," these words, "or be found," it passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to commit the bill to Messrs. ROSS, KING, and MASON, to consider generally, and report thereon to the Senate.

Ordered, That the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 29th of January, with a copy of a Letter from the Judges of the District Court, held at Boston in June last, together with the application from the under-keeper of the jail there, be referred to the committee appointed to consider the petition of Jeremiah Allen.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, with his account of receipts and expenditures in the War Department, for the quarter ending the 31st of December last.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

MONDAY, February 8.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Jeremiah Allen, Sheriff of the County of Suffolk, in the State of Massachusetts, reported:

"That the petitioner prays for a law to be passed relative to the support of prisoners in jail, committed under the authority of the United States, in order to indemnify the sheriff or keeper of the jail for their cost and expenses in such support. The committee have considered the subject, and examined the laws relative thereto, and are of the opinion that the existing laws are sufficient for the purpose aforesaid; and, therefore, that the memorialist have leave to withdraw his memorial."

And the report was adopted.

TUESDAY, February 9.

Mr. ROSS presented the memorial of Thomas Leiper & Co., and others, manufacturers of Snuff, stating the discouragements they meet with in the prosecution of the business, and praying an entire repeal of the existing excise upon that article; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, February 10.

Ordered, That the memorial of Thomas Leiper & Co., and others, manufacturers of snuff, be referred to Messrs. READ, BLOODWORTH, and LIVERMORE, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

sundry amendments, which were read; and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 11.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled, "An act establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes;" which was in part adopted as follows:

Sec. 3, line 9, strike out "of this act," and insert "aforesaid." Line 10, after the word "shall," insert "upon conviction thereof." Same line, strike out the words, "a sum not exceeding." Line 11, strike out the words "upon conviction thereof." Line 13, after "United States," strike out the remainder of the section.

Make a new section, as follows:

"Sec. 5 And be it further enacted, That offenders against this act may be prosecuted in the Circuit or District Courts of the United States, or in the Supreme or Superior Courts of the Territories of the United States, or in any State Court having jurisdiction over like offences; although the misdemeanor shall not have been committed within the bounds of their district or ordinary jurisdiction. And all forfeitures accruing under this act shall be one half to the use of the informant, and the other half to the use of the United States; except where the prosecution shall be first instituted by a public prosecutor, on behalf of the United States, in which case, the whole shall be to their use."

The bill was amended, agreeably to the above recited report.

On motion, it was agreed to expunge the 7th section of the bill.

On motion, it was agreed to add these words to the end of the new section reported by the committee:

"And it shall be the duty of the superintendents of Indian affairs, and their deputies, respectively, to whom information of every such offence shall be given, to collect the requisite evidence, if attainable, and prosecute the offender without delay."

On motion, to reduce the appropriation, from one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to one hundred thousand dollars, it passed in the negative.

On motion, to substitute the following in lieu of the 4th section:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to apply, of the moneys hereinafter appropriated, such sum as he may judge to be necessary, not exceeding the rate of ten thousand dollars per annum, for the compensation of the agents, and also of their clerks, where he shall authorize the employment of clerks; which agents shall be allowed to draw out of the public supplies two rations, and each clerk one ration per day."

It passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to expunge, from section 3d, these words: "is provided by this act;" and, in lieu thereof, insert, "shall be authorized by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES."

Whereupon, Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

The report was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

On motion,

"That so much of the resolution of the Senate, of the tenth day of February last, as requires the statements therein mentioned to be reported to the Senate, in the month of January, annually, and to be made up to the first day of October next, preceding, be repealed; and that the said statements be reported to the Senate in the month of December, annually, and made up to the first day of October, of the year preceding such reports:"

It was agreed that the motion lie on the table.

The bill authorizing the settlement of the demands of Anthony Walton White against the United States, was read a second time; and, after debate, Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed.

The bill making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows of certain deceased clerks, was read the second time; and, after debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made on the 11th instant, that a committee be appointed on the subject of destroyed certificates. Whereupon,

Ordered, That Mr. KING have permission to introduce a bill, reviving, for a limited time, the act, entitled "An act limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions."

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate deliver to the Chairman of the Committee of the House of Representatives on the subject of Weights and Measures, the Standards transmitted, by order of the Committee of Public Safety of France, to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and, with his Message, transmitted to Congress, during the last session.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, sent from the House of Representatives, for concurrence, entitled "An act for the relief of Jose Roiz Silva."

place, it is incumbent upon the Executive to suspend all orders respecting the building of the frigates, procuring materials for them, or preparing materials already obtained, which may be done without entrenching upon contracts and agreements, made and entered into before this event.

But, inasmuch as the loss which the public would incur might be considerable, from the dissipation of workmen, from certain works or operations being suddenly dropped or left unfinished, and from the derangement in the whole system, consequent upon an immediate suspension of all proceedings under it; I have therefore thought advisable, before taking such a step, to submit the subject to the Senate and the House of Representatives, that such measures may be adopted, in the premises as may best comport with the public interest.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 15, 1796.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the relief of Jose Roiz Silva," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRONG from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain officers and soldiers, who have been wounded or disabled in the actual service of the United States," reported that the bill pass without amendment; whereupon, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The second reading of the bill authorizing the settlement of the demands of Anthony Walton White, against the United States, was resumed; and, on the question to agree to the enacting clause in the bill, it passed in the negative. So the bill was rejected.

On motion, it was agreed that the motion made yesterday, respecting returns from the Department of Treasury, of imports, exports, and tonnage, should be further postponed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee, to whom was referred the letter of the Governor, and the memorial of the Representatives, of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Report from the Secretary for the Department of War, on the case of certain invalid pensioners of the State of Massachusetts; which was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the relief of certain officers and soldiers, who have been wounded or disabled in the actual service of the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows of certain deceased clerks; and, having agreed to an amendment, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Ordered, That the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter of the Governor, and the memorial of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, be further postponed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made the 14th instant, respecting the returns from the Department of Treasury, of imports, exports, and tonnage: whereupon,

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of the Senate, of the tenth day of February last, as requires the statements therein mentioned to be reported to the Senate, in the month of January, annually, and to be made up to the first day of October next preceding, be repealed; and that the said statements be reported to the Senate in the month of December, annually, and made up to the first day of October, of the year preceding such reports.

Ordered, That the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES of the 15th instant, respecting the equipment of the frigates, be referred to Messrs. BINGHAM, READ, and CABOT, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

THURSDAY, March 17.

The bill making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows of certain deceased clerks, was read the third time.

On motion to insert the names of William Lambert and Bernard Webb, it passed in the negative.

On motion to strike out "one hundred dollars," the provision for the widows of deceased clerks, for the purpose of inserting a larger sum, it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That this bill pass; that it be engrossed; and that the title thereof be "An act making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows of certain deceased clerks."

Mr. BINGHAM reported, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 15th instant, respecting the equipment of the frigates. The report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Governor, and the memorial of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, which is as follows:

"That the representatives of the freemen of Kentucky state, in their memorial, that in February, 1795, a pamphlet was published by George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian, (who were two Judges of the Court of Appeals,) in which they say that Humphrey Marshall had a suit in chancery, in the said Court of Appeals, in which it appearing manifest from the oath of the complainant, from disinterested testimony, from records, from documents furnished by himself, and from the contradictions contained in his own answer, that he had committed a gross fraud, the Court gave a decree against him; and that, in the course of the investigation, he was publicly charged with perjury. That Mr. Marshall, in a publication in the Kentucky Gazette, called for a specification of the charge; to which the said George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian, in a like publication, replied, that he was guilty of perjury in his answer to the bill in chancery, exhibited against him by James Wilkinson, and that they would plead justification to any suit brought against them therefor. That no such suit as the said representatives could learn, had been brought. The said Representatives further say, that they do not mean to give an opinion on the justice of the said charge, but request that an investigation may immediately take place relative thereto.

"Your committee observe that the said suit was tried eighteen months before Mr. Marshall was chosen a member of the Senate, and that, previous to his election, mutual accusations had taken place between him and the Judges of the said Court, relating to the same suit.

"The Representatives of Kentucky have not furnished any copy of Mr. Marshall's answer on oath, nor have they stated any part of the testimony, or produced any of the said records or documents, or the copy of any paper, in the cause, nor have they intimated a design to bring forward those or any other proofs.

"Your committee are informed, by the other Senator and two Representatives in Congress, from Kentucky, that they have not been requested by the Legislature of that State to prosecute this inquiry, and that they are not possessed of any evidence in the case, and that they believe no person is authorized to appear in behalf of the Legislature.

"Mr. Marshall is solicitous that a full investigation of the subject should take place in the Senate, and urges the principle that consent takes away error, as applying on this occasion, to give the Senate jurisdiction; but, as no person appears to prosecute, and there is no evidence adduced to the Senate, nor even a specific charge, the committee think any further inquiry by the Senate would be improper. If there were no objections of this sort, the committee would still be of opinion that the memorial could not be sustained. They think that, in a case of this kind, no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that, in all such prosecutions, the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. If, in the present case, the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged, by the memorialists, why he has not long since been tried in the State and district where he committed the offence. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent. And the committee are compelled, by a sense of justice, to declare, that, in their opinion, this presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by the recriminating publications of two men, who take no pains to conceal their personal resentment against him.

"Whatever motives induced the Legislature of Kentucky to call the attention of the Senate to the above mentioned publications, the committee are of opinion that, as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate, the consent of the party cannot give it, and that, therefore, the said memorial ought to be dismissed."

On motion to postpone the consideration of the report until to-morrow, it passed in the negative, and, after debate, on motion to reconsider the question for postponement, it passed in the negative.

On motion to expunge all the words from "if in the present case," inclusive, to the end of the report, a motion was made to amend the part proposed to be struck out by expunging these words: "of two men who take no pains to conceal their personal resentment," and it was agreed that this motion was not in order.

A motion was made to divide the original motion for striking out, and retain the words from "if in the present case," inclusive, to the word, "innocent," at the end of the first paragraph; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 18.

Mr. VINING presented the petition of Charles King and others, citizens of the State of Delaware, praying the establishment of an office to license, register, enter, and clear vessels, more conveniently placed than at Wilmington; which petition was read, and referred to Messrs. VINING, HENRY, and BINGHAM, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Governor, and the memorial of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, together with the motion made thereon, and under debate yesterday; and a motion was made to amend the motion by expunging from the report all that follows the words "the memorial could not be sustained."

And, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Governor, and the memorial of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them; also, the motion made thereon, and under debate yesterday, together with the motion for amendment, by expunging from the report all that follows the words "the memorial could not be sustained;" and a motion was made to postpone the report, and the motions made thereon, and to take into consideration the following resolution:

"Whereas the honorable the Legislature of the State of Kentucky have, by their memorial, transmitted by the Governor of said State, informed the Senate that Humphrey Marshall, a Senator from the said State, had been publicly charged with the crime of perjury, and requested that an inquiry might be thereupon instituted, in which request the said Humphrey Marshall has united; and it being highly interesting, as well to the honor of the said State as to that of the Senate, and an act of justice due to the character of the said Humphrey Marshall that such inquiry should be had: therefore,

"Resolved, That the Senate will proceed to the examination of the said charge on the ——— day of the next session of Congress; that, in the opinion of the Senate, a conviction or acquittal in the ordinary courts of justice of the said State would be the most satisfactory evidence on this occasion; but that if this should not be attainable by reason of any act of limitation or other legal impediment, such other evidence will be received as the nature of the case may admit and require

MONDAY, March 21.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to place certain persons therein named on the pension list;" and a "Resolution directing further returns in the cases of claimants for invalid pensions;" in which bill and resolution they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made on the 19th instant, to postpone the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Governor, and the memorial of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, together with the motions of amendment made thereon, in order to consider the following resolution:

"Whereas the honorable the Legislature of the State of Kentucky have, by their memorial, transmitted by the Governor of the said State, informed the Senate that Humphrey Marshall, a Senator from the said State, had been publicly charged with the crime of perjury, and requested that an inquiry might be thereupon instituted, in which request the said Humphrey Marshall has united; and it being highly interesting, as well to the honor of the said State as to that of the Senate, and an act of justice due to the character of the said Humphrey Marshall that such inquiry should be had: therefore,

"Resolved, That the Vice President be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to the Governor of the said State."

And, on the question for postponement, it passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Langdon, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, Latimer, Livermore, Martin, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

TUESDAY, March 22.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to place certain persons therein named on the pension list," was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution directing further returns in the cases of claimants for invalid pensions, was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force 'An act for ascertaining the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes,'" and a bill, entitled, "An act for the relief of Henry Messonnier;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last mentioned were read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Governor, and the memorial of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them.

On the question to expunge these words: "if there were no objections of this sort, the committee would still be of opinion that the memorial could not be sustained," it passed in the negative.

On the question to expunge the following words:

"They think that in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent:"

It passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the next paragraph, to read as follows:

"And the committee are compelled, by a sense of justice, to declare that, in their opinion, this presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by re-criminating publications, which manifest strong resentment against him."

And on the question to expunge the paragraph, as amended, it passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the last clause of the report to read as follows:

"And they are also of opinion that, as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate, the consent of the party cannot give it; and that, therefore, the said memorial ought to be dismissed."

On motion to expunge the clause last agreed to be amended, it passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Burr, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, Latimer, Livermore, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining."

Mr. BROWN requested and was excused from voting on the question.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the last paragraph but two of the report, beginning with the words, "If in the present case," by inserting the words "by the memorialists," after the word "alleged."

On the question to adopt the report, as amended, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 8, as follows:

Resolved, That the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing report to the Governor of Kentucky.

NAVAL ARMAMENT.

The report of the committee to whom was referred the communication from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, on the subject of the Naval Armament, was read, as follows:

"That it is the opinion of the committee it will be expedient to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be completed, with all convenient expedition, two of the said frigates of forty-four, and one of thirty-six guns.

"That a discretionary power be committed to the President of the United States to cause the others to be finished, having a due regard to the existing price of labor and materials.

"That so much of the sum of six hundred and eighty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight dollars and thirty-two cents, as, by the act of June, 1794, was appropriated to pay the expenses to be incurred by the act to provide a Naval Armament, remains unexpended, as well as so much of the sum of eighty thousand dollars, appropriated for a provisional equipment of galleys, by the before-recited act, be appropriated for carrying into effect the provisions of the aforesaid resolution."

Whereupon, it was ordered, that the committee be instructed to bring in a bill conformable to the report of the committee.

WEDNESDAY, March 23.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the committee instructed to that purpose, reported a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to provide a Naval Armament;" which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The committee to whom was referred the petition of Ebenezer Zane, states—

"That the petitioner sets forth, that he hath, at considerable trouble and expense, explored, and in part opened, a road Northwest of the river Ohio, between Wheeling and Limestone, which, when completed, will greatly contribute to the accommodation of the public, as well as of individuals. But, that several rivers intervening, the road proposed cannot be used with safety, until ferries shall be established thereon. That the petitioner will engage to have such ferries erected, provided he can obtain a right to the land which is now the property of the United States. And therefore prays that he may be authorized to locate, and survey, at his own expense, military bounty warrants, upon as much land at Muskingum, Hockhocking, and Sciota rivers, as may be sufficient to support the necessary establishments; and that the same be granted to him by the United States.

"That they, having received satisfactory information in support of the above statement, are of opinion that the proposed road will be of general utility, that the petitioner merits encouragement, and that his petition being reasonable, ought to be granted.

"The committee therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petition of Ebenezer Zane is reasonable; that he be authorized to locate warrants granted by the United States for military services, upon three tracts of land, not exceeding one mile square each, at Muskingum, Hockhocking, and Sciota, where the proposed road shall cross those rivers, for the purpose of establishing ferries thereon; and that leave be given to bring in a bill for that purpose."

Resolved, That this bill do not pass.

MONDAY, April 11.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

By an act of Congress passed on the 26th of May, 1790, it was declared that the inhabitants of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio should enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages, set forth in the ordinance of Congress for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; and that the government of said Territory South of the Ohio should be similar to that which was then exercised in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio; except so far as was otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress passed the 2nd of April, 1790, entitled "An act to accept a cession of the claims of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of Western territory."

Among the privileges, benefits, and advantages, thus secured to the inhabitants of the Territory South of the river Ohio, appear to be the right of forming a permanent Constitution and State Government, and of admission as a State, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, when it should have therein sixty thousand free inhabitants: Provided the Constitution and Government so to be formed should be Republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in the articles of the said ordinance.

As proofs of the several requisites to entitle the Territory South of the river Ohio to be admitted, as a State, into the Union, Governor Blount has transmitted a return of the enumeration of its inhabitants, and a printed copy of the Constitution and form of government on which they have agreed; which, with his letters accompanying the same, are herewith laid before Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, April 8, 1796.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie until to-morrow for consideration.

Proceedings.

[MAY, 1796.]

CABOT had permission to introduce a bill, providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States; which bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, that Mr. STRONG have permission to introduce a bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the acts therein mentioned.

Mr. BINGHAM reported, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States; which report was in part rejected; and, after debate, the further consideration of the report was postponed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 8th of April last, respecting a new State South of the river Ohio.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to prevent the sale of prizes brought into the United States, by vessels belonging to any foreign Prince or State;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

They recode from their amendment, disagreed to by the Senate, to their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States, in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river."

The bill last brought from the House of Representatives for concurrence was read, and ordered to a second reading.

FRIDAY, May 13.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act authorizing the erection of a light-house on Cape Cod, in the State of Massachusetts," was read the third time and passed.

The bill providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States, was read the second time, and the further consideration thereof postponed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers;" and the report of the committee being adopted, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act relative to quarantine," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act relative to quarantine," was read twice, and referred to Messrs. RUTHERFURD, BINGHAM, and LANGDON, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. POTTS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act, entitled, 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" reported amendments.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States;" and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 8th of April last, respecting a new State South of the river Ohio; together with the motion for amendment on the 11th instant under consideration; and a motion was made to postpone the proposed amendment to the report, in order to introduce a more general one; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 14.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," was read the third time.

On motion to subjoin the following to the end of the third section :

"Provided that the said penalty shall not be inflicted on any person or persons who may have crossed the line in search of stray horses, cattle, or any other stock :"

It passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 13, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Gunn, Henry, Langdon, Martin, Robinson, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, King, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Trumbull.

On motion to expunge from the 2d and 3d lines of the 3d section, the words "South of the river Ohio," it passed in the negative.

On motion to expunge the 3d section, which is as follows :

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, if any such citizen or other person shall go into any country which is allotted or secured by Treaty, as afore-said, to any of the Indian tribes, South of the river Ohio, without a passport first had and obtained, from the Governor of some one of the United States, or the officer of the troops of the United States commanding at the nearest post on the frontiers, or such other person as the President of the United States may, from time to time, authorize to grant the same, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding fifty dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding three months."

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

The question on the bill was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 8, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Henry, King, Langdon, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Gunn, Robinson, Tatnall, and Tazewell.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass.

The bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the acts therein mentioned, was read the second and third times, and passed.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to prevent the sale of the prizes brought into the United States by vessels belonging to any foreign Prince or State," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. READ, BURR, and CABOT, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 8th of April last, respecting a new State South of the river Ohio; together with the motion for amendment made on the 11th; and on the question to agree to the proposed amendment, it passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the report by inserting, after the first paragraph, immediately subsequent to the words "original States," these words :

"On the 9th of July, 1787, the State of South Carolina ceded, without any condition whatever, their claims to all lands lying between the Mississippi and the ridge of mountains which divides the Western from the Eastern waters; the same being South of, and contiguous to, the Territory ceded by North Carolina, and uninhabited except by Indians."

Also, to add, after the words "act of cession," in the second instance, the words "of North Carolina;" and, in the same line, to strike out the word "same," and insert "Territory thereby ceded."

It was further agreed, to expunge the words, "ceded by North Carolina," and insert "South of the Ohio."

On motion to expunge the whole of the report, after the word "district," and to substitute the following :

"In the year 179—, proofs satisfactory to the Governor of the said Territory having been given that there were more than five thousand free male inhabitants in the said last-mentioned Territory, Representatives were chosen, and a Government organized, pursuant to the provision of the said ordinance in such case declared; the Governor and Council being appointed by, and removable at the pleasure of, the President. On the 11th of July, 1795, an act was passed by the Legislature of the said Territory for taking a census of the inhabitants thereof; and it appearing, from the census so taken, that there were more than sixty thousand free inhabitants in the said Territory, the said Governor, on the 28th of November, 1795, issued his Proclamation, as by the said last-mentioned act is prescribed, requiring the said inhabitants to choose persons to represent them in Convention for the purpose of forming a Constitution or permanent form of Government.

"The persons so chosen, met in Convention, on the 11th of January, 1796, declared the people of that part of the said Territory, which was ceded by North Carolina to be a free and independent State, by the name of the State of Tennessee, (a great majority of the said inhabitants having expressed their wish to form together one State,) and for their permanent Government, expressly recognising the aforesaid Ordinance of Congress, formed a Constitution consistent with the principles and articles thereof.

"By the provisions of the Constitution so formed, the Legislature thereby directed to be chosen was required to meet on the last Monday in March then next, for the avowed purpose of obtaining a representation in Congress during the present session. The Legislature met accordingly, and the temporary Government established in the said Territory has ceased and been suspended. Due notice of all the aforesaid acts and proceedings has, from time to time, been given by the Governor of the said Territory to the Government of the United States, and no dissatisfaction thereupon expressed by the latter.

"Upon the preceding state of facts, the committee remark, 1st. That, although Congress have not, by any formal and direct act declared that the Territory South of the Ohio, should, for the purpose of permanent Government, be one State; yet, inasmuch as it doth appear to be the desire of a great majority of the inhabitants thereof, that so much of the said Territory as is contained within the cession of North Carolina should be formed into one State; and, as the Government of the United States hath acquiesced in the proceedings founded on that idea; considering, also, the dissatisfaction and temporary anarchy which would probably be produced by the attempt to dissolve the permanent Government, so formally established, and to divide the said Territory into two or more States, subject to the temporary Government of the United States: it doth appear to the committee to be highly expedient, if not obligatory on the United States, to lay out into one State the whole of the Territory ceded by North Carolina.

"2d. That, although the law directing the said census doth not, so far as regards the enumeration of transient persons, provide the check contained in the act for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; yet, seeing that the said law was passed, and made with the assent of the Governor and Council appointed by, and removable at, the pleasure of the Government of the United States, and executed by officers also appointed by the same authority—seeing that no material error in fact can probably have been made by reason of the supposed inaccuracy of the said law, and that, by the enumeration aforesaid, there doth appear to have been, in the month of November, 1795, upwards of 67,000 free inhabitants, and upwards of 10,000 slaves, in the said Territory, the committee are of opinion that the census so taken, is and ought to be deemed satisfactory evidence that the said Territory doth contain 60,000 free inhabitants.

"The committee therefore recommend the following resolutions :

"Resolved, That the Territory of the United States South of the Ohio, which hath been ceded by North Carolina, be one State, and that the same be and hereby is acknowledged as one of the United States, by the name of the State of Tennessee, and entitled to a representation in Congress, "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever," according to the Constitution of the United States.

"2. Resolved, That, until the next General Census, the State of Tennessee shall be entitled to send — members to the House of Representatives."

And, on the question to agree to this amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 14, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Henry, Langdon, Martin, Robinson, and Tazewell.

MONDAY, May 16.

On motion, the Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States."

On motion, to add at the end of the third section, in lieu of the proviso, the following words :

"And it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, if they shall find the same to be most advantageous, to sell such, and so many, of the shares of the stock of the Bank of the United States, belonging to the United States, as they may think proper ; and that they apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of the said debts, instead of selling certificates of stock, in the manner prescribed in this act."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 13, nays 12, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Henry, Langdon, Marshall, Martin, Robinson, Ross, Rutherford, Tattall, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Gunn, King, Latimer, Livermore, Potts, Read, Strong, and Trumbull.

And the bill being further amended, it was ordered to a third reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 8th of April last, respecting a new State South of the river Ohio ; and sundry other amendments being agreed to, a motion was made to insert, after the word "district," the following :

"In the year 179—, proofs satisfactory to the Governor of the said Territory having been given, that there were more than five thousand free male inhabitants in the said last mentioned Territory, Representatives were chosen, and a Government organized, pursuant to the provision of the said ordinance in such case declared : the Governor and Council being appointed by, and removable at the pleasure of, the President. On the 11th of July, 1795, an act was passed by the Legislature of the said Territory for taking a census of the inhabitants thereof ; and it appearing from the census so taken, that there were more than sixty thousand free inhabitants in the said Territory, the said Governor, on the 28th of November, 1795, issued his proclamation, as by the said last mentioned acts is prescribed, requiring the said inhabitants to choose persons to represent them in Convention, for the purpose of forming a Constitution or permanent form of Government. The persons so chosen, met in Convention, on the 11th of January, 1796, declared the people of that part of the said Territory which was ceded by North Carolina to be a free and independent State, by the name of the State of Tennessee, (a great majority of the said inhabitants having expressed their wish to form together one State,) and, for their permanent Government, expressly recognising the aforesaid ordinance of Congress, formed a Constitution consistent with the principles and articles thereof.

"By the provisions of the Constitution, so formed, the Legislature, thereby directed to be chosen, was required to meet on the last Monday in March then next, for the avowed purpose of obtaining a representation in Congress during the present session. The Legislature met accordingly, and the temporary Government established in the said Territory has ceased and been superseded. Due notice of all the aforesaid acts and proceedings has, from time to time, been given by the Governor of the said Territory to the Government of the United States, and no dissatisfaction thereupon expressed by the latter :"

It passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 15, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Henry, Langdon, Martin, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Gunn, King, Latimer, Livermore, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Tattall, and Trumbull.

And, on the question to agree to the report, as amended, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 11, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Gunn, King, Latimer, Livermore, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Henry, Langdon, Marshall, Martin, Robinson, Tattall, and Tazewell.

So the report was adopted, as follows :

"The report of the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 8th of April, 1796, relative to the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio.

"By the Deed of Cession of the State of Virginia, the United States are bound to lay off the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio into States, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square. And, by the Ordinance of the 13th day of July, 1787, Congress resolved that, so soon as Virginia should, by law, consent to the laying off the said Territory, so as to form three States, that the same should be bounded in the manner therein specified. By the same Ordinance the whole of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio is made one district for the purpose of temporary Government, and it is therein declared that, as soon as any one of the said States, so to be laid out as aforesaid, should contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, the same should be admitted by their Delegates into Congress on an equal footing with the original States.

"On the 9th of July, 1787, the State of South Carolina ceded, without any condition whatever, their claims to all lands lying between the Mississippi and the ridge of mountains which divides the Western from the Eastern waters ; the same being South of, and contiguous to, the Territory ceded by North Carolina, and uninhabited except by Indians.

"By the Deed of Cession of the State of North Carolina, of the lands therein described, it is made a condition that the Territory so ceded shall be laid out, and formed into a State or States, containing a suitable extent of territory; the inhabitants of which shall enjoy all the privileges set forth in the Ordinance for the government of the Western Territory of the United States. By the act for the government of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, the whole of the said Territory, for the purpose of temporary Government, is made one district, and it is declared, that the inhabitants thereof shall enjoy all the privileges set forth in the Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio. As, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, it is necessary that the same shall, by Congress, be laid out into States, according to the conditions of the act of cession, or to the provisions expressed in the Ordinance of Congress, and that such States shall each contain sixty thousand free inhabitants before they are entitled to be admitted into the Union; so, in the Territory South of the Ohio, Congress are obliged, by the act of cession of North Carolina, to lay out the Territory thereby ceded into one or more States, the inhabitants of which, so soon as they shall amount to sixty thousand free persons, will be entitled to be admitted into the Union.

"Congress have declared that the whole of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, shall, for the purpose of temporary Government, compose one district; and, likewise, that the whole of the Territory South of the Ohio shall, for the like purpose, compose one district; but they have not definitely laid out the Territory Northwest of the Ohio into States, nor have they decided whether the Territory South of the Ohio shall be laid out into one or more States. If the district Northwest of the Ohio contained more than sixty thousand free inhabitants, it would not, from thence follow that the District could demand admission as a new State into the Union, because the District must, by the terms of its cession, be previously divided into a number of States, the free inhabitants of each of which must amount to sixty thousand, before such State would have a right of admission into the Union; in like manner, although the District South of the river Ohio should contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, it cannot from thence be inferred, that the District, or that portion thereof, ceded by North Carolina, would have a right to be admitted as a new State into the Union, because Congress have not decided whether the same shall compose a single State, or be laid out into two or more States. The number of inhabitants which establishes a claim of admission must be the number of inhabitants of a State previously laid out, and defined in its boundaries by Congress, and not the number of inhabitants of a Territory which, for the purpose of temporary Government, composes a District which may be divided by Congress into several States.

"Hence results this conclusion;

"That Congress must have previously enacted that the whole of the Territory ceded by North Carolina, and which is only a part of the Territory of the United States South of the Ohio, should be laid out by Congress for one State, before the inhabitants thereof (admitting them to amount to sixty thousand free persons) could claim to be admitted as a new State into the Union.

"Had the Territory South of the Ohio, which, for the purpose of temporary Government, composes one district, been laid out by Congress into one State, the enumeration of the inhabitants, in order to ascertain whether such State was entitled to be received into the Union, ought to have been made under the authority of Congress: For the enumeration of the inhabitants of the original States for the purpose of apportioning the Representatives, and ascertaining a rule for the apportionment of direct taxes, must, by the Constitution, be made by Congress, and cannot be made by the individual States. And as the rights of the original States, as members of the Union, are affected by the admission of new States, the same principle which enjoins the census of their inhabitants to be taken under the authority of Congress, requires the enumeration of the inhabitants of any new State laid out by Congress, in like manner to be made under their authority. Did not the principles of the Constitution seem to leave Congress without discretion on this point? Yet the propriety of the enumeration being made under their authority will be manifest, on comparing the fifth section of the law for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States with the law under which the census has lately been taken in the Territory South of the Ohio. By this comparison it will be perceived that the guards against error, provided in the former law, are omitted in the latter, and that, instead of confining the enumeration to the free inhabitants of the Territory South of the Ohio, the law authorizes and requires the enumeration of all the people within the said Territory at any time within the term allowed to complete the same, including as well the persons casually within or passing through the said Territory, as the inhabitants thereof.

"From the preceding view of the subject, the committee are of opinion that the inhabitants of that part of the Territory South of the Ohio, ceded by North Carolina, are not at this time entitled to be received as a new State into the Union.

"But, as the said Territory ceded by North Carolina may, by Congress, be laid out into one State, although, from the distance between its extreme parts, the inhabitants thereof may thereby be exposed to some inconvenience, and, as it appears to be the desire of a majority of the inhabitants of the said Territory to be received as a new State into the Union, the committee recommend that leave be given to bring in a bill laying out the whole of the said territory ceded by North Carolina into one State, and providing for an enumeration of the inhabitants thereof, in the manner proscribed in the act, entitled 'An act providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States,' passed on the 1st day of March, 1790."

Ordered, That the report be recommitted, and that the committee be instructed to bring in a bill accordingly.

The bill providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States, was read the second time and amended.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,' which was adopted, and the bill amended accordingly.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making an additional allowance to certain public officers for the year 1796," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought from the House of Representatives for concurrence, was read, and ordered to a second reading.

TUESDAY, May 17.

The bill providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States, was read the third time and passed.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making an additional allowance to certain public officers for the year 1796," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. GUNN, BUTLER, BROWN, BURR, and STRONG, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain Debts of the United States," was read the third time.

On motion to expunge the clause, agreed to yesterday in addition to the third section, as follows:

"And it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, if they shall find the same to be most advantageous, to sell such and so many of the shares of the stock of the Bank of the United States, belonging to the United States, as they may think proper; and that they apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of the said Debts, instead of selling certificates of stock, in the manner prescribed in this act."

It passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Gunn, Latimer, Livermore, Strong, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Butler, Henry, Langdon, Marshall, Martin, Potts, Robinson, Rutherford, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

On motion to insert, in the amendment agreed to yesterday, to the third section, after the word "proper," the following words: "so far as may be consistent with existing laws;" it passed in the negative—yeas 12, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Burr, Cabot, Gunn, King, Latimer, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Butler, Foster, Henry, Langdon, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Potts, Robinson, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

On motion to insert, after the word "that," section third, line first, these words: "for two millions of the aforesaid five millions:" it passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to insert, at the end of the amendment to the first section, the following words: "and to sell the stock received for such loan."

On the question to agree to the bill as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Brown, Burr, Henry, Langdon, Latimer, Marshall, Martin, Potts, Robinson, Ross, Rutherford, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

NAVS.—Messrs. Bradford, Butler, Cabot, Foster, Gunn, King, Livermore, Read, Strong, and Trumbull.

So it was resolved that this bill pass as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen;" and a bill, entitled "An act altering the compensation of the Accountant of the War Department;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last mentioned were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion, it was agreed, by unanimous consent to dispense with the rule, and that the bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen," be now read a second time.

Ordered, That this bill be referred to Messrs. Ross, READ, and KING, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties on goods, wares and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" was read the third time, and sundry amendments agreed to.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States;" and, after debate, Ordered, That the bill, together with the amendments, be recommitted; and that Mr. Ross be of the committee in place of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, absent by permission; and the committee are instructed to report generally thereon.

WEDNESDAY, May 18.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the joint committee of conference on the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt;" whereupon,

Resolved, That they concur in the amendments to the bill accordingly.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

The measures now in operation for taking possession of the posts of Detroit and Michilimackinac, render it proper that provision should be made for extending to these places, and any others alike circumstanced, the civil authority of the Northwestern Territory. To do this will require an expense, to defray which the ordinary salaries of the Governor and Secretary of that Territory appear to be incompetent.

The forming of a new county or new counties, and the appointment of the various officers, which the just exercise of Government must require, will oblige the Governor and Secretary to visit those places, and to spend considerable time in making the arrangements necessary for introducing and establishing the Government of the United States. Congress will consider what provision will in this case be proper.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, May, 1796.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill laying out into one State the territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States, and providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants thereof.

On motion to strike out, from the word "inhabitants," section 1st, line 33d, to the end of the bill, and insert as follows:

"And whereas satisfactory evidence has been received that the said State did, on the 11th January, 1796, contain a greater number of free inhabitants than 60,000, and the people thereof did then proceed to form a permanent Constitution and State Government, which in all respects accord with the Articles of the Compact between the United States and the said inhabitants:

"Be it therefore further enacted, That the said State shall be, and the same is hereby, received into the Union as a free and independent State, under the name and title of 'The State of Tennessee,' on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

"And be it further enacted, That, until the next general census, the said State of Tennessee shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, and in all other respects, as far as they may be applicable, the laws of the United States shall extend to, and have force in, the State of

And, after agreeing to sundry amendments, on motion, that the following be an additional section to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That if, on the returns by the Supervisor of the Revenue for the District of Tennessee, as directed by this act, it shall appear to the President of the United States that the territory by this act laid out, and formed into a State, doth contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, that then it shall be lawful for the President, by his Proclamation, to declare the same; and that, in that event, and on their forming a Constitution consistent with the ordinance of Congress of the thirteenth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, the said State, by the name and style of 'The State of Tennessee,' shall be received and admitted into the Union as a new and entire member of the United States of America. And, until an enumeration shall be made, under the authority of Congress, for the purpose of apportioning Representatives, the said State of Tennessee shall be entitled to choose one Representative."

A motion was made to amend this motion, by striking out the following words:

"And on their forming a Constitution consistent with the ordinance of Congress of the thirteenth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven:"

It passed in the negative—yeas 11, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Henry, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Robinson, Tattall, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Foster, Gunn, Latimer, Marshall, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Trumbull.

And, on the question to agree to the motion without amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burr, Foster, Gunn, Henry, Latimer, Livermore, Martin, Potts, Tattall, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bloodworth, Bradford, Brown, Langdon, Marshall, Read, Robinson, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Tazewell.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the joint committee of conference on the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain Debts of the United States," made a report; which was adopted; and it was agreed to amend the bill accordingly.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen;" which report, being amended, was adopted; and the bill was amended accordingly.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for satisfying the claim of the executors of the late Frederick William de Steuben;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Sears;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read twice, and referred to Messrs. BRADFORD, PORTS, and STRONG, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

The extraordinary expenses, to be incurred in the present year in support of our foreign intercourse, I find will require a provision beyond the ordinary appropriation, and the additional twenty thousand dollars lately granted.

I have directed an estimate to be made, which is sent herewith, and will exhibit the deficiency, for which an appropriation appears to be necessary.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, May 28, 1796.

The Message and estimate were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the report of the joint committee of conference on the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain Debts of the United States." They have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES to cause to be located one mile square of land at or near the mouth of the Great Miami river, reserved out of the grant to John Cleves Symmes, and for other purposes;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday in respect to an adjournment.

On motion to expunge "Wednesday," and insert "Tuesday," it passed in the negative. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT of the Senate and SPEAKER of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Wednesday, the first day of June next.

Ordered, That the Secretary desire the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

The bill last brought from the House of Representatives for concurrence was read twice, and referred to Messrs. BURR, BROWN, and PORTS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for satisfying the claim of the executors of the late Frederick William de Steuben," was read twice, and referred to the committee last mentioned, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to suspend, in part, the act, entitled 'An act to alter and amend the act, entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,'" was read the third time.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the bill agreeably to the report of the committee made yesterday, and then rejected.

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States," reported amendments; which were read and adopted; and the bill was read the third time and passed.

MONDAY, May 30.

The memorial of William Somarsall and son, and John Rice, merchants, of Charleston, South Carolina, was presented and read, stating certain spoliations to have been made on their property by a privateer from the Island of Bermuda, and praying the interposition of Congress.

Ordered, That the memorial and documents therein mentioned be referred to the Secretary of the Department of State.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BROWN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation to satisfy certain demands attending the late insurrection, and to increase the compensation to marshals, jurors, and witnesses, in the Courts of the United States, and to allow a further compensation to the Attorney for the District of Kentucky," reported that the bill pass without amendment.

On motion, sundry amendments to the bill were adopted; it was then read the third time and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, sent from the Senate for concurrence, entitled "An act laying out into one State the territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States, and providing for an enumeration of the inhabitants thereof," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They agree to the resolution of the Senate to adjourn on Wednesday, the first day of June next. The House of Representatives disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to suspend, in part, the act, entitled 'An act to alter and amend the act, entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,'".

Mr. BINGHAM, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act limiting the time for the allowance of drawback on the exporttation of domestic distilled spirits, and allowing a drawback upon such spirits exported in vessels of less than thirty tons, by the Mississippi," reported that the bill pass without amendment.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to suspend, in part, the act, entitled 'An act to alter and amend the act, entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,'" and,

Resolved, That the Senate insist on their amendments, and ask a conference thereon, and that Messrs. BINGHAM and STRONG be managers at the same on their part.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the proposed conference on the bill, entitled "An act to suspend, in part, the act, entitled 'An act to alter and amend the act, entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,'" and have appointed managers at the same on their part.

Mr. READ, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the sale of prizes brought into the United States, by vessels belonging to any foreign Prince or State," reported that the bill do not pass.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the bill, and that it pass to the third reading as amended.

Mr. BURK, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES to cause to be located one mile square of land, at or near the mouth of the Great Miami river, reserved out of the grant to John Cleves Symmes, and for other purposes;" and the bill entitled "An act for satisfying the claim of the executors of the late Frederick William de Steuben," reported that they do not pass.

On the question, that these bills severally pass to the third reading, it was determined in the negative. So the bills were lost.

Mr. BRADFORD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Sears," reported that the bill do not pass.

On the question, to agree to the third reading of this bill, it was determined in the negative.

So it was resolved that this bill do not pass.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a "resolution appointing a committee, jointly, with such as the Senate may appoint, to notify the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES of the proposed recess of Congress."

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution last sent from the House of Representatives, in relation to the proposed recess.

Resolved, That the Senate concur therein, and that Messrs. HENRY and BUTLER be the committee on their part.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill entitled "An act laying out into one State the territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States, and providing for an enumeration of the inhabitants thereof."

Resolved, That they disagree to the first, and agree to all the other amendments to the said bill.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the joint committee of conference on the bill, entitled "An act to suspend, in part, the act entitled 'An act to alter and amend the act entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,'" reported that the Senate recede from their amendments, and the report was adopted.

Mr. BROWN, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Directors and Agents of the Ohio Company, reported—

"That so much of the said memorial as prays that regulations may be adopted by Congress, whereby the avails of certain lots reserved by contract for the sale of certain lands to said Company, for the support of schools, and for religious purposes; also, of two complete townships reserved for the endowment of an university, may be brought into speedy operation, and the benevolent intentions of the Government thereby more fully answered, is reasonable. But the committee are of opinion that it is expedient that the further consideration thereof be postponed to the next session of Congress, when some general regulations on this subject may be made.

"That in the opinion of the committee, so much of the said memorial as prays to be allowed to take from the lots reserved out of the grants to said Company, for the future disposition of Congress, twenty lots, of one mile square each, as an allowance for an equal number of lots appropriated by the said directors and agents, for the support of schools and religious purposes, and not provided for in said contract; also, so much thereof as solicits the right of pre-emption to the whole of the reserved lots within the tracts granted to the said Company, be rejected."

Ordered, That this report lie on the table.

Mr. ROSS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to empower the Secretary of the Treasury to lease the Salt Springs reserved for the United States in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio," reported that the bill no not pass.

On the question, that this bill pass to the third reading, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. ROSS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act providing relief to the owners of mills within the United States, for a limited time, in certain cases," reported amendments, which were adopted. And, by unanimous consent, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, that Mr. RUTHERFORD have permission to introduce a bill to amend "An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States," and that it be now read the first and second times.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading. And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 31.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter the time of the next annual meeting of Congress," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They insist on their amendment, disagreed to by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act laying out into one State the territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States, and providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants thereof;" ask a conference thereon, and have appointed managers at the same, on their part. They agree to all the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of United Brethren, for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen;" except to the last, to which they disagree.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to prevent the sale of prizes brought into the United States by vessels belonging to any foreign Prince or State," was read the third time.

On motion, to expunge the proviso agreed to yesterday, as an amendment, it passed in the negative.

So it was Resolved, that this bill pass with an amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren, for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen;" and

Resolved, That they do insist on their said amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, desiring a conference on the bill, entitled "An act laying out into one State the territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States, and providing for an enumeration of the inhabitants thereof."

On motion, to postpone the further consideration thereof until the next session of Congress, it passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Foster, Latimer, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Gunn, Henry, Langdon, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Robinson, Tattnell, and Tazewell.

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the proposed conference, and that Messrs. BURR and STRONG be managers at the same on their part.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military and Naval Establishments for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to alter the time of the next annual meeting of Congress," was read and ordered to a second reading.

The bill to amend "An act for the more general promulgation of the Laws of the United States," was read the third time and passed.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military and Naval Establishments for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six," was read twice and referred to Messrs. Potts, Brown, and Strong, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. RUTHERFORD reported from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act directing certain experiments to be made to ascertain uniform standards of Weights and Measures for the United States."

Ordered, That the report be printed for the use of the Senate, and that the consideration of this bill be referred to the next session of Congress.

Mr. BURR, from the joint committee of conference on the bill, entitled "An act laying out into one State the territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States, and providing for an enumeration of the inhabitants thereof," reported, as the opinion of the majority of the joint committee, that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the said amendment.

A motion was made by Mr. BURR, as follows :

"Resolved, That any enumeration of the inhabitants of any district under the temporary Government of the United States, for the purpose of, furnishing evidence to Congress that such district contains the number which may entitle it to admission into the Union, shall have been taken and made, under a law to be made by the Legislature of the said district, of the free inhabitants only, and, in all other respects, pursuant to the provisions contained in the act, entitled 'An act providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States.'"

Which motion was read, and ordered to lie until to-morrow for consideration.

Mr. TAZEWELL reported from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene, for a certain bond entered into by him during the late war;" which report was read, as follows :

"The committee to whom the bill to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Greene, for a certain bond entered into by him during the late war, was committed, submit the following report to the Senate :

"It appears to the committee that, some time in the fall of the year 1782, the Department of War authorized General Greene to contract for the clothing of the army then under his command. That, sometime in November or December, of the same year, he did contract with John Banks, a member of the house of Hunter, Banks, and Co., who acted for that house, to furnish the necessary supplies of clothing for the army. That John Banks, after entering into the contract, procured upon credit, of certain British merchants then in Charleston, the necessary articles of clothing. That General Greene, at the time he made this contract, paid down to the said Banks the sum of eleven hundred guineas, and drew bills in his favor on the Superintendent of Finance, for the residue of the money necessary to complete the contract. That, about the same time, General Greene received authority to contract for the necessary supplies of provision for the army, which he found considerable difficulty in accomplishing. That, after exhausting the time which admitted of delay in making this latter contract, he entered into an agreement with the same John Banks, as a member of the house of Hunter, Banks, and Co., for the provision supplies of the army, sometime in the month of February, 1783. That, about this time, the creditors of Banks, as he had disappointed and deceived them in his promised payments, became pressing in their demands, and threatened, upon his refusal either to pay them or secure their debts, the use of means that might have disabled him from fulfilling his provision contract. That General Greene, in order to prevent the inconvenience which the loss of the provision contract would occasion to the army, and to leave Banks at liberty to pursue it, by satisfying his creditors, on the 8th of April, 1783, agreed to become his security, and, accordingly executed bonds with the said Banks to his creditors, for the amount of their debts; one of which bonds is the debt that gave rise to the present bill. That, in order to indemnify himself, he compelled Banks, at the same time, to give orders on Charles Pettit, his (Banks's) agent in Philadelphia, for the full amount of the debts for which he had become bound, to be paid out of the public money that would become due to Banks in virtue of his contracts. That these orders would have been productive enough to satisfy all the debts, if Banks had not continued to divert the funds to other purposes. That, after the death of General Greene and of Banks, Harris and Blackford instituted a suit against the executors of General Greene, and have obtained a judgment for the sum stated in the bill. No satisfactory evidence has been offered to the committee to prove that Hunter, Banks, and Co., are insolvent; but, on the other hand, there is reason to believe that some, at least, of that company are fully able to pay the debt due to Harris and Blackford, from the public notification of one of the company, in the newspapers of Virginia, requiring the creditors of Hunter, Banks, and Co., to come in and settle their claims and receive payment. Nor does it appear that the executors of General Greene have ever attempted, at law, to recover the debt in question of Hunter, Banks, and Co. Some of the papers submitted to the committee intimate that General Greene was a member of the house of Hunter, Banks, and Co., in this transaction; and it appears that General Greene gave no notice of his suretyship to the Government until several years after, nor until he was called upon to pay the bond: but the committee have not discovered any satisfactory evidence that General Greene was a partner with Hunter, Banks, and Co. If Hunter, Banks, and Co., were actually insolvent, and if General Greene was not a partner in the house of Hunter, Banks, and Co., in this transaction, the committee would not hesitate in believing that the United States ought to indemnify General Greene's estate against the effects of this suretyship; since they do not discover any other motive which could have governed him, in becoming security for Banks, but that of essentially promoting the public service.

"The committee further observe, that they have not had time fully to investigate all the facts in this case; and being desirous that justice should be finally done, they submit to the Senate the propriety of referring the consideration of this subject to the second Monday of next session of Congress."

Proceedings.

[JUNE, 1796.]

And, after debate, the consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the committee appointed this day on the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military and Naval Establishments for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six."

WEDNESDAY, June 1.

Mr. POTTS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military and Naval Establishments for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six," reported amendments; which were read and adopted. The bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. POTTS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six," reported that the bill pass. And, by unanimous consent, the bill was read the third time and passed.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to alter the time of the next annual meeting of Congress," was read and referred to Messrs. POTTS, GUNN, and BUTLER, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. POTTS reported, from the committee, that the bill do not pass, and the report was adopted.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes, during the ensuing recess of Congress;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The consideration of the motion, made yesterday, for regulating the enumeration of the inhabitants of any district, under the temporary Government of the United States, was resumed. On motion, Ordered, That it be postponed.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes, during the ensuing recess of Congress," was read twice, and referred to Messrs. BINGHAM, BUTLER, and POTTS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to indemnify the estate of the late Major General Nathaniel Greene for a certain bond entered into by him during the late war;" and, it being amended, it was agreed by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that this bill be now read the third time.

On motion, to add the following proviso to the bill:

"Provided also, That if, at any time hereafter, it shall appear that the said General Greene was interested in this transaction, as a member of the house of Hunter, Banks, and Company, either directly or indirectly, the estate of the said General Greene shall be liable to reimburse the United States the money, with interest, hereby directed to be advanced to his executors."

It passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the bill, by adding these words, after the word "bond," "not exceeding the aforesaid sum of eleven thousand two hundred and ninety-seven pounds eight shillings and eight pence, with interest from the 31st of December last."

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES of the 25th of May last, be referred to Messrs. ROSS, RUTHERFORD, and BROWN, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes, during the ensuing recess of Congress," reported, that the bill pass without amendment. And it was agreed, by unanimous consent to dispense with the rule, and that it be now read the second time.

On motion, to agree, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that this bill be now read the third time, it passed in the negative—yeas 14, nays 5. The consent not being unanimous. The yeas and nays being required by one-fifth of the Senators present, those who voted in the affirmative, are:

Messrs. Bingham, Bloodworth, Bradford, Foster, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Trumbull.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Brown, Burr, Butler, Langdon, and Tazewell.

Wednesday Evening—5 o'clock.

On motion, that it be

"Resolved, That the sum of one hundred dollars each be allowed to the principal and engrossing clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, to be paid by the Secretary out of the money appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Senate."

The motion was objected to, as not in order, and so determined by the PRESIDENT; and, on an appeal to the Senate, the determination was overruled. Whereupon, the question being taken on the original motion, it passed in the negative.

On motion, by Mr. MARTIN, that it be

"Resolved, That the honorable William Blount, and William Cocke, Esquires, who have produced credentials of being duly elected Senators for the State of Tennessee, be admitted to take the oath necessary for their qualification, and their seats accordingly."

JUNE, 1796.]

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

Ordered, That a paper, purporting to be the credentials of Mr. Blount and Mr. Cocke, be read.

And, on the question to agree to the resolution, it passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Gunn, Langdon, Martin, Robinson, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Foster, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, and Trumbull.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. BUTLER, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that, unless he had any further communications to make to them, they were ready to adjourn, reported, that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES had no further communication to make, except the nomination of certain persons to execute the laws passed the present session.

After the consideration of the Executive business, the PRESIDENT adjourned the Senate to the first Monday in December next.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,

And a quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number being present,

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a SPEAKER; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of JONATHAN DAYTON, one of the Representatives for the State of New Jersey: Whereupon:

The said JONATHAN DAYTON was conducted to the Chair, from whence he made his acknowledgments to the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: It is with real diffidence that I undertake the execution of the duties which you have done me the honor to assign to me.

In discharging them to the best of my abilities, I anticipate, on your part, a liberal and indulgent temper towards those decisions which may be required from the Chair, and flatter myself that I shall experience, upon all occasions, your co-operation and support.

The House proceeded, in the same manner, to the appointment of a Clerk; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of JOHN BECKLEY.

The oath to support the Constitution of the United States, as prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths," was then administered by ISAAC SMITH, one of the Representatives from the State of New Jersey, to the SPEAKER, and then by Mr. SPEAKER to all the members present.

The same oath, together with the oath of office prescribed by the said recited act, were also administered by Mr. SPEAKER to the Clerk.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that a quorum of members of that body is assembled, and the VICE PRESIDENT being absent, they have proceeded to the choice of a PRESIDENT pro tempore, and that HENRY TAZEWELL has been duly elected.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of this House is assembled, and have elected JONATHAN DAYTON their SPEAKER; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the message.

Another message from the Senate was received, informing this House that they have appointed a committee on their part, to act jointly with such committee as may be appointed by this House, to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may think proper to make to them.

Ordered, That Mr. MADISON, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. SITGREAVES, be appointed a committee on the part of this House, for the purpose expressed in the message of the Senate.

Petitions from sundry persons, praying to be appointed to the offices of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, were presented to the House and read: Whereupon,

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Assistant Doorkeeper; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of JOSEPH WHEATON, as Sergeant-at-Arms, THOMAS CLAXTON, as Doorkeeper, and THOMAS DUNN, as Assistant Doorkeeper.

Ordered, That the said JOSEPH WHEATON, THOMAS CLAXTON, and THOMAS DUNN, do severally give their attendance accordingly.

Mr. MADISON, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may think proper to make to them, reported that the committee had, according to order, performed that service, and that the PRESIDENT signified to them that he would make a communication to both Houses of Congress to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, in the Representatives' Chamber.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report such Standing Rules and Orders of proceeding as are proper to be observed in the House; and that Mr. MÜHLENBERG, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. BALDWIN, be the said committee.

Resolved, That the Rules and Orders of proceeding, established by the late House of Representatives, shall be deemed and taken to be the Rules and Orders of proceeding to be observed in this House, until a revision or alteration of the same shall take place.

Resolved, That a Standing Committee of Elections be appointed, whose duty it shall be to examine and report upon the certificates of election or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House; and to take into their consideration all such matters as shall or may come in question touching returns and elections, and to report their proceedings, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. VENABLE, Mr. DENT, Mr. KITTERA, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. HANPER, and Mr. BLOUNT.

TUESDAY, December 8.

Several other members, to wit: from Maryland, SAMUEL SMITH; from Virginia, RICHARD BRENT; and from Georgia, JOHN MILLEDGE, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House; the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being first administered to them by Mr. SPEAKER, according to law.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House is now ready to attend them in receiving the communication from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, agreeably to his notification to both Houses yesterday; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

The Clerk accordingly went with the said message; and, being returned,

The Senate attended and took seats in the House; when, both Houses being assembled, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES came into the Representatives' Chamber, and delivered his Speech to the two Houses. [For a copy of this Speech, see the Proceedings of the Senate, ante page 10.]

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES then withdrew, and the two Houses separated.

Ordered, That the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A petition of Matthew Lyon, of the State of Vermont, was presented to the House and read, complaining of an undue election and return of ISRAEL SMITH, to serve as a member of this House for the said State.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee on Elections; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with three newspapers, printed in this city, such as the members, respectively, shall choose, to be delivered at their lodgings: Provided, They do not exceed the price at which subscribers, citizens of Philadelphia, are furnished with them.

WEDNESDAY, December 9.

JAMES HILLHOUSE, from Connecticut, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress, Mr. MÜHLENBERG in the Chair; when, the Speech being read,

Mr. VANS MURRAY moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that a respectful Address ought to be presented by the House of Representatives to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of this session, containing assurances that this House will take into consideration the various and important matters recommended to their attention."

Mr. SEDGWICK seconded the motion.

Committee of Claims.

[H. OF R

Mr. PARKER offered an amendment, which was seconded by Mr. MACON.

The substance of this amendment was, to strike out all that part of the resolution which goes before the word assurances; in place of which, Mr. PARKER proposed to appoint a committee, who should personally wait on the PRESIDENT, and assure him of the attention of the House, &c., and concluding as above. Mr. P. had the highest respect for the PRESIDENT, but he had always disapproved of this practice of making out Addresses in answer to these Speeches, and of the House leaving their business to go in a body to present them. Last session, the framing of this Address had cost very long debates, and produced very great irritation. Some of the most disagreeable things that happened during the session occurred in these debates. He wished unanimity and despatch of business, and so, could not consent that any Address should be drawn up, as he preferred ending the affair at once by sending a committee with a verbal answer.

Mr. MURRAY replied, that the practice of drawing up such an Address was coeval with the Constitution. It was consistent with good sense; and he did not see that any arguments had been employed by the gentleman who spoke last against it. It was true that the House might send a verbal answer, and it was likewise true that the PRESIDENT might have sent them his Speech by his Secretary, without coming near them at all. He had come to Congress, and Mr. M. could perceive no impropriety in Congress returning the compliment by waiting on him.

The Committee divided on the amendment proposed by Mr. PARKER. Eighteen members rose in support of it: so it was lost. The Committee then agreed to the resolution as offered by Mr. MURRAY. They rose, and the Chairman reported progress. The resolution was agreed to by the House. The next question was, of how many members the select committee should consist that were to be employed in framing a draft of the Address. The different numbers of five and three were proposed. A division took place on the former motion, when only thirty-one gentlemen rose in its favor. The motion for a committee of three members to report an Address was of course carried. Mr. MADISON, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. SINGREAVES, were appointed.

It was then moved that two Chaplains should be named, as usual; which was agreed to.

A motion was next made for referring the PRESIDENT'S Speech to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. An explanation as to a point of order here took place between Mr. MUEHLBERG and Mr. SEDGWICK. The result was, that the Speech was referred to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

On account of some casual conversation, the SPEAKER then read a rule of the House, which is:

"That the unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the time of the last adjournment shall have the preference in the orders of the day; and no motion on any other business shall be received, without special leave of the House, until the former is disposed of."

A committee of three members was appointed to report the unfinished business of last session; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 10.

FRANCIS PRESTON, from Virginia, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

COMMITTEE OF CLAIMS.

It was proposed and agreed to appoint a Committee of Claims. Seven members were named. Mr. TRACY, Chairman of the same committee in last Congress, was also first named this day. He rose, and observed, that he had been extremely hard employed last year, and had undergone much trouble about this business of claims. He would therefore, if agreeable to the House, be very glad of being left out of the nomination; and for that reason he objected to the motion.

Mr. SEDGWICK wished the member to continue his services. These claims were now drawing to a conclusion. The task would not probably be so arduous as it had been. He thought that the House could not excuse Mr. TRACY, from his known abilities.

Mr. GILES said, that Mr. TRACY was, perhaps, better qualified than any other member in the House for expediting that business. He had been at much trouble about it, for which the House were obliged to him. It was something of a systematic nature, and new members would not be able to go on it with the same degree of information and experience.

The SPEAKER (Mr. DAYTON) remarked, that he had under the latter idea named the same gentlemen at this time as those who were in the last committee—only two members were not here, viz: Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. MEBANE, in the room of whom he had named Mr. HEISTER and Mr. MACON.

Mr. HEATH, a member both of the old and new Committees of Claims, observed that he would very willingly be excused, if the sense of the House were in that way. At the same time, he came to Congress to do his duty and the business of his constituents, and if the House entertained an opinion that he ought to undertake the same office a second time, he had nothing to urge against it.

The House divided on the question, whether Mr. TRACY should be a member of the Committee of Claims. It passed in the affirmative.

Mr. CHRISTIE, another member of the old and new committees, then rose, and observed that, notwithstanding the negative passed on the proposal of Mr. TRACY, he should trouble the House with an application of the same nature upon his own account. The state of his health required that he should ride every morning, and the time necessary for despatching the business of the Committee of Claims put it out of his power to take the requisite exercise. On that account alone he begged the indulgence of the House.

Contested Election—President's Speech—Rules of the House.

[DECEMBER, 1795.]

Mr. TRACY attested that Mr. CHRISTIE had exerted himself very considerably to accelerate the business of the claims. He knew that the gentleman had suffered much in his health by that means. He should be very sorry to lose him as an assistant, for he had attended almost constantly last winter to the business. Sometimes want of health had indeed compelled him to be absent.

The House agreed to the request of Mr. CHRISTIE.

The Committee of Claims, therefore, consists of Mr. TRACY, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. D. FOSTER, Mr. HEATH, Mr. MACON, Mr. HEISTER, and Mr. DUVAL.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the election of the Right Rev. Bishop WHITE as Chaplain on its part.

Mr. W. SMITH presented a petition for Edmund Hogan, requesting to be admitted as Stenographer to the House. Mr. SMITH also moved that a committee should be appointed to receive proposals on that subject. Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. GILES, and Mr. SWIFT, were appointed a committee to this effect.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SITGREAVES presented a petition for John Richards, of the county of Montgomery, claiming a seat in the House. He had, as he alleged, been legally elected, but James Morris, who is since dead, had obtained the return as member. Mr. S. moved that the petition be referred to the Committee on Elections. The motion was agreed to.

Also a petition of Burwell Bassett, of the State of Virginia, complaining of an undue election and return of John Clopton, to serve as a member of this House, for the said State. Referred to the Committee of Elections.

After the reception of several petitions of a private nature, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MUELLENBERG in the Chair.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Mr. W. SMITH presented a set of resolutions, in substance as follows:

"Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, that more effectual provision ought to be made for organizing, disciplining, and arming, the Militia of the United States.

"Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, that further provision ought to be made for the security of the frontiers, and for protecting the Indians against certain lawless inhabitants of the frontier.

"Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, that provision should be made for supplying the necessities of the Indians in times of peace.

"Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, that inquiry ought to be made whether further means should be provided to reinforce the provisions heretofore made for the extinction of the Public Debt.

"Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, that an inquiry ought to be made into the state of the Mint, and whether any further provisions are necessary in that department.

Mr. GILES thought it better to let these resolutions lie on the table for this day. He thought some of the resolutions required evidence before the House proceeded on them.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that the resolution for organizing the militia did not require evidence.

Mr. SWANWICK moved an additional resolution, which was for inquiring into the present situation of the American Navy. It was a point on which he felt himself extremely interested.

Mr. BALDWIN made some remarks, wherein he alluded to the awkward outset of the House last session. They had been for three weeks before they could get at the papers laid on the table before them. He did not wish to see the House in the same situation, or to make such a beginning again.

Mr. GOODHUE saw no use for hastening the resolutions on the Committee just now.

The Committee rose. The CHAIRMAN reported that they had made some progress, but had come to no resolution.

Mr. SWANWICK then moved that the resolutions read in the Committee on the state of the Union should be printed. He said that it was difficult for members to form an opinion upon them, without they had an opportunity of reading them.

The SPEAKER observed, that as they were only read in the Committee, and not regularly before the House itself, to print them would be against order.

Mr. W. SMITH did not see the necessity for this rule.

Mr. MACON objected to taking up the resolutions at all. He supposed them to be bottomed on the PRESIDENT'S Speech, on which there is an order for a Committee of the Whole House. It would thence be improper to proceed with them till the Speech itself had been discussed.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was of opinion that there was no occasion for being in such a hurry with printing the resolutions.

The SPEAKER repeatedly observed that this whole conversation was irregular and improper, because there was in reality no question before the House. He informed them that there was now a motion to adjourn. This was made by Mr. SMITH. Mr. SEDGWICK wanted him to withdraw it. He refused; and the House, at half after twelve o'clock, adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 11.

Several other members, to wit: from Vermont, DANIEL BUCK; from New Jersey, THOMAS HENDERSON; from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM FINDLEY; and from Virginia, JOHN NICHOLAS—appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

After the reception and reference of several petitions—

Mr. MUELLENBERG made a report from the committee named to draw up Standing Rules and Orders for the House. He observed that they differed in some respects from those of last Congress. He moved that they should be printed, with the new variations separately marked, for the consideration of members, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House. This was agreed to, and, on another motion, Monday was appointed for taking them up.

CHAPLAIN TO THE HOUSE.

It was next moved and resolved to proceed to the choice of a chaplain. The SPEAKER directed the House to prepare their ballots. Mr. HILLHOUSE said that it would first be proper to make, as on former occasions, a nomination. The House consented, and Mr. HILLHOUSE named Dr. Ashbel Green. The SPEAKER then reminded the House that any other gentleman was at liberty to make what other nomination he should think fit. Mr. GILES and Mr. W. SMITH were appointed tellers. Sixty-three were in favor of Dr. Green, besides seven scattering votes. He was declared duly elected.

After transacting some other ordinary business, the House adjourned to Monday next, at 11 o'clock.

MONDAY, December 14.

Two other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, THOMAS HARTLEY, and from Virginia, ANTHONY NEW, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee appointed to examine the Journal of the last session, and to report therefrom such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined; and also to examine and report such laws of the United States as have expired, or will expire before the next session, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Standing Committee of Elections, reported, that the committee had, in part, examined the certificates and other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and had agreed to a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six: also, statements of the application of certain sums of money granted by law; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying sundry statements and reports relative to the present military force of the United States; to the measures which have been pursued to obtain proper sites for arsenals; to the measures which have been taken to replenish the magazines and military stores; to the measures which have been taken for opening a trade with the Indians; and to the progress made in providing materials for the frigates, and in building them; which were read, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

THE MINT.

A letter, enclosing some papers, was received from Mr. TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State. This communication regarded the Mint. It was moved to be referred to the Committee on the state of the Union.

Mr. HILLHOUSE wished to know what it was about. The Clerk read the letter to the PRESIDENT, from Mr. WILLIAM HENRY DE SAUSSURE, late Director of the Mint, which stated it will, if properly supplied with bullion, be able to make a million and an half of dollars, in silver, and an equal value of bullion, in the course of a year, with as much copper as shall be necessary for circulation. The price of copper has risen, and from causes that are expected to be permanent. He therefore hinted that it might perhaps be proper to reduce the weight of the cent, to prevent its being melted down. The second paper read was a memorial from Mr. ELIAS BOUDINOT, present Director of the Mint, dated 3d of December current. He stated various circumstances, from which the operation of coinage is, at present, in a state of suspense. The papers were referred to the Committee on the state of the Union, and, on motion by Mr. BOURNE, were ordered to be printed.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MADISON, from the select committee appointed to draft an Address in answer to the Speech of the PRESIDENT, made a report, which was read by the Clerk.

Mr. GILES moved that the usual number of copies of the Address should be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. SEDGWICK objected, but with some degree of hesitation, because he could not distinctly charge his memory as to the accuracy of the circumstance which he was going to relate. It ran in his memory, that, on some former occasion, similar to the present, a printer got hold of one of these Addresses, printed for the use of members. He had published it, and some improper consequences ensued, but of which Mr. SEDGWICK had not a distinct recollection. He was rather averse to printing the draft of the Address, though he was not disposed to give the proposal a direct negative.

Mr. GILES considered the printing of such drafts as having been a common practice.

Mr. PARKER said, that if the Address was to be considered as the work of the House, it would be improper to print it, because their only business then was to wait upon the PRESIDENT with it. But as it was only the production of a select committee, it should be printed, that the members might read it, before they adopted it as their own. With every proper feeling of respect for the gentlemen of that committee, he could not give up his own opinion. He hoped that the draft would be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and when once corrected, and given in to the PRESIDENT, then let it be published as coming from the House. No member, from only hearing it read by the Clerk, would be able to tell whether or not he approved entirely of its contents, so that it was requisite to print it, before the House could be sure that they understood it.

Mr. GILES wished to learn, from the Clerk of the House, what the practice of the House hitherto had been.

It appeared that the usual practice was to print, but that it was sometimes departed from.

Mr. W. SMITH said that it was wrong to divulge to the public the particular sentiments of the gentlemen who drew up the sketch of the Address. It was unfinished, and as such, if printed for the use of the members, it might be printed in the newspapers, a natural or probable effect.

Mr. SWANWICK recommended the printing.

Mr. PARKER, in reply to Mr. W. SMITH, hoped that nothing would ever be done in the House tending to infringe the freedom of the press. The public are entitled to know the sentiments of the Committee individually, as well as of the House collectively.

Mr. TRACY said that the draft of the Address had indeed been last year printed for the use of members. But it had been agreed, without one dissenting voice, that to print it in the newspapers would not be right. Nay, when he himself, had in the House expressed apprehensions on that head, a printer of one of the papers had taken him up in a reply, and assured him that the printers of Philadelphia had too much value for the time of their readers, to publish any paper which they knew to be incomplete, and on the point of being perfected. As to the liberty of the press, which the member last up had spoken about, it might be in greater danger now than last year, but he was not acquainted with its being so.

It was then unanimously agreed to print this paper for the use of the members; and, on motion, of Mr. PARKER, it was referred to a Committee of the Whole House. To-morrow was agreed upon for taking it up.

PRIVATE CLAIMS.

On a motion from Mr. TRACY, the House took up a report from the Committee of Claims, which was read, and which stated, that at the rising of last session, many petitions had never been examined, from their having been presented at so late a period, that time was wanting to go through with them. The report closed with recommending the adoption of a resolution, the substance of which was, that these unexamined claims be recommended to a new Committee of Claims. This recommendation was agreed to.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

A motion was made that the House should go into Committee of the Whole, on the report from the Select Committee on the Standing Rules and Orders of the House. This was accordingly done, Mr. MUEHLBERG in the Chair.

The Chairman inquired if it was the pleasure of the Committee that this report should be read over again, as a printed copy was already in the hands of every gentleman. It was the sense of the House that the report should be read over again, which was done, partly by the Chairman, and partly by the Clerk of the House.

The following clause was the first in any ways objected to:

"When the reading of a paper is called for, which had before been read to the House, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House."

The SPEAKER, (Mr. DAYTON,) did not understand thoroughly the intent of this clause.

A member explained that formerly the custom had been to read any paper as often as it was desired by a member. The consequence was found to be, that papers of more length than importance had been read over and over again, in the course of a session, to the great waste of time. The rule in question was one of those of last session.

The SPEAKER replied that papers had sometimes been read, which, as it appeared afterwards, had much better not have been read at all. He referred to a particular instance in the last session. He, therefore, highly approved the idea of the Committee, but objected that it did not go far enough. He, on this account, proposed to strike out the words in italics, by which means, if the paper was of an improper description, even a first reading would be prevented. The member, if he has any doubts, may communicate its contents to some other gentleman, previous to his laying it before the House, and, if it appears improper, the nature of its contents being thus indirectly conveyed, members can easily form their minds, without the trouble of reading it.

Mr. GILES approved the proposition of Mr. DAYTON, which was agreed to by the Committee. The words in italics were thus to be struck out.

Mr. W. SMITH moved to strike out the following clause:

"No committee shall sit, during the sitting of this House, without special leave."

Mr. SMITH had no objection to the rule, if the House seriously intended to adopt and enforce it; but if they did not, it was diminishing the respect due to the House. It was entirely improper to make rules, knowing that they would be broken. He moved to strike out the clause only that he might obtain the sense of the House whether they chose to adhere to the rule or not. We might as well have no rules as not observe them.

Mr. MUEHLBERG remarked that the Committee on Enrolled Bills, from the nature of their business, can only sit while the House itself is sitting.

Mr. KITCHELL said that if the House were to have no rules made, but such as were never broken, they would have no rules at all, for he believed that they never made a rule, which was not transgressed on some occasion or other. He was for keeping in the clause.

Mr. DAYTON was for leaving it in the power of the SPEAKER to send for committees into the House when they might be wanted. Excepting as to the case of Enrolled Bills, already noticed by the Chairman, others very seldom had occasion to sit, while the House was sitting. But when such a necessity happened, there was no doubt that the permission would be granted.

Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. GILES, said a few words, and, in the end, Mr. SMITH withdrew his amendment.

Another rule was read, which directs clearing the House of all persons, except the members and the Clerk, when confidential communications are received from the PRESIDENT. Mr. W. SMITH inquired why the Sergeant-at-Arms was not, as formerly, to be admitted. Mr. MURRAY replied that the committee had not thought his presence essentially necessary. No motion was made on this subject.

The reading of the Rules was then finished. The Committee rose, and the Chairman reported that there had been one amendment adopted.

The House then took up the rules. One of them hath these words:

"A Sergeant-at-Arms shall execute the commands of the House, from time to time, either by himself or a special messenger, to be by him appointed for that purpose."

Mr. HILLHOUSE objected to the words in italics as they now stand, because they give the Sergeant a discretionary power of going idle, and hiring another person to do his business. He proposed, as an amendment, to add these words, "or in case of sickness."

Mr. VENABLE preferred, as an amendment, to strike out all the words in italics.

Mr. HILLHOUSE had once thought of that; but he recollected that the Sergeant might be sent to Georgia to arrest a member. After proceeding three fourths of the way, he falls sick; and not being able to proceed further himself, nor having time at such a distance to consult the House, the result will be that, unless he is qualified to appoint a delegate in his room, the orders of the House will not be executed.

Mr. VENABLE still thought it better to leave out the clause, than suffer a Sergeant-at-Arms to appoint an officer for that House. The words were, on a motion to that effect, struck out.

Another clause was for appointing a Committee of Commerce. On motion, it was agreed to add the words and Agriculture.

One of the rules is in these words:

"No petition to controvert the election of a member returned to serve in this House, shall be received unless the same be presented within fifty days after the member petitioned against shall take his seat."

Mr. GILES wished to hear a reason for this restriction, in point of time, from any of the gentlemen, who were on the committee that framed the report before the House. He had doubts of its propriety.

Mr. SEDGWICK inclined to think that the rule should be expunged. It was a delicate matter to pass restrictions, wherein they might be personally interested. The clause was struck out.

Mr. GOODHUE objected that the Doorkeeper should not be excluded from the House during the reading of confidential communications. He might be wanted, were it only to take care of the fire.

Mr. SEDGWICK said that then there would be occasion to make him swear an oath of secrecy, and to form a rule to that effect. The proposal was negatived.

The rules were then, on motion, agreed to by the House, as follows:

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

First.—Touching the Duty of the Speaker.

He shall take the Chair every day at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned on the preceding day; shall immediately call the members to order, and, on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the Journal of the preceding day to be read.

He shall preserve decorum and order; may speak to points of order, in preference to other members, rising from his seat for that purpose, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House by any two members.

He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting.

Questions shall be distinctly put in this form, to wit: "As many as are of opinion that (as the question may be) say Ay;" and after the affirmative voice is expressed, "As many as are of a contrary opinion, say No." If the Speaker doubts, or a division be called for, the House shall divide; those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and afterwards those in the negative. If the Speaker still doubts, or a count be required, the Speaker shall name two members, one from each side, to tell the numbers in the affirmative; which being reported, he shall then name two others, one from each side, to tell those in the negative; which being also reported, he shall rise, and state the decision to the House.

All committees shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless otherwise specially directed by the House; in which case they shall be appointed by ballot; and if, upon such ballot, the number required shall not be elected, by a majority of the votes given, the House shall proceed to a second ballot, in which a plurality of votes shall prevail; and in case a greater number than are required to compose or complete the committee, shall have an equal number of votes, the House shall proceed to a further ballot or ballots.

In all cases of ballot by the House, the Speaker shall vote; in other cases he shall not vote, unless the House be equally divided, or unless his vote, if given to the minority, will make the division equal; and, in case of such equal division, the question shall be lost.

All acts, addresses, and joint resolutions, shall be signed by the Speaker; and all writs, warrants, or subpoenas, issued by order of the House, shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the Clerk.

In case of any disturbance or disorderly conduct in the gallery or lobby, the Speaker, (or Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House,) shall have power to order the same to be cleared.

Secondly.—Of Decorum and Debate.

When any member is about to speak in debate, or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise from his seat, and respectfully address himself to Mr. Speaker.

If any member, in speaking, or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate. If there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, and the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House.

When two or more members happen to rise at once, the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak.

No member shall speak more than twice to the same question, without leave of the House: nor more than once, until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

Whilst the Speaker is putting any question, or addressing the House, none shall walk out of, or across the House; nor in such case, or when a member is speaking, shall entertain private discourse; nor, whilst a member is speaking, shall pass between him and the Chair.

No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested; or in any other case where he was not present when the question was put.

Upon a division and count of the House on any question, no member without the bar shall be counted.

Every member who shall be in the House when a question is put, shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him.

When a motion is made and seconded, it shall be stated by the Speaker, or, being in writing, it shall be handed to the Chair, and read aloud by the Clerk, before debated.

Every motion shall be reduced to writing, if the Speaker or any member desire it.

After a motion is stated by the Speaker, or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received, unless to amend it, to commit it, for the previous question, to postpone it to a day certain, or to adjourn.

A motion to adjourn shall be always in order, and shall be decided without debate.

The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by five members; and, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment and further debate of the main question.

On a previous question, no member shall speak more than once without leave.

Any member may call for the division of a question, where the sense will admit of it.

A motion for commitment, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

Motions and reports may be committed at the pleasure of the House.

No new motion or proposition shall be admitted under color of amendment, as a substitute for the motion or proposition under debate.

When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

The unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the time of the last adjournment, shall have the preference in the Orders of the Day; and no motion on any other business shall be received, without special leave of the House, until the former is disposed of.

In all other cases of ballot than for committees, a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election; and when there shall not be such majority on the first ballot, the ballot shall be repeated until a majority be obtained.

In all cases when others than members of the House may be eligible, there shall be a previous nomination.

If a question depending be lost by adjournment of the House, and revived on the succeeding day, no member who has spoken twice on the day preceding shall be permitted again to speak without leave.

Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate shall be necessary, shall be read to the House, and laid on the table, on a day preceding that in which the same shall be moved, unless the House shall otherwise expressly allow.

Petitions, memorials, and other papers, addressed to the House, shall be presented by the Speaker, or by a member in his place, and shall not be debated or decided on the day of their being first read, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order they were read.

Any fifteen members, (including the Speaker, if there is one,) shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members.

Upon calls of the House, or in taking the yeas and nays on any question, the names of the members shall be called alphabetically.

Any member may excuse himself from serving on any committee at the time of his appointment, if he is then a member of two other committees.

No member shall absent himself from the service of the House, unless he have leave, or be sick, and unable to attend.

Upon a call of the House, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; after which, the names of the absentees shall be again called over, the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse, or insufficient excuses are made, may, by order of the House, be taken into custody, as they appear, or may be sent for, and taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

When a member shall be discharged from custody, and admitted to his seat, the House shall determine whether such discharge shall be with, or without paying fees; and, in like manner, whether a delinquent member, taken into custody by a special messenger, shall, or shall not, be liable to defray the expense of such special messenger.

A Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed, to hold his office during the pleasure of the House, whose duty it shall be to attend the House during its sitting; to execute the commands of the House, from time to time, together with all such process issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the Speaker.

The fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be, for every arrest, the sum of two dollars; for each day's custody and release, one dollar; and for travelling expenses of himself, or a special messenger, going and returning, one-tenth of a dollar per mile.

Four standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of each session, viz.:

A Committee of Elections, a Committee of Claims, a Committee of Commerce and Manufactures—to consist of seven members each: And a Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business—to consist of three members.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching election, and returns, as shall or may be presented, or come in question, and be referred to them by the House.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Claims to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching claims or demands on the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions for relief therein, as to them shall seem expedient.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things, touching the commerce and manufactures of the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business to examine and report what laws have expired, or are near expiring, and require to be revived or further continued; also, to examine and report from the Journal of the last session, all such matters as were then depending and undetermined. It shall also be the duty of the said committee to revise the laws for the establishment of offices, and to report, from time to time, such provisions or expenses attending them, as may appear to have become necessary.

No committee shall sit, during the sitting of the House, without special leave.

The Clerk of the House shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and abilities; and shall be deemed to continue in office until another be appointed.

It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the House, at the end of each session, to send a printed copy of the Journal thereof to the Executive, and to each branch of the Legislature, of every State.

Whenever confidential communications are received from the President of the United States, the House shall be cleared of all persons, except the members and the Clerk, and so continue during the reading of such communications, and (unless otherwise directed by the House) during all debates and proceedings to be had thereon. And when the Speaker, or any other member, shall inform the House that he has communications to make, which he conceives ought to be kept secret, the House shall, in like manner, be cleared till the communication be made; the House shall then determine whether the matter communicated requires secrecy or not, and take order accordingly.

Thirdly.—Of Bills.

Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave, or by an order of the House, on the report of a committee; and, in either case, a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day's notice, at least, shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill; and every such motion may be committed.

Every bill shall receive three several readings in the House previous to its passage; and all bills shall be despatched in order as they were introduced, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but no bill shall be twice read on the same day without special order of the House.

The first reading of a bill shall be for information; and, if opposition be made to it, the question shall be, "Shall the bill be rejected?" If no opposition be made, or if the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without a question.

Upon the second reading of a bill, the Speaker shall state it as ready for commitment or engrossment; and, if committed, then a question shall be, whether to a select committee, or to a Committee of the Whole; if to a Committee of the Whole House, the House shall determine on what day. But, if the bill be ordered to be engrossed, the House shall appoint the day when it shall be read the third time. After commitment and report thereof to the House, a bill may be recommitted, or at any time before its passage.

All bills ordered to be engrossed shall be executed in a fair round hand.

When a bill shall pass, it shall be certified by the Clerk, noting the day of its passing at the foot thereof.

Fourthly.—Of Committees of the Whole House.

It shall be a standing order of the day, throughout the session, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

In forming a Committee of the Whole House the Speaker shall leave his Chair, and a Chairman to preside in Committee shall be appointed by the Speaker.

Upon bills committed to a Committee of the Whole House, the bill shall be first read throughout by the Clerk, and then again read and debated by clauses, leaving the preamble to be last considered; the body of the bill shall not be defaced or interlined; but all amendments, noting the page and line, shall be duly entered by the Clerk on a separate paper, as the same shall be agreed to by the Committee, and so reported to the House. After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses before a question to engross it be taken.

All amendments made to an original motion in Committee, shall be incorporated with the motion, and so reported.

All amendments made to a report committed to a Committee of the Whole House, shall be noted and reported as in the case of bills.

All questions, whether in Committee or in the House, shall be propounded in the order in which they were moved, except that in filling up blanks the largest sum and longest time shall be first put.

No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the People shall be discussed the day in which it is made or offered, and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House.

No sum or quantum of tax or duty voted by a Committee of the Whole House, shall be increased in the House, until the motion or proposition for such increase shall be first discussed and voted in a Committee of the Whole House; and so in respect to the time of its continuance.

All proceedings touching appropriations of money, shall be first moved and discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committee, so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking.

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor.

Joint Rules and Orders of the two Houses.

In every case of an amendment of a bill agreed to in one House and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committees shall, at a convenient hour, to be agreed on by their Chairman, meet in the Conference Chamber, and state to each other verbally, or in writing, as either shall choose, the reasons of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon.

When a message shall be sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, it shall be announced at the door of the House by the Doorkeeper, and shall be respectfully communicated to the Chair by the person by whom it may be sent.

The same ceremony shall be observed when a message shall be sent from the House of Representatives to the Senate.

Messages shall be sent by such persons as a sense of propriety in each House may determine to be proper.

While bills are on their passage between the two Houses, they shall be on paper, and under the signature of the Secretary or Clerk of each House, respectively.

After a bill shall have passed both Houses, it shall be duly enrolled on parchment by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or the Secretary of the Senate, as the bill may have originated in the one or the other House, before it shall be presented to the President of the United States.

When bills are enrolled, they shall be examined by a Joint Committee of one from the Senate, and two from the House of Representatives, appointed as a Standing Committee for that purpose, who shall carefully compare the enrolment with the engrossed bills as passed, in the two Houses, and, correcting any errors that may be discovered in the enrolled bills, make their report forthwith to the respective Houses.

After examination and report, each bill shall be signed in the respective Houses, first by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and then by the President of the Senate.

After a bill shall have thus been signed in each House, it shall be presented by the said committee to the President of the United States for his approbation, it being first endorsed on the back of the roll, certifying in which House the same originated; which endorsement shall be signed by the Secretary or Clerk (as the case may be) of the House in which the same did originate, and shall be entered on the Journal of each House. The said committee shall report the day of presentation to the President, which time shall also be carefully entered on the Journal of each House.

All orders, resolutions, and votes, which are to be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation, shall also, in the same manner, be previously enrolled, examined, and signed; and shall be presented in the same manner, and by the same committee, as provided in case of bills.

When the Senate and House of Representatives shall judge it proper to make a joint Address to the President, it shall be presented to him in his Audience Chamber by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Speaker and both Houses.

Ordered, That a Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be appointed, pursuant to the Standing Rules and Orders of the House; when Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. BOURNE, Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. SWANWICK, Mr. S. SMITH, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. W. SMITH, were appointed, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 15.

Mr. HEATH laid the following motion on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any and what amendments may be necessary to the act regulating processes in the Courts of the United States.

Mr. LIVINGSTON laid the following motion on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether any and what alterations should be made in the penal laws of the United States, by substituting milder punishments for certain crimes for which infamous and capital punishments are now inflicted.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., laid the following motion on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report what proceedings had been had in pursuance of the act passed at the last session for the promulgation of the laws of the United States, and whether any and what amendments may be necessary to the said act.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

Sundry memorials and petitions having been presented and referred,

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MUHLENBERG in the Chair, on the draft of an answer to the President's Speech. The following sentence being under consideration:

"Contemplating that probably unequalled spectacle of national happiness, which our country exhibits, to the interesting summary which you, sir, have been pleased to make, in justice to our own feelings, permit us to add the benefits which are derived from your presiding in our councils, resulting as well from the undiminished confidence of your fellow citizens, as from your zealous and successful labors in their service."

Mr. PARKER moved to strike out the words "probably unequalled," and from the word "councils," to the end. He owned that the United States owe much to the President for his services on most occasions; but he had sometimes erred as other men. He could not for his own part subscribe to the expressions contained in the words which he had moved to strike out; his confidence in the President was diminished in consequence of a late transaction.

Mr. SHERBURNE called for a division of the question; that a question should first be put upon the words "probably unequalled," and afterwards upon striking out the latter part of the clause.

The question was accordingly put upon the words "probably unequalled," and they were struck out 43 to 39.

Mr. MURRAY rose to make a few observations on the motion for striking out from the word "councils." As a Representative from Maryland, he said, he could not on this occasion be contented to give a silent vote. The Legislature of that State had not long since declared, that their confidence in the President remains undiminished; and though his single sentiment might be deemed unimportant when viewed in connexion with the unanimous vote of his State, yet he was free to declare, that his confidence in the Chief Magistrate had experienced no diminution. The Legislature of Maryland, he observed, had foreseen that attempts would be made, and saw that unjustifiable attempts were actually making to diminish the confidence of the people in the PRESIDENT; they therefore resolved to give the sanction of their unanimous vote to his character, declaring that the PRESIDENT retained their confidence, and that he had merited it. Though not bound by the opinion of the Legislature of that State, he conceived it his duty not to give a silent vote on the present occasion.

Mr. GILES had hoped that nothing would have been brought before the House calculated to disturb the harmony that ought to subsist, by involving the discussion of delicate points. He had as much zeal as any man for the preservation of the PRESIDENT's fame and reputation; but he could not go the length of the expressions in the clause objected to. He could not agree to it in its present shape, because the assertion in it does not correspond with the fact. After this remark, there could not, he conceived, be any inconsistency in voting against the word and still feeling a regard for the PRESIDENT. He hoped his fame and reputation might never receive a stain, but pass unimpaired to posterity. He should vote for striking out.

Mr. FREEMAN wished the motion might be so modified as to involve the striking out of the word "undiminished" only. Though he for himself, he observed, might say that his confidence in the PRESIDENT was undiminished, he could not utter the same sentiment in behalf of the people at large. In his opinion the confidence of a part (a very small one perhaps) of the people was diminished; though that of a majority might be unshaken.

Mr. HARPER said he had no difficulty in declaring that his own confidence in the PRESIDENT was undiminished, but he could not go so far as to pledge himself that that of all the people was so. He never, he said, had been in the habit of worshipping the PRESIDENT. He considered him as a man, not infallible, but as a wise, honest, and faithful public servant, and he was prepared in all places and situations to declare this opinion; but he was not ready to pronounce concerning the opinion of the people of the United States. Some time hence they may become unanimous in their confidence; but he could not say that it was not diminished. He was ready to declare for himself but not for others. If called upon to declare whether a majority, whether four-fifths of the people retained their confidence in the PRESIDENT, he could declare it as his opinion in the affirmative; but the clause as it stands includes the whole, and he declared as it stood could not command his vote. He concluded by expressing his intention, when it would be in order, to introduce a modification of the clause, so as to express the undiminished confidence of the House in the PRESIDENT.

Mr. PARKER, in coincidence with the wish of

Mr. FREEMAN, agreed to confine his motion to striking out the word "undiminished."

Mr. SEDGWICK doubted whether, after a division of the question, and a question being taken on the first part, a modification of the second part would be in order.

The Chairman declared it in order.

Mr. SEDGWICK viewed the present motion as even more objectionable than the first; it went directly to a denial of undiminished confidence for the PRESIDENT on the part of the House and the public. There was a time, he said, when no man could have supposed that the period would have arrived, that in the popular branch of the Government, the confidence of the people and their Representatives in that man could have been questioned.

Having been on the committee that framed the answer, and maturely considered the subject in every part, he would mention some of the observations that occurred to his mind particularly in favor of the part now objected to. Lest in the course of them his sensibility on this subject should betray him into some warmth of expression, he begged leave to premise that he wished to wound the feelings of no man.

It was proper he said to inquire into facts on which the expression now objected to was grounded. Is the confidence of the people in the services, and patriotism, and wisdom, of the Chief Magistrate diminished? His experience led him to say no; then, in the existing circumstances, is it not right for the representatives to make the declaration to their constituents and the world? To suppose the people, who, at the present moment, enjoyed so many blessings under the PRESIDENT's administration, could feel their confidence in him impaired, would suppose a baseness of disposition unworthy of them and of the services he has rendered. Who could review the glorious conduct of our Chief, during the conflict of the Revolution, his unwearying labors for the public good, his bravery, moderation and humanity; who could observe him in his happy retirement, covered with glory, and accompanied by the blessings of his country; then forsaking his retirement, putting at hazard the mighty mass of his reputation, and be insensible of his services? Who could review the critical situation in which he preserved our peace and prosperity during a glorious administration of six years; who could review these things and not have his heart filled with gratitude and esteem? He expressed his belief that a late measure of the Executive was less the object of the dislike of some, than affording the opportunity for the vent of passions and feelings deep rooted before.

As to the sense of the people of the PRESIDENT, he believed it unaltered, as to his immediate constituents he was sure it was; and if so, it was the duty of the House to make the declaration to the world—a duty the House owed to themselves and their constituents, and the more binding from the nature of the Government the people had chosen.

Though the PRESIDENT had twice been called to the Presidency by the unanimous and unsolicited voice of his fellow-citizens; though in obedience to that voice he had made a sacrifice no other man would have made; though the only reward he has received for his services has been the approbation of his country, yet, nevertheless, licentious presses had lately teemed with infamous and scandalous abuse of him. Is this, he asked, consonant to the feelings of the House, and shall they not attempt to counteract its effects in the only constitutional manner? Shall they not declare their own and their constituents' confidence undiminished in that officer of the Government?

He has told the Legislature that he wishes to co-operate, to preserve unimpaired the blessings we enjoy. Does the House believe this? then is it wrong to express their confidence?

He believed, he said, that the efforts made to destroy the character of this first of men, instead of producing the mischief intended, would effect the contrary; and he also expressed his belief that the tide of his popularity at the present moment flowed with unusual strength.

It has been intimated, he observed, that sanctioning the vote of confidence contemplated in the clause of the Address under consideration, would implicate an approbation of a late measure of the Executive, and would preclude the possibility of a free opinion when that measure might come under the consideration of the House. He declared, upon his honor, that he had no intention that the vote now contemplated should have that effect. He did not conceive that the vote of undiminished confidence, which he now pressed, involved an approbation of all the measures of the Executive; it did not exclude the idea of fallibility; for what man is infallible? It only implied, according to his conception, an approbation of the general tenor of the conduct of the Executive. When the House express their confidence in a public officer, they cannot mean that they believe him infallible, but only that his character, grounded on his general conduct, receives their approbation.

If, when the Chief Magistrate is attacked in the manner the PRESIDENT has been attacked, he is left to be overwhelmed with unmerited abuse; what man with talents to be useful, a reputation to be injured, or feelings to be wounded—what man will hazard all to serve an ungrateful country? It will render the station of Chief Magistrate sought only by mercenaries. If confidence is denied to the Executive, it will only create vacancies in the high offices of Government to be filled by those harpies who prey upon the vitals of the State.

Another consideration, he said, should have an influence on this occasion. The fame of the Chief Magistrate's character has filled the whole world; the Americans are particularly distinguished as a people for their uniform attachment towards him. If, at this time of day, they indirectly declare their want of confidence in that man, they will justify the malignant predictions which have been uttered against our system of Government.

These considerations, he said, had weighed on his mind. If the motion for striking out prevailed, he declared it would distress him beyond any circumstance that had occurred to him during his public life, especially at this period, and under the present circumstances of affairs. He should consider the prevalence of this motion as tantamount to a declaration, that the House and their constituents did not feel their confidence in the PRESIDENT unimpaired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON lamented the situation which the drafted Address reduced the House to; but he could not give his assent to it as it stood; he should vote for striking out the word "undiminished," if a question on it should be urged. He did not conceive himself called to a seat in the House to express opinions, much less the opinions of others, but to make laws. He felt so much the delicacy of the situation which the wording of the Address had placed the House in, that he wished the dilemma of a vote might be avoided. The gentleman last up also lamented the situation, and justly observed, that striking the word out was tantamount to a declaration that the confidence reposed in the PRESIDENT was diminished. But he begged to remind him that it was the framers of the Address, and he was one of them, that involved the House in this disagreeable situation.

He declared himself so young in the parliamentary proceedings, as not exactly to know how to avoid a question on the present motion. He declared he was not prepared to say what the opinion of his constituents concerning the PRESIDENT was. The confidence of many of them he knew was shaken; that of others was increased.

He moved, if in order, that the Committee should rise, and the Address be recommitted.

This was carried, and MESSRS. FREEMAN and BALDWIN added to the committee.

Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

THOMAS CLAIBORNE, from Virginia, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom had been recommended the draft of the Address in answer to the PRESIDENT'S Speech, brought in a report. The clause now added consisted of a modification of the clause objected to yesterday. On motion, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MULLENBERG in the Chair. The amendment was unanimously agreed to. Mr. GILES then moved an amendment in the third line of the last paragraph. It was thus: for "the several interesting subjects which you recommended to our consideration will receive every degree of it," read of attention. The Committee then rose, and the House agreed to the report.

It was then moved and agreed to, that the SPEAKER, attended by the House, do present the Address, as amended, to the PRESIDENT, and that a committee should be appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT, to know where and when he will be ready to receive the Address of the House.

The same gentlemen, viz: Mr. MADISON, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. SETTGREAVES, who had been first appointed to draft the Address, were named for waiting on the PRESIDENT.

SURVEY OF THE SOUTHERN COAST.

Mr. HARPER moved that a committee should be appointed to report on the memorial presented to the House, last session, by Messrs. PARKER, HOPKINS, and MEERS. These gentlemen had been employed in making drafts of some part of the coast of the Southern States. The funds were not adequate to defraying the necessary expenses; and, as the undertaking was in reality of serious national concern, the memorialists entertained a hope that Congress would interfere, and grant them some aid towards completing the charts. This is a summary of the business, as laid before the House of Representatives a short time before the end of last session. The memorial was now read over by the Clerk, and referred to a committee of five members.

Mr. TRACY submitted a resolution relative to the law for receiving subscriptions to the last loan of the Government of the United States, which law is now nearly expired. The resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. GILES moved that a committee should be appointed to bring in a bill for establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy in the United States. This was agreed to. It was then asked of what number the committee should consist? Mr. HARPER hoped that three, the smallest number proposed, would be preferred, as it was constantly found that the more numerous a committee was, the less probability there would be of their going speedily through the business. Mr. GILES, Mr. HILLHOUSE, and Mr. DUVALL were named as the committee.

Mr. HILLHOUSE moved a resolution that a committee be appointed to examine whether any and what alterations ought to be made in an act, entitled, an act for laying a duty on carriages for conveying of persons. The resolution passed, and a committee of three members was named.

Leave was asked to bring in a bill for allowing compensation to members and officers of both Houses of Congress, from the 3d of March next. Mr. GOODhue, Mr. NICHOLAS, and Mr. EARLE, were appointed.

It was next moved for leave to bring in a bill for the relief of John R. Livingston. Mr. TRACY stated, that the business was now before the Committee of Claims, and he thence conceived, that in this state of the business, it was improper to name a committee for bringing in of such a bill. On motion, a former report of the Committee of Claims was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. W. SMITH stated, that by order of the House, he had brought in a bill, last session, for opening a Land Office, but it was too late in the session to get the business gone through. He now gave notice that he would move for leave to bring in a bill for opening a Land Office.

Mr. HARTLEY called the attention of the House to several petitions, presented last session, from sundry persons settled on lands in the Western territory, and gave notice that he should bring the subject before the House to-morrow.

The committee that had been appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT, returned with notice that he would be ready to receive their Address, at his own house to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 17.

WADE HAMPTON, from South Carolina, and JOHN HATHORN, from New York, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

The Clerk read a letter from Mr. Samuel Meredith, Treasurer of the United States, to the SPEAKER of the House. It was accompanied with statements of public expenditure of money, of which the usual number were ordered to be printed.

SNUFF MANUFACTURE.

There was then presented and read by Mr. SEDGWICK, the petition of Francis Wright, snuff-maker in Boston. He complained, in very strong terms, of the present excise law as to snuff manufactured in the United States, as in the highest degree unequal and oppressive to the manufacturer. He represented, that there was the utmost facility in smuggling, while the duty on foreign snuff imported was too small to prevent an alarming competition. He considered the law altogether as a prohibition of working. The reader will observe, that by the first act passed in 1794, the duty was imposed in proportion to the quantity of snuff manufactured; many objections and complaints having been made against this mode of collecting the revenue, the duty was transferred to the mills, mortars, and hand-mills employed, which now, by the act of 1795, pay a certain stipulated sum, whether they work much or little, and this is the basis of the complaint made by Mr. Wright, who states that by exacting an arbitrary sum, the great manufacturer and the lesser one are placed upon a level in regard to the quantum of excise, and of this circumstance, Mr. Wright warmly complains. He concludes by earnestly soliciting that the new law may be repealed, and the old one restored in its place. The petition was, on motion, referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

MAGNUS KING.

Mr. TRACY moved that the report of the Committee of Claims of last House of Representatives, on the petition of Magnus King and others, should be taken up for the purpose of permitting the petitioners to withdraw their petition. This was agreed to.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report on the petition of Magnus King and others. Mr. GALLATIN wanted to hear the papers on this subject read before the petition should be rejected, that the House might know with certainty what they were doing.

In reply, it was observed by Mr. TRACY, that the motion for granting leave to withdraw the petition was made at the desire of the parties themselves, who had been with Mr. TRACY this morning, and requested leave to withdraw their petition. He hoped that, after this explanation, no objection could be made. Leave was accordingly granted.

On motion of Mr. W. SMITH, the resolution for opening a Land Office, was taken up and passed; and Mr. SMITH, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. KITCHELL, and Mr. GLEN, were appointed a committee to prepare and bring in a bill.

A memorial was presented and read against the election of Mr. JOHN SWANWICK, present Representative of the city of Philadelphia in Congress.

Mr. SWANWICK observed that he had, some time ago, heard of the intention to bring forward this memorial. He felt himself extremely interested to have the facts stated in it examined with the utmost celerity, and should move that the memorial may be immediately referred, for this purpose, to the Committee of Elections. The memorial was referred accordingly.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House then went into a Committee upon the resolutions proposed by Mr. W. SMITH, some days ago.

On the article which mentions the farther provision which ought to be made for the security of the frontiers, and for protecting the Indians from the disorderly inhabitants of the frontiers, Mr. BLOUNT observed that the expressions used on this subject by Mr. HARPER, and by a member from Connecticut, had given very great offence to the frontier people. He said this from having lately been in that country, where he learned the circumstance. He was glad to hear that the gentlemen in question did not wish to use the same words again. He was for striking out the offensive implication in the clause. Mr. FINDLEY and Mr. NICHOLAS concurred in this opinion, which was agreed to.

Mr. TRACY said that he was ready to vote for the resolution thus curtailed, if gentlemen would declare it as being understood, that the Indians were to be protected against the frontier people. He did not think that we were to protect them against the Spaniards, who never, to his knowledge, had attempted to disturb them. It was not certainly against the other Indians. If, then, it was not against the frontier people, the resolution had no meaning.

Mr. MILLIDGE stated the impropriety and imprudence of offending the frontier people, many of whom, if not the best, were among the best people in the United States.

Mr. HEATH stated, as a notorious fact, known to every person in the United States, that there are lawless persons on the frontiers, who have committed very great enormities against the Indians. He did not wish to irritate. There may be many very good people upon the frontier; he was satisfied that there were many very bad ones. The resolution was agreed to as amended.

The next resolution was for making provision to supply the Indians in time of peace, and on such principles as might tend to promote mutual tranquility.

Mr. VENABLE thought, that instead of taking up this resolution, it would be better to take up the law of last year, and see if it wants amendment.

Mr. DEARBORN moved that a special committee should be appointed to inquire if any alteration was necessary in the act, passed last year, for establishing trading houses with the Indians.

Mr. SWIFT said that no law had been passed, so that there could be no alteration of it. There was only an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars for the establishing of Indian trading houses.

Mr. PARKER stated that this was the fact. He had given a great deal of attention, last year, to this business. No law had passed.

Mr. SMITH said, in the last session there was only provision made of a fund for trading with the Indians. The matter was finally referred to a special committee, to bring in a bill.

The next resolution taken up was, that inquiry ought to be made whether farther means should be provided to reinforce the existing operations for the discharge of the Public Debt.

Mr. GALLATIN gave in a long amendment. Its object was to appoint a committee to superintend the general operations of finance. No subject, Mr. G. said, more required a system, and great advantages would be derived from it. The motion was seconded by Mr. FINDLEY.

Mr. W. SMITH did not object to the amendment in itself, but as embracing a quite distinct object from the original resolution, he apprehended that, in the shape of an amendment, it would be out of place. The resolution was withdrawn.

The resolution suggested by Mr. SWANWICK, as to an inquiry into the state of the American Navy, &c., was likewise agreed to. The Committee then rose, and the Chairman reported that they had gone into consideration of the state of the Union, and come to sundry resolutions, which were again read over by the Clerk.

The first resolution, for inquiring into the state of the Military Establishment, passed, and a committee of five members were appointed to report.

The resolution regarding the Militia of the United States was likewise agreed to, and a committee of fourteen members named.

The resolution for the protection of the Indians gave occasion for a few words as to the mode of wording the clause. A committee of three members was proposed for preparing and reporting a bill.

Mr. BLOUNT thought this number too small. He would wish for a much larger one, consisting of at least seven. He thought that some of the members from the frontier should be in it, as they could give considerable information on the subject, and because, if not named in the committee, it could not be so certain that they would give their assistance. The motion for seven members was seconded by Mr. NICHOLAS. On a division of the House, the numbers on each side were thirty-eight, and the casting voice of the SPEAKER was for the larger number. It was proposed by Mr. W. SMITH, that Mr. WHITE, delegate from the Territory Southwest of the Ohio, should be added to the committee, as his local knowledge, and peculiar opportunities of information, pointed him out as an extremely proper member of it. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT having observed that he himself could cast considerable light on the state of the frontiers, from a recent journey through that part of the Union, he was named by the SPEAKER as one of the committee of seven. He requested to be excused, as he was already on the Committee of Elections, which would engross much of his attention, but assuring the House, at the same time, that he should, if his name was permitted to be withdrawn, give the committee every aid in his power. Leave was granted.

On reading the resolution as to a committee for inquiring about the existing operations on the Public Debt, Mr. NICHOLAS moved to reject it, that the resolution by Mr. GALLATIN might be adopted in its room, as it comprehended the object of Mr. W. SMITH in its own.

Mr. VENABLE seconded the motion, on the same ground.

Mr. HARPER approved the idea, but did not see the use of rejecting the resolution of Mr. SMITH. He would rather have that of Mr. GALLATIN added as an amendment. Mr. SWANWICK, was of the same opinion.

Mr. GALLATIN himself, on further consideration, thought his resolution not sufficiently digested for acting upon. He desired a postponement until Monday next of the resolution before the House.

Mr. SEDGWICK would readily have consented to this, if it had not been out of order.

Mr. GALLATIN read a rule of the House to show that the motion was in order. The SPEAKER declared the same thing. The motion for postponement was then adopted.

The following is a copy of the resolutions, as read at the Clerk's table :

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the present Military Establishment of the United States.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that more effectual provision ought to be made for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that effectual provision ought to be made for the security of the frontiers, and for the protection of the Indians from any injuries by any of the inhabitants of the United States.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that provision ought to be made for supplying the necessities of the Indian nations within our limits, on such principles as shall best conduce to the preservation of harmony between those nations and the United States.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that an inquiry ought to be made whether further measures are necessary to reinforce the existing provision for the redemption of the Public Debt.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that an inquiry ought to be made, whether any, and what, further provisions are necessary for carrying the operations of the Mint more completely into effect.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that a committee ought to be appointed to inquire into the state of the Naval Equipment ordered by a former law of the United States; and to report whether any, and what, further provision is necessary to be made on that subject.

The first, second, third, and fourth resolutions were severally read the second time, and on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. BURGESS, Mr. MACLAY, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. GRISWOLD, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the first resolution.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the second resolution, and that Mr. GILES, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. BUCK, Mr. TRACY, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. HEISTER, Mr. PATTEN, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. LOCKE, Mr. HAMPTON, and Mr. MILLEDGE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the third resolution, and that Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. COOPER, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. FRANKLIN, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. HARPER, and Mr. WHITE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the fourth resolution, and that Mr. PARKER, Mr. SAMUEL LYMAN, and Mr. TATOM, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That the consideration of the fifth resolution be postponed until Monday next.

Ordered, That the sixth and seventh resolutions do lie on the table.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

At twelve o'clock, the SPEAKER, attended by the House, waited upon the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and delivered to him the following Address, in answer to his Speech to both Houses at the opening of the session :

SIR : As the Representatives of the people of the United States, we cannot but participate in the strongest sensibility to every blessing which they enjoy, and cheerfully join with you in profound gratitude to the Author of all Good for the numerous and extraordinary blessings which he has conferred on our favored country.

A final and formal termination of the distressing war which has ravaged our Northwestern Frontier, will be an event which must afford satisfaction proportioned to the anxiety with which it has long been sought ; and in the adjustment of the terms, we perceive the true policy of making them satisfactory to the Indians as well as to the United States, as the best basis of a durable tranquillity. The disposition of such of the Southern tribes as had also heretofore annoyed our frontier, is another prospect in our situation so important to the interest and happiness of the United States, that it is much to be lamented that any clouds should be thrown over it, more especially by excesses on the part of our citizens.

While our population is advancing with a celerity which exceeds the most sanguine calculations—while every part of the United States displays indications of rapid and various improvement—while we are in the enjoyment of protection and security, by mild and wholesome laws, administered by Governments founded on the genuine principles of rational liberty, a secure foundation will be laid for accelerating, maturing, and establishing the prosperity of our country, if by treaty and amicable negotiation, all those causes of external discord which heretofore menaced our tranquility shall be extinguished, on terms compatible with our national rights and honor, with our Constitution and great commercial interests.

Among the various circumstances in our internal situation, none can be viewed with more satisfaction and exultation than that the late scene of disorder and insurrection has been completely restored to the enjoyment of order and repose. Such a triumph of reason and of law is worthy of the free Government under which it happened, and was justly to be hoped from the enlightened and patriotic spirit which pervades and actuates the people of the United States.

In contemplating that spectacle of national happiness which our country exhibits, and of which you, sir, have been pleased to make an interesting summary, permit us to acknowledge and declare the very great share which your zealous and faithful services have contributed to it and to express the affectionate attachment which we feel for your character.

The several interesting subjects which you recommend to our consideration will receive every degree of attention which is due to them. And whilst we feel the obligation of temperance and mutual indulgence in all our discussions, we trust and pray that the result to the happiness and welfare of our country may correspond with the pure affection we bear to it.

To the foregoing Address the PRESIDENT was pleased to make the following reply :

GENTLEMEN: Coming as you do from all parts of the United States, I receive great satisfaction from the concurrence of your testimony in the justness of the interesting summary of our national happiness, which, as the result of my inquiries, I presented to your view. The sentiments we have mutually expressed of profound gratitude to the source of these numerous blessings—the Author of all Good—are pledges of our obligations to unite our sincere and zealous endeavors, as the instruments of Divine Providence, to preserve and perpetuate them.

Accept, gentlemen, my thanks for your declaration, that to my agency you ascribe the enjoyment of a great share of these benefits. So far as my services contribute to the happiness of my country, the acknowledgment of my fellow-citizens, and their affectionate attachment, will ever prove an abundant reward.

G. WASHINGTON.

FRIDAY, December 18.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. VENABLE gave in a report from the Committee of Elections on the memorial of JOHN RICHARDS, respecting the contested election between him and JAMES MORRIS, now deceased.

The report was read by the Clerk, which was that the seat of JAMES MORRIS is declared vacated; and it is recommended that the Governor of Pennsylvania should issue writs for a new election.

Mr. SITGREAVES moved that the report of the Committee on Elections should be read a second time. This being done, the member stated that Mr. RICHARDS had gone back to the country under an idea of acquiescing in the report. Upon this ground he moved that the report should be approved of by the House.

Mr. HEISTER stated that he had seen a letter to Mr. RICHARDS, informing him of sickness in his family, and that was the only cause of his immediate return to the country, as he had no design of submitting tacitly to the report.

Mr. VENABLE entered into a detail of the circumstances attending this election. He recommended that the House should avoid precipitation. He said that the committee, in their report, had not completely decided the business.

Mr. KITTERA likewise entered into a minute discussion of the circumstances attending the election.

Mr. SITGREAVES explained, that he had proposed to the House to take up the report of the committee, under an impression that Mr. RICHARDS, by leaving town, was satisfied and willing to submit to it. He withdrew his motion.

Mr. VENABLE was proceeding to the merits of the case, when he was reminded by the SPEAKER that there was no question before the House.

Mr. GALLATIN then moved that the report should be re-committed to the select committee, for which he gave various reasons. Mr. SITGREAVES seconded the motion.

Mr. HARPER was for the re-commitment. He observed that the arguments of Mr. GALLATIN had been adopted and acted upon by the committee.

The report was, on motion, read a second time. The cause of this contested election appears to have been chiefly the absence of a great number of electors in this district of Pennsylvania, upon the Western expedition. They were authorized, by a particular law to that effect, to vote for a Representative in Congress, provided that the returns were made within a specified legal time. The votes returned within that time for the deceased Mr. MORRIS were 1,648, and those for Mr. RICHARDS 1,635. This gave to the former a majority of 13.

Mr. SITGREAVES understood the complaint of Mr. RICHARDS to be, that the unsound votes objected to were comprehended in the preceding numbers, whereas Mr. SITGREAVES, himself a member from the same district, and who being on the spot at the time of the dispute, could speak with accuracy, knew that the fact was otherwise.

Mr. SWIFT said, that as the gentleman who was last up spoke from personal knowledge, he supposed of course that his assertion was true; but Mr. RICHARDS himself had said to the committee that all the unsound votes had been returned after the time prescribed by law. Perhaps he had misunderstood himself, but Mr. SWIFT thought a re-commitment necessary for the sake of explanation. Mr. FINDLEY argued on the same side. The report was re-committed.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

The House, on motion of Mr. GOODHUE, took up the report of the Committee on the Unfinished Business. The report was again read.

The first law recited as being near expiring, is the law for receiving on loan the Domestic Debt of the United States; this law expires the 31st December, 1795. A committee of three was appointed, to report by bill or otherwise on the expediency of extending the term of the law.

The next article in the report refers to sundry acts which will expire at the end of the present session.

These acts are for establishing a Health Office, the act respecting light-houses, beacons, &c.

On motion they were referred to the committee last appointed.

The several acts providing for the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, will expire at the end of the present session.

On motion, referred to the same committee, to consider and report on the propriety of continuing these acts.

The act for renewing lost or destroyed certificates will expire in June next. It was moved that this should be referred to the same committee, to report on the expediency of continuing the same beyond that period. This motion was withdrawn, it appearing that the object of this law would then be fully accomplished.

The unfinished business of the last session was then recapitulated.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved that the opinion of the committee annexed to the report, which is, that all reports and petitions depending or undecided upon by the last House, should be taken up on motion of individual members or application of the petitioners, should be adopted by the House. This proposition was agreed to.

The House then proceeded in the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The resolution relative to the Mint was passed over. It appearing that the subject was before the Senate.

The resolution relative to the Naval Equipment was then read.

Mr. BOURNE proposed that the Committee should be instructed to extend their inquiries to the state of the fortifications of the ports and harbors. It appeared that information on the subject of the Naval Equipment was preparing to be laid before the House.

On motion of Mr. SHERBURNE, it was voted that the resolution should lie over till Monday. Mr. SWANWICK laid on the table a resolution for a committee to inquire into the state of the fortifications; the progress made relative to procuring sites for arsenals; also, in relation to procuring arms and military stores.

It was moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the letter from the Secretary of War, accompanied with sundry statements and reports. The motion was agreed to.

The House then attended to the reading of the papers received from the Secretary of War. The first paper read was a report relative to the Military Establishment of the United States.

2d. Report of the measures that have been pursued for obtaining proper sites for arsenals.

3d. Report of the measures that have been taken for replenishing the arsenals with arms, ordnance, and military stores.

4th. Report of the measures taken for opening trade with the Indian tribes.

5th. A statement of the progress that has been made in the building the frigates generally:

The 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th particular statements of the progress made in building the frigates constructing in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Norfolk, Baltimore, and Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

On motion of Mr. SWANWICK, the letter of the Secretary of War, with the accompanying statements and reports, were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There was next received and read a report, dated this day, from the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating the progress which has been made in redeeming the Public Debt. The usual number of copies of the report, and statements which accompanied it, was ordered to be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. HEATH laid on the table a motion for appointing a committee to inquire if any, or what alterations are necessary to be made in the act for establishing the Post Office and Post Roads in the United States.

Mr. GALEATIN also laid on the table his resolution respecting the establishment of a Committee of Finance, which is to be taken up on Monday next.

Mr. LIVINGSTON called up his motion, laid on the table a few days ago, for appointing a committee to inquire and report whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the penal code of the United States.

After an amendment, the resolution was adopted, and a committee of three members appointed to report.

Mr. HARPER called up his motion that a select committee should be appointed to examine and report on the petition of Parker, Hopkins, and Meers, relative to a survey of the Southern Coast. The report of the select committee of last session was read. Mr. LYMAN saw no use for referring to a new committee. He would have the report referred as it stands, to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARPER persisted in his motion for a new select committee. As far as he had been able to learn the rules and practice of the House, a new committee was requisite. Perhaps they might adopt the old report without altering a word of it. They were at liberty to do so.

Mr. MACON said that it was the practice to make everything begin de novo. The resolution was accordingly carried, and a committee of three members, viz: Mr. HARRISON, Mr. HAMPTON, and Mr. HAVENS, were nominated for that purpose.

The House then adjourned till Monday next.

MONDAY, December 21.

A petition was presented by Mr. BRENT, from sundry inhabitants of Loudoun and Fairfax counties, Virginia, praying the extension of the post road through those districts. Laid on the table.

The House took up the resolution respecting the Post Office law, laid on the table last week by Mr. HEATH. This resolution was agreed to, and a committee appointed to make the necessary inquiry whether any, and what, alterations are necessary in that law. Nine members were nominated on the committee. The petition presented by Mr. BRENT was referred to the above committee.

Mr. GALLATIN called up his resolution for the appointment of a standing Committee of Ways and Means. This motion was agreed to nem. con.

It was moved that the committee consist of seven; this was objected to, as being too small a number. Fourteen were moved for. The inconveniences of so large a committee were stated; it was difficult to convene them; much time was wasted in waiting. The result had been, that a sub-committee had generally done the business. The advantages of a large committee were urged; more general information would be obtained; the objects were numerous and important; the settlement of principles would be more satisfactorily determined in a large committee, while the details and examination of accounts might be attended to by a sub-committee.

The motion for fourteen was agreed to, and the following gentlemen were appointed, viz:

MESSRS. WILLIAM SMITH, SEDGWICK, MADISON, BALDWIN, GALLATIN, BOURNE, GILMAN, MURRAY, BUCK, GILBERT, ISAAC SMITH, BLOUNT, PATTON, and ILLHOUSE.

To this committee are to be referred all reports from the Treasury Department, all propositions relating to revenue, and they are to report on the state of the Public Debt, revenues, and expenditures.

TUESDAY, December 22.

NATHANIEL SMITH, from Connecticut, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Among the petitions presented to-day was one from Nathaniel Appleton, Loan-office Commissioner for the State of Massachusetts; which petition was referred to a Committee of five.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved, that this committee be directed to report whether any, and if any, what additional compensation ought to be allowed to the Commissioners of Loans and their clerks, for 1796.

The high price of living was pleaded in favor of the motion. In opposition, it was mentioned, that the States can get men to fill their most important offices, reputably, for sums which Federal officers, in less responsible and easier stations receive. This difference creates invidious distinctions, which might be increased, if the motion should prevail. The motion was lost.

A report was then read from the Committee of Claims, on a variety of petitions.

On motion, from Mr. TRACY, the first of these petitions was read a second time. The petitioner was Colonel Benjamin Titcomb. By a law of last session, an officer cannot be entitled to a future salary, till he shall have returned the commutation formerly received. Mr. Titcomb had sold his commutation, and he could not return it.

The report of the Committee of Claims was, that the prayer of the petition could not be granted, but the petitioner have leave to withdraw it.

Mr. STERBURN moved that the report should lie on the table for the present. He had heard of the petitioner's case, that it was an extremely hard one, and that he was in every way, a worthy and deserving man. Mr. S., the motion not being in order, varied it, and moved that the report should lie on the table till Monday.

Mr. TRACY said, that when the report came to be taken up, he hoped it would be on the principle which had actuated the committee. He, as well as the other members, was fully impressed with a sense of the merits of the petitioner, and if it was possible to devise a mode of granting him relief without contravening the act, it should be done; but the committee had thought themselves bound by the former act. The report lies on the table till Monday.

Mr. HARRISON laid the following motion on the table.

"That so much of the report of the Secretary of State of the 13th of June, 1790, and of the Message of the President of the United States of the 8th of January last, as relates to Weights and Measures, be referred to a committee to examine and report to the House."

Mr. VENABLE moved that the Committee of Elections should have power to send for persons, papers and records, as former committees had done.

WEDNESDAY, December 23.

Mr. GOODHUE moved that a new member should be added to the committee appointed to bring in a bill respecting compensation to members of both Houses of Congress, and their officers, after the 3d of March next. The cause of this motion was, that Mr. EARLE, one of their number, was indisposed.

Mr. GILES recommended that a member should be added without laying aside Mr. EARLE, so that in case of his recovery, he might still afford his services to the committee. Agreed to.

Divers petitions of sundry citizens and inhabitants of the State of Virginia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, were presented to the House and read, praying that the Representatives of the people, in Congress assembled, will, in their wisdom, adopt such measures, touching the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and Great Britain, lately negotiated by authority of the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and conditionally ratified by the Senate, as shall most effectually secure, free from encroachment, the Constitutional delegated powers of Congress, and the chartered rights of the people, and preserve to our country an uninterrupted continuance of the blessings of peace.

Also, a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of New York, whose names are thereunto subscribed, praying to be indemnified by the Government of the United States, for the property which has been unjustly taken from them by the armed vessels of the British, when in the regular pursuit of their commerce.

Ordered, That the said petitions and memorial be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims.

DANIEL GOODWIN.

The report on the petition of Daniel Goodwin was taken up and read. It recommended that, in opposition to the act of limitation, the Secretary of the Treasury should be appointed to settle the debt, agreeably to the desire of the petitioner.

Mr. SWIFT wished to know the motives for this distinction in favor of Mr. Goodwin.

Mr. TRACY, as Chairman of the Committee of Claims, rose to give this explanation. The substance of the case was shortly this: During the late war, Mr. Thomas Cushing, a gentleman in public service, had received orders for building, at Boston, a seventy-four gun ship. On this occasion, he occupied a wharf and some buildings belonging to the late Mr. Benjamin Goodwin, father to the petitioner. The sum due by him, as compensation, had been determined by arbitration. Both Mr. Cushing and Mr. Goodwin died, some years after; and the award and other papers, which were in the custody of the former gentleman, were mislaid; and could not be found, till after the act of limitation took place. The Committee considered this circumstance as forming an excuse for the omission of presenting the claim within the time prescribed by law. They had no doubt that the debt was, in itself, just and fair; for, on examination, they found that Mr. Cushing had not received, at the settlement of his official accounts, any money on that head from the Treasury of the United States. The amount really due was likewise ascertained by the award. Mr. TRACY stated that this report was not a favorite with the Committee of Claims. They wished for the direction of the House, to serve them as a rule in similar cases, to which they would pay the strictest regard. The Committee had thought that it was by an act of Providence that Mr. Goodwin had been prevented from lodging his claim, not by any negligence of his own. Mr. T. then went into a long statement of the measures taken by Government to satisfy its creditors. From this detail, he inferred the necessity for a statute of limitations. Government had done everything possible to warn its creditors. It had almost gone to the highways and hedges to compel them to come in. There was great pleasure and honor in looking back upon such conduct. One cloud only hung over the transaction. This was the necessity for paying with certificates, which had frequently been resold, at a very low rate to the great loss of the real creditor. It was an object of regret, but could not possibly be helped. The Committee of Claims had, in general, been very cautious of admitting exceptions to the statute of limitations. In this instance, they had not thought themselves authorized positively to reject a demand that was unquestionably just in itself, but had left the matter to the decision of the House.

Mr. CHRISTIE was opposed to the report. He had at first thought the act of limitation an unjust one; but when one of this committee, last winter, he was convinced of the necessity for something of the kind. There had been negligence in some quarter about this demand, for it lay asleep six years and eight months. He would have no partial repeal of the statute.

Mr. SWIFT saw no act of God which had intervened to prevent the petitioner from prosecuting the claim within the legal time. Thousands of other cases, just as equitable, might be admitted on the same ground as the present one. It would be endless to open such a door. He hoped that the committee would not agree to the report, because shoals of demands would arise, of which it was impossible, from the distance of time, to prove whether they were just or not. To enforce the statute of limitation might seem rigorous upon individuals, but it was a real act of equity to the public. There were reasons to believe that many thousands, if not millions of dollars had been paid for dishonest demands, and on fictitious evidence. The House might sit all the year round, if they took up such a principle, and yet never get through.

Mr. GILBERT was opposed to the resolution, as reported by the committee. He said that the claim of the petitioner was either barred or not barred by the act of limitation; if it was not barred by such limitation, there needed no such Legislative interposition; if it were barred by the act of limitation, he could not agree to the resolve, because he could never consent to a partial repeal or suspension of that act; he doubted of the justice or policy of repealing the act of limitation partially, and much more of repealing it generally. The report of the committee, he said, shows that the claim of the petitioner is barred by the act of limitation, and therefore he could not consent to the resolution proposed.

Mr. B. BOURNE was satisfied to stand by the law in general; but urged that there might be reasonable exceptions, of which the present formed one. He denied that there had been any negligence on the side of the petitioner, and entered into an explanation to demonstrate that there had been none, and where there was none, the Government were in justice bound to pay.

H. of R.]

Daniel Goodwin.

Mr. DEARBORN showed the unfairness of debaring a person from payment of a debt admitted to be due, because, by an accident which he could not help, his papers had been for some time mislaid. He insisted that no voluntary delay had taken place on the part of Mr. Goodwin, and that there ought to be a distinction between those who were negligent and those who were not so. He observed that, for a long time, there had been very little encouragement, indeed, to make any demands on the American Treasury. He put the case of a private person, who is unable to pay his debts; few people would choose to be at the expense of prosecuting him, merely for the sake of ascertaining the amount of a claim from which nothing can be hoped for. In the progress of human affairs, he improves in his circumstances, and then his creditors are entitled to state their demands. Something like this happened to the United States, from about 1779 till 1789. The prospect of a public creditor was unpromising, and he would not undertake a journey of some hundreds of miles to present a claim apparently worth little or nothing. Matters have since altered for the better, and now it is but fair that those who want money should come forward and claim it.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was decidedly against the report. The reasons given by the member who spoke last, might apply to many other petitions as well as that on the table. The lodging of a claim could not have been either troublesome or expensive. There was no necessity for a journey of some hundred miles, for it might have been sent by post. He was convinced of negligence on the part of Goodwin. Why did he not lodge his claim as directed by the statute? It was said that he had applied personally to the public officer for payment; of this application, there was no proof. It was plead, that this was a strong case. If we agree on that account, there will soon be another so closely resembling the former, that it will be hard to point out the difference. Then we shall have a third, and so on, till the whole statute is in fact repealed. It would be much better to repeal the law at once. He had voted against allowing some claims, which he would otherwise have supported, but that the precedent would have had a general and dangerous operation. He was for adhering rigidly to the law.

Mr. DUVAL insisted that there was no neglect on the side of the petitioner. He regarded the people of the United States to be as much obliged to pay this debt, as any one against them. The vouchers had been left in the hands of the public officers, so that the blame did not attach to the private party.

On motion by Mr. MALBONE, the petition was read.

Mr. SWIFT then contended that proper application had not been made by Goodwin; no case could more justly come within the statute.

Mr. LYMAN rose against the clause.

Mr. GALLATIN rose to inquire if Mr. Cushing, as Continental Agent, was the proper officer to settle Mr. Goodwin's account. If he was so, Mr. G. would not consider the claim as bound by the act of limitation.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—Unless we adhere to the statute of limitation, the derangement will be endless. He was convinced that, to pay this demand, we must get over the statute. He could look on the award as nothing more than evidence of the amount of the debt. It should have been presented in proper time to the officer of the Treasury. It was not; and the creditor, in consequence of his neglect, is now precluded from doing so.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought that there never was, nor could be, a clearer case.

Mr. VENABLE warned the Committee of the danger of granting one claim which could not fail of producing multitudes.

On dividing, the ayes in favor of the report were only twenty-nine. It was therefore lost.

The Committee then rose. The Chairman reported, and the House agreed to the report.

An address was then presented and read from certain merchants and underwriters in New York, who complained heavily of British depredations, and entreated the interference and protection of Congress. It was, on motion, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THURSDAY, December 24.

CHRISTOPHER GREENUP, from Kentucky, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. SEDGWICK laid on the table a resolution that, when the House adjourn this day, the PRESIDENT of the Senate, and the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives, be authorized to adjourn both Houses, respectively, till Monday next.

Mr. GILES recommended that the House, without this formality, should at once adjourn themselves from Thursday till Monday. They were authorized to do so by the Constitution.

Mr. SEDGWICK preferred the idea of Mr. GILES, for his own opinion, but as some very respectable gentlemen entertained scruples on the point, he was willing to obviate them by his own resolution, as above stated.

As to the present adjournment, there was not, (Mr. GILES thought) much importance attached to the mode of it; but as forming a precedent against the privileges of the House in future, it might be of consequence.

Mr. TRACY had been disposed for simply adjourning till Monday.

Mr. W. SMITH was of the same opinion.

The resolution of Mr. SEDGWICK was then negatived, and another for adjourning till Monday, when the House rises this day, was proposed by Mr. GOODHUE, and adopted.

Mr. HILLHOUSE then moved that, for one week to come, twelve o'clock shall be the hour of meeting. The reason for this alteration was, that the numerous committees into which the House is divided, may have leisure to prepare their reports.

It was then moved, and agreed to refer to the Committee of Ways and Means, the estimates of appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1796.

It was also moved that so much of the report of the Secretary of State, of the 13th July, 1790, and the Message of the President, of the 8th of January last, as relates to Weights and Measures, be referred to a select committee; and Mr. HARRISON, Mr. SHERBURNE, and Mr. MACLAY, were appointed.

After receiving and disposing of a number of petitions—

The report of the Attorney General, on the fees in the Courts of the United States, was committed to a committee of three members, to prepare and bring in a bill.

On a motion by Mr. GILES, one member was added to the Committee of Ways and Means, and another to the Committee on organizing the Militia.

MONDAY, December 28.

ANDREW GREGG, from Pennsylvania, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Standing Committee of Elections, reported that the committee had examined several other certificates and credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and had agreed upon a report, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Elections, laid on the table a resolution, that the committee should be empowered to take the depositions of witnesses who cannot personally attend the committee, and that they should be authorized to point out the mode of taking such evidence. The resolution passed.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a resolution, that an appropriation of moneys be made, for the service of the Civil List, during the year 1795. It was referred to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

LANDS IN NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

A petition from certain persons requesting lands in the Northwestern Territory, on which they stated that they had already made various improvements, was presented by Mr. FOSTER, read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The Clerk then proceeded with reading the report of that Committee.

The names of the petitioners are, Joseph Cateau, Francis Proctor, Noble Benedict, James Clarke, John Strawbridge, William Morris, and others, legal representatives of Thomas Morris, Jacob Shoemaker, Thomas Boyd, Andrew Johnson, Jesse Coles, Jane Godfrey, Henry Shade, Isaac Sherman, John Hollinshead, William McKie, Tristram Coffin, and John Turner. The report was, in every instance, unfavorable. The House took up the report and agreed to it, with the exception of the cases of William Morris and John Turner, which were postponed to Monday next.

When the petition of Noble Benedict, James Clarke, and John Strawbridge, was read, which prayed compensation for their arrears of pay in the Continental Army, and which had been paid in depreciated paper, a motion was made for granting leave to the petitioners to withdraw it.

Mr. GILES did not wish to bring the House into difficulties, but he wished, for the sake of information, to defer considering the case for a week, to which the House consented.

ROBERT RANDALL—CASE OF BRIBERY.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, requested the attention of the House, for a moment, to a subject of a very delicate nature. He understood that a memorial was, this morning, to be presented from some individuals, applying for a grant of a large tract of Western territory, and as the House had referred all such applications to the committee for bringing in the Land Office bill, of which he was Chairman; and as it was probable that the memorial, about to be presented, would be disposed of in the same manner, he conceived it a duty incumbent upon him to disclose to the House, at this time, some circumstances which had come to his knowledge. Mr. SMITH then said that, on Tuesday evening last, a person of the name of Randall called on him, requesting an hour of confidential conversation. In the interview which took place, Randall made a communication to the following effect: He intended to present a memorial, on the Monday following, to Congress, for a grant of all the Western lands lying between Lakes Michigan, Erie, and Huron, to the amount of about twenty millions of acres. He, and his associates, some of whom were Canada merchants, who had great influence over the Indians, proposed to form a company, and to undertake the extinction of the Indian title, provided Congress would cede to them the fee simple of the land. The property would be divided into forty shares, twenty-four of which should be reserved for such members of Congress as might favor the scheme, and might be inclined to come into it, after the adjournment of Congress, on the same terms as the original associators. Randall himself had the disposal of twelve shares, for members from the Southern States, and a colleague of his, a like number for those of the Eastern States. A certain number of shares were to be the property of those Canada merchants, who had an unbounded influence over the Indians occupying those lands, and who would, if this plan succeeded, pacify those Indians, who were the most hostile to the United States; that Gen. Wayne's treaty was a mere delusion, and that, without the co-operation of those influential persons, the United States would never have peace in that quarter. Mr. SMITH said that he communicated this overture, the next morning, to Mr. MURRAY, one of the members from Maryland, requesting his advice how to proceed on so delicate an occasion; that Mr. MURRAY recommended a disclosure to Mr. HENRY, of the Senate, and that, on a consultation with those gentlemen, it was resolved that it was Mr. SMITH's duty to make an immediate communication of the matter to the PRESIDENT, which was accordingly done.

Mr. MURRAY rose next. He had received an application of the same nature, but having already heard of the proposal, "I was," said he, "in a state of preparation, and my virtue had not such a shock to encounter, as that of the gentleman last up." Mr. M. corroborated what Mr. SMITH had said as to the communication of this affair to himself. He added, that he had advised Mr. SMITH to give Randall another meeting, for the purpose of developing his schemes and expectations more fully. Mr. M. said that Mr. SMITH informed him on Wednesday morning; next day, in the morning, he informed Mr. HENRY, of the Senate. Mr. SMITH, on that day, informed the PRESIDENT. On that day, (Thursday,) Mr. Randall was introduced to him, and asked an interview at his lodging; he gave him an appointment, at five in the afternoon. Mr. HENRY and he were together when Randall came in. Randall talked about the policy of extinguishing the Indian title to the Peninsula formed by Lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, containing about eighteen or twenty millions of acres of very good land; and talked in terms that he might have employed from a pulpit. He did not make any corrupt overtures, till Mr. M. had carried him into his own apartment. There Randall opened his proposals, as had been before mentioned by Mr. SMITH, observing that if Congress would sell this land to him and his company, they intended to divide it into forty or forty-one shares. Twenty-four shares were to be appropriated to such members of Congress as chose to support the memorial, which would be presented on Monday. The members were to have their shares upon the same terms on which his company should obtain the land. The company would give five hundred thousand, or perhaps a million of dollars; but on Mr. M.'s apparent acquiescence in his views, he said that the shares would be given to the members who advocated the measure, if they pleased to accept them, after they returned to their homes. Mr. M. started a difficulty about the embarrassment of land speculations, for which he, personally, had no genius; and then Randall instantly turned out the cat, and told him that if he did not choose the share of land, he should have cash in hand for his share. Mr. SMITH and Mr. MURRAY had resolved to disclose this to the House lest some innocent member might offer a memorial and become liable to suspicion. Randall had hinted that larger proportions would be assigned to the more active members, and lesser ones for the small fish.

The SPEAKER then rose, and expressed a wish that some gentleman would move for an order to apprehend Randall. Upon this Mr. SMITH again rose, and said that a warrant to this effect had yesterday been issued by the PRESIDENT, and to support which Mr. S. had made oath before a magistrate to the particulars above mentioned. He hoped that by this time the person was taken.

Mr. GILES next rose, and observed that an application from the same Mr. Randall had been made to himself. Besides a repetition of some particulars already stated, he told Mr. G. that he had already secured thirty or forty members of this House, but he wanted to secure three other members, if Mr. G. recollected right. He added, that he had already secured a majority of the Senate. When this proposal was first made, which Mr. G. thought was about ten days ago, a member from New York [Mr. LIVINGSTON] was present. Randall had even gone so far as to say, that a written agreement was drawn out, and subscribed by a number of Eastern members, and he wished Mr. G. to extend another obligation of the same kind for the Southern members; the purport of which paper was understood to be, that the members who voted in support of the disposal of the lands, were to be secured in a stipulated share of them, without having their names mentioned in the deed. Mr. G. was solicitous to learn the names of the members who had already entered into the negotiation, but Randall assured him, that, from motives of delicacy, he durst not communicate any of the names. Mr. G. then desired a sight of the agreement, that he might be able to comprehend its meaning, before he should attempt to draw any similar paper. The man called a second time, and, as Mr. G. conceived, about four days ago, but had never produced the deed or any draft of it. Mr. G. had already communicated the proposal to several members, and, in particular, to the SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER [Mr. DAYTON] mentioned, that Mr. GILES had, some time ago, informed him of the proposal. He replied, that if an opportunity offered, he would take care to select a committee consisting of members sure to detect the guilty, if any such could exist; adding that he expected the House to believe that he would not have used such words, but on so extraordinary an occasion.

Mr. CHRISTIE said, that he was the person who had introduced Randall to Mr. SMITH and Mr. MURRAY. He had long known him, as a respectable man. Randall had mentioned to Mr. C., in general, that it was a landed speculation, and hinted that he, Mr. C., might accept of a share. In reply, Mr. C. had assured him that he could not possibly have a concern in any such transaction. Randall had not, to Mr. C., insinuated that any undue advantage would accrue to members supporting the intended purchase.

Mr. BUCK, a member from Vermont, mentioned that a person of the name of Whitney, who appears to have been an associate with Randall, had called upon him in the country with a proposal of this kind.

Mr. MADISON said, that the person referred to had also called upon him, and told him of his having waited upon many members, and, among the rest, upon the SPEAKER. Mr. MADISON said, that the conversation was rather short, owing, perhaps, to the coldness with which the advances of Mr. Randall were received. Mr. MADISON had already learned, through his friend from Virginia, [Mr. GILES,] the state in which the business was. He did not wish to alarm the person by too much abruptness, and, at the same time, he did not wish to give himself any unnecessary trouble about it, as he understood that it would be properly managed without his interference.

Mr. LYMAN mentioned that Whitney had called on him, but spoke only of the plan generally. He was to have seen him again, but had not.

Mr. HEISTER wished to know whether any gentleman to whom Whitney had made proposals had made a communication to the Executive about it.

A resolution was then passed for directing the Sergeant-at-Arms, by an order from the SPEAKER, to apprehend Whitney.

Mr. HARPER moved that the warrant should include Randall. It was objected, that he was already in custody of the City Marshal.

Mr. VENABLE doubted whether an order from the SPEAKER of the House would have the effect to recover him from the custody of that magistrate. He likewise wished that a more particular description of Whitney could be given to the Sergeant-at-Arms. In the course of some conversation, it appeared that the House were not acquainted with the Christian names either of Randall or Whitney.

Mr. SWANWICK was of opinion that Randall should also be included in the warrant, as he might tell something which would cast light on the share of Whitney in this transaction.

Some debate ensued on the privileges of the House, and how far they are warranted to apprehend Randall.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that there was yet no official notice of his being apprehended; he therefore wished the warrant to run against him. If the Sergeant-at-Arms returned for an answer that he was already in custody, then the House might discuss the propriety of interfering with the office of the civil magistrate.

Mr. SEDGWICK had been informed by one of the Doorkeepers of his having seen Randall in custody. He implicitly believed the intelligence to be true.

Mr. MADISON said, that since Randall was already in custody, he did not perceive the necessity for issuing the writ against him instantly. It was a new case; and he would give his vote with more satisfaction if he was permitted to wait till tomorrow.

Mr. LIVINGSTON considered the offence as bailable. By this means Randall might in the interim escape. This would cast a serious reflection on the House. He advised to proceed immediately. The resolution to this effect was put, and carried.

TUESDAY, December 29.

CASE OF RANDALL AND WHITNEY.

A return was made by Mr. JOSEPH WHEATON, Sergeant-at-Arms to the House of Representatives. Mr. WHEATON stated that, agreeably to the order from the SPEAKER, he had taken into custody the bodies of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney, and kept them at the disposal of the House.

Mr. W. SMITH moved, that a Committee of Privileges, consisting of seven members, should be appointed, and instructed to consider and report with respect to the proper mode of proceeding in this case as to Robert Randall, and that the said committee shall have leave to sit immediately.

It was likewise moved that the name of Charles Whitney should be comprehended in the resolution, because he also was taken into custody. The resolution, as amended, was agreed to. Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. COIT, Mr. GILES, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. GOODHUE, were named for a committee.

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

Mr. PARKER made a report from the committee appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for establishing trading houses with the Indians. Mr. PARKER moved that it should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and recommended an early day, because he believed the present provisions expire about the end of this year. The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

SURVEY OF THE SOUTHERN COAST.

The report of the special committee on the petition of Parker, Hopkins, and Meers, was next taken up and read. Mr. HARRISON moved that it should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. BOURNE observed, that it would be proper to have the report printed for the use of members; and that consequently Thursday would be too early a day. On this, the consideration of the report was postponed till Friday.

THE TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

A letter was then delivered to the SPEAKER, enclosing a petition subscribed by two hundred and forty inhabitants of Bennington, in the State of Vermont, which he was requested by the letter to communicate to the House. The subject of this petition was the late Treaty with Britain, which the subscribers censure in severe terms. They state that they now look up exclusively to the House of Representatives, as the guardians of the public peace, welfare, and prosperity. They considered the House as more immediately concerned than any other branch of Government in the interest of the United States. The petitioners were apprehensive of being involved in European politics, and in a contest with the magnanimous Republic of France. They enumerated many articles of the Treaty, which they regarded as objectionable. Among others, they specified the arbitrary definition of piracy, and the interference, by various clauses of the Treaty, with the Legislative power of Congress; an interference which they dreaded, as tending to overturn and effect a total change in our present happy Constitution.

Mr. COOPER wished to have the names of the subscribers read over by the Clerk, that he might know whether every one of them could subscribe his name, and whether some of them signed only by marks. The petition was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. VENABLE, immediately after, presented two other petitions on the same topic, and after the same tenor, from certain citizens of the State of Virginia. They were referred to the same committee.

EXCISE DUTIES ON SNUFF.

Mr. MUHLENBERG presented a petition from Mr. Stimble, a snuff maker, in or near Philadelphia. He stated the oppressive and destructive consequences of the excise upon snuff. Besides which, the late heavy rains, in the end of last Summer, had swept away his mill, and a large quantity of manufactured snuff. His mill, for which he paid a large annual sum ($560) of excise, had stood idle for a considerable time, and the petition pointed out, in strong terms, the hardship of laying an excise upon a heap of ruins. Referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1796.

The House, on motion of Mr. SEDGWICK, then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report from the Committee of Ways and Means. The resolution reported was as follows:

Resolved, That an appropriation of moneys should be made to defray the expenses of the Civil List for the year 1796."

This resolution being read, Mr. SEDGWICK moved that the Committee should consent to it, and rise; which they did. The Committee rose, and reported progress. The House agreed, and the report was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, to prepare and bring in a bill to this effect.

The House then proceeded to consider the resolutions from the Committee on the state of the Union [Vide, Proceedings of Thursday, December 17.]

The resolution as to enforcing the existing operations for the discharge of the Public Debt was read, agreed to, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The resolution respecting the Mint was referred to a committee of three members.

It was then moved that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged from further consideration of the Letter from the Secretary of State, and the other communications by him formerly stated on this head, that they might be referred to the above committee. Both these motions were agreed to.

The resolution as to the Naval Department was then read, and referred to a committee of five members. On motion, by Mr. PARKER, the letter on this head, from the Secretary of War, and the papers that accompanied it, were referred to the same committee.

CASE OF RANDALL AND WHITNEY.

Mr. BALDWIN brought in a report from the Committee of Privileges. It was, in substance, that Robert Randall and Charles Whitney should be brought to the bar of the House and interrogated by the SPEAKER, touching the information lodged against them, on written interrogatories, which, with the answers, were to be entered on the Journals of the House; and that then, every additional question proposed by members should be reduced to writing, and put, on motion, by the SPEAKER. Thereafter, if any further measures were thought necessary, that they be proceeded in by a committee, to be appointed for that purpose. The report was agreed to by the House.

Mr. HARPER next moved a resolution, that the two prisoners shall be brought to the bar of the House to-morrow at 12 o'clock; and, in the mean time that the Committee of Privileges be ordered to prepare interrogatories to be put to them. He feared that time would be lost, if the prisoners were, this day, brought before the House.

Mr. BLOUNT was against the delay, for which he stated several reasons. He insisted that, at least, all intermediate communication between the prisoners should be prevented.

Mr. SEDGWICK recommended avoiding precipitation. He thought it better to delay the examination till to-morrow.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that it was usual for matters touching privilege to be determined immediately. From what was already known, he believed that the SPEAKER was sufficiently informed to put the requisite queries. He wished Randall and Whitney to be directly brought to the bar.

Mr. HAVENS had been applied to by Randall. He did not mention this circumstance yesterday, because so many other gentlemen had spoken in that way, that he felt himself unwilling to encroach on the time of the House. He was ready to communicate the particulars when necessary. The proposals made to him were, in sum and substance, the same with those communicated yesterday.

Mr. HARPER argued strongly against being in haste. The culprits were fellow-citizens, and entitled to time. It was alleged as an usual practice, to decide instantly on questions of privilege. It might be so, and perhaps this custom was not the more commendable for that. He thought that there was scarcely time before to-morrow, to prepare the necessary interrogatories. He was for delaying till to-morrow, but would cheerfully acquiesce in the vote of the House.

Mr. SEDGWICK, in answer to the precedent urged by his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. Wm. SMITH,] observed, that the promptitude to decide questions of privilege arose, very likely, from the impulse of passion, every appearance of which ought to be avoided.

Mr. NICHOLAS understood the end of this affair to be, exculpating the members, and satisfying the public mind. He was for beginning the examination immediately, without giving the prisoners time to prepare answers.

Mr. HARPER withdrew his motion, to make room for one brought forward by Mr. BLOUNT, which was for examining the prisoners immediately. Mr. H. did not recede from his original opinion, but by taking the sense of the House on Mr. B.'s motion, he would be directed as to his own.

DECEMBER, 1795.]

Case of Randall and Whitney.

[H. of R.]

The House agreed to bring in Randall immediately. In the mean time, a member observed that there was a material omission in the Journal of yesterday, as read this day by the Clerk. It had stated the attempt to corrupt members, but not that Randall had pretended thirty or forty of them to be gained already. This the gentleman thought the most criminal part of the charge. He therefore moved for an amendment of the Journal.

This motion produced a long and desultory debate.

The SPEAKER had never known an instance of this sort, after the Journal was, as in the present case, read over and already agreed to. He did not think that it could be done at all, unless the House were unanimous in it.

Mr. THATCHER said, that, as there was not any rule on the subject, he would be for adhering to the old practice, and not be for altering the Journals.

Several gentlemen now spoke. Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH saw no necessity for an amendment in the Journals at all. The additions proposed may be entered on the Journals of this day, and make a part of it; and, if it is needful, additions may be made in this way, for ten days to come. It was not like an indictment, which must be found by the jury all at one time.

Randall was now brought in by Mr. WHEATON, Sergeant-at-Arms, and the City Marshal. That part of the Journals which refers to his conduct was read to him.

The SPEAKER then interrogated the prisoner, whether these charges were true or false? Randall replied that he was not prepared to answer. He hoped that time would be given him. The SPEAKER asked what time he wanted? He could not positively tell; perhaps till the day after to-morrow.

Mr. W. SMITH was disposed to give him the time required.

Mr. BLOUNT said, that he felt for his own dignity as a member of the House, and for the dignity of the House. To suffer the prisoner to go away from the bar till he had said guilty, or not guilty, when thirty or forty members are positively charged with such conduct, and we suffer the culprit to withdraw, without obliging him to explain, will excite public suspicion that guilt is here.

Randall was then ordered to withdraw, till the discussion should be over.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was for making him say yes or no, directly, as to the guilt. If he wants to have time for pleading any thing in mitigation of his punishment, that is a quite different affair. But the honor of the House was concerned in making him give an immediate answer to the queries now put.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was for bringing Randall forward directly. He ought not to be allowed time to think of an answer.

Mr. HARPER felt as much as any man for the dignity of the House, but this would not induce him to proceed in a hurry. Mr. H. enlarged on the danger of indulging passion on this subject. It would be wrong to force the prisoner to answer unprepared. What if he refuses to answer at all? Confession amounts, in this case, to conviction. He was for granting indulgence.

Mr. VENABLE felt as much as any man for the dignity of the House. At the same time, he felt himself above suspicion, and the House above it. He would not wish to trample on the rights of an individual. He saw no danger that could arise to the House from a short delay. He referred to what Mr. HARPER had said about the hardship of making any man convict himself.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was also against hurrying the prisoner. He recommended that coolness and moderation should distinguish the proceedings of the House.

The question was then put, whether the prisoner should be obliged to answer immediately. Ayes 42, noes 48.

It was then moved, by Mr. W. SMITH, that he should be allowed till twelve o'clock, to-morrow.

Mr. BLOUNT proposed the yeas and nays on the latter question. A member observed that they should rather have been put on the one immediately preceding. The motion was supported only by four or five members. A fifth part of the House are requisite for calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLOUNT then laid on the table a long resolution. It was in substance, that before Randall was recommitted, he should be interrogated as to who where the thirty or forty members that had been gained to the scheme.

Mr. HARPER thought it extraordinary to bring a culprit before the House for contempt of it, and then encourage him to criminate members. He should ever protest against persons being brought to the bar for that purpose. He therefore moved to strike out from the resolution proposed by Mr. BLOUNT, the words: "And if you did, who are 'the members whom you considered as so secured; and what where your reason for thinking them so 'secured?'" This was the last clause of an interrogatory which Mr. BLOUNT proposed putting to Randall.

Mr. BLOUNT declared that he had never meant bringing an accuser to the bar, or propounding a question that should bring forth an accusation.

Mr. HARPER replied.

Mr. BLOUNT then modified his resolution, by striking out the exceptionable words; to which Mr. HARPER then agreed.

Mr. MURRAY called upon gentlemen by their sensibility to personal dignity, and the character of the House, to arrest the motion. Its tendency certainly was to place the honor of the House, or of a very great part of it, in the power of a man of whose profligacy of principle there could now be no doubt. Will you, he observed, permit, nay, invite him, whom you arraign at the bar of this House, to be a public accuser? Will you adopt a charge against him, which is in its nature an imputation that, however lightly and wickedly made, will implicate perhaps innocent men? These men, to rescue their own reputations, will be obliged to risk their characters, on the weight of their veracity, by denying this man's charge in the face of a world but too prone to suspect. By this motion,

H. OF R.]

Case of Randall and Whitney.

Randall's assertion to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES,] the only member who has mentioned it, is to be alleged against Randall as an offence. That Randall said to the gentleman that there were thirty or forty members secured, he had no doubt; but he believed the fact to be that Randall was both deceived himself and attempted to deceive the gentleman. Why, said Mr. M., the fellow told me that those thirty members were secured. Mr. M. had not thought proper to state that circumstance, because he did not so much consider it as a fact material to the detection of Randall's guilt, as it was one which, if mentioned, might possibly afford to malice an opportunity of affixing a stigma to any thirty or forty names at which personal enmity might point. No public good could result from such a disclosure; for the assertion of such a man as Randall could not, among men of honor, be deemed a sufficient ground of suspicion; and yet the malice of the world, or the rancor of personal enemies, might attach suspicion and infamy to almost the whole House, from the indefiniteness of the charge. When Randall informed him, on Thursday night, that there were thirty members who would support his measures, he had felt in the very conduct which he then was himself pursuing to detect Randall, to arrest his scheme, a principle of candor towards others, which taught him that other gentlemen to whom Randall had communicated his scheme confidentially, were probably determined as honestly as himself to crush the infamous plot against the honor of the House. He knew that he who would be wicked enough to attempt seduction, might be weak enough to use this intelligence artfully, for the purpose of leading him the more readily to accept terms of infamy; because the object was painted as easily attainable, and that Randall might wish to diminish all qualms, by exhibiting a pretended group of accomplices whose company would at least diminish the appearance of singularity. I entertained, said Mr. M., no suspicion of any man—I knew Randall to be a corrupt man from his offers to myself—I therefore placed all his intelligence to the score of flimsy art: I knew that such a man was not to be fully believed, where his interest was to magnify his success. I drew favorable auspices with respect to the corps to which I belong, from another piece of intelligence of his, which was, that he communicated to some members, one of whom he had named, and whom I knew to be a man of honor, in what he called the general way. This general way was a display of the sounder part of his scheme merely, and not the corrupt; consisting in developing the advantages which would result to the Union in the disposal of their lands, provided the harmony of the Indians could be secured. In this view of his plan he gave the subject an attitude far from unimposing; and I conceived that, as in proportion to the numbers engaged confidentially he must know that the hazard of detection increased, he would not communicate the corrupt view as long as he found the more honest part of the policy might appear to strike any gentleman as a measure useful to his country; I therefore did not believe Randall, in the sense he evidently intended; therefore, sir, I did not feel myself at liberty to mention the assertion which I conceived to be unavailing as a circumstance necessary to the example I wished to make, but which, if communicated, I thought might cast a stain, by the mystery that enveloped it, upon a body whose character ought to be held sacred to the confidence of the country. My duty was to bring Randall's attempt to corrupt unequivocally into light, not by repeating all the arts which he excited to corrupt; nor by exhibiting them in a way that might wound the feelings of men of honor, who, if charged even personally by Randall, would have no refuge from odium but in their characters and counter-assertion: this, though always conclusive with those who personally know them, is not a protection to minds of sensibility against the stings of calumny. The voice of fame is not composed from the voice of men of honor.

It was, he said, in the spirit of such reflections, that he and the gentleman with whom he had concerted the mode and time of disclosure [Mr. W. SMITH] had determined to trust rather to the as yet unstained honor of the House, than to the loose declarations of Randall; and therefore had resolved on Friday morning to make the disclosure before, that some gentleman, innocent of the corrupt scheme, and acquainted with the sounder part of the plan only, might have cause to blush at having presented a memorial which it would be their duty to defeat and to cover with infamy. If this charge is exhibited against Randall he will confess or deny it; if he confesses it, and in the disposition that often accompanies detected guilt, should name particular gentlemen, though their counter-assertion would completely, in his own mind, outweigh the charge of a corrupt and profligate accuser like Randall, yet would every man of delicacy have cause to regret that merely for the purpose of adding to the charges against a man proved to be wicked, a stain had glanced from him upon a name innocent and honorable. Let gentlemen act with magnanimity upon this occasion. Let them resist a motion, which, however purely conceived, may eventually wound honest fame, without detecting guilt. Mr. M. solemnly believed that Randall's assertion was either false totally, or true only as it respected those who had listened to him, for the purpose of making an example, or those to whom he had spoken in what he called the general way. If Randall denied this charge, it would rest on the assertion of the gentleman from Virginia, but could not affect members farther, than as the measure of inquiry seemed to imply suspicion. He and the gentleman from South Carolina had both acted upon the presumption of innocence in members, and they had resolved on the timely disclosure yesterday, lest even one member, however innocent, might be placed in a painful situation by presenting the memorial. If Randall is charged with this as an offence, he verily believed the House betrayed its own honor to the malice of the world; he would therefore vote decidedly against it.

Case of Randall and Whitney.

[II. OF R.]

Mr. M., in the course of his speech, added several other observations. He did not doubt that in every district on the Continent thirty favorites would be pointed out, whom the people in that quarter, or at least some among them, would be disposed to consign to infamy, and perhaps there was not one district in the Union where the same thirty members would be named. It would be said, "Sir, they are not named, but I know who are the men." So rapid were the communications of the press, so keen the appetite for scandal, that when once the story was circulated, it might be impossible ever to get rid of it.

Mr. GILES replied. He was in favor of the motion of Mr. BLOUNT. He said it was evident, from the way in which this whole communication had been brought forward, that there had been no previous correspondence between Mr. MURRAY and himself. They had felt differently. Mr. GILES had informed the SPEAKER of the House. Mr. MURRAY and his friend [Mr. W. SMITH] had communicated the affair to the PRESIDENT—a measure of which, as it struck Mr. GILES, he did not distinctly perceive the propriety. Mr. GILES had considered it as best to wait in silence, till the petition of Randall should come forward. Mr. MURRAY had suggested a variety of delicate motives for breaking the matter to the House, lest the petition should come forward, and hurt the feelings of an innocent and unsuspecting member. Mr. GILES did not wish to diminish the credit fully due to the gentleman in this respect. He himself had felt somewhat differently. He had acted differently.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was convinced that there was not a gentleman in the House, whose character rested on so slender a foundation, as to be affected by any thing that this man could say. He felt no anxiety for the reputation of the House, for he knew that it was not in the smallest danger. The resolution went merely to make Randall confess that he had said so and so. It implied nothing to affect members. A man covered with infamy making such charges could not expect credit, or obtain it from anybody. Mr. HILLHOUSE was, for these reasons, in favor of the resolution for interrogating Randall.

The resolution was now read, as follows:

"Resolved, That it be made a charge against the said Robert Randall, that he declared to a member of this House, that a number consisting of not less than thirty members of this House, had engaged to support his memorial."

Randall was then brought to the bar. The resolution was read to him, and he was informed that he must answer it to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

A motion for adjourning was then made. Ayes 26; so it was lost.

It was next moved and agreed, that Whitney should be brought to the bar. The SPEAKER then said, Is this the prisoner? Answered, yes. What is your name? Charles Whitney. What is your usual place of residence? Vermont. What are you? I was bred to the farming business. Do you know one Robert Randall? Yes. The Clerk will read to you the charge that has occasioned your being brought here. The charge, as stated in the Journal of the House, was then read to the prisoner. He was next interrogated by the SPEAKER, as follows: Are you guilty, or not guilty? Not guilty. Are you ready to speak in your defence? I am ready to tell every thing. Are you prepared to do so just now? Yes. Whitney then stated that he was connected with Randall in a plan for the purchase of eighteen or twenty millions of acres of land, lying between the Lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan. He had come to town on the design of presenting a petition to Congress, but had no knowledge of any improper kind of applications. Randall had several times called upon him at his lodgings, at the Green Tree, in North Fourth street. He considered the scheme to be of probable advantage, and a handsome thing to the United States as well as to the prisoner himself, who repeatedly observed that he would not have engaged in it, but with a view partly to his own interest. He had wished to engage influential characters in the business. He was then asked what associates he had. He answered, Colonel Pepune and Mr. Jones, of the State of Massachusetts; and Mr. Ebenezer Allen, of Vermont. He also, upon a query from the SPEAKER, mentioned the name of another person, which was not distinctly heard. He was asked if the partners meant to divide the land into forty shares. He answered forty-one; but this was only in speculation. They had only a rough idea of the extent of the land, which was inhabited by the Wyandotts, and was of a very good soil. The land was to be divided among the proprietors. The prisoner knew, in general, from Randall, that he called on Mr. SMITH, and other members; but was not privy to, nor suspected any unbecoming overtures. He was then asked the names of the associates at Detroit. He mentioned Mr. Erskine, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Innes, Mr. Pattison, and Mr. Erskine, junior. He said that some of them were Indian traders, to a considerable extent. He had called at Mr. BUCK's, of Vermont, (a member of the House,) as he was riding by his house. He knew him to be a gentleman of character, whose name would add credit to the business. He had told him that there were several other persons intending to be concerned, and that, if it was consistent with his situation as a member of Congress, he would be glad to have him engaged, but at the same time carefully noticed that this proposal was conditionally made, and only if it was proper. He was asked what Mr. Erskine was. He is called Judge Erskine, but whether he is now a Judge, or only was one in some other part of the country, at a former period, the prisoner cannot tell. You say that you came to Philadelphia about a month ago. Why were you so long in presenting your petition? He had a bad cold, and had been sick, and wanted to make a personal explanation to the members before bringing the affair before the House. Have you got any new associates in this city? None. Mr. LIVINGSTON then proposed a question, Whether any of the shares had been left unappropriated by your associates and you? An-answer: It was at his own option to dispose of shares as he pleased. He was asked if he could produce any written agreement between himself and his associates. He believed that he could, and that it would do him no harm to do so. It was at the Green Tree. But, as a matter of candor, he requested time to consider whether the production of it could hurt him or not. This ended the examination.

Mr. W. SMITH then made a motion, consisting of three points, that Whitney should be ordered to re-appear at the bar, at twelve o'clock, to-morrow; that he should be ordered to produce the bond; and that, till to-morrow, he should be remanded to the custody of the City Marshal. It was likewise recommended that, till to-morrow, the two prisoners be kept in separate apartments.

Mr. GOODHUE requested that Whitney might be ordered to withdraw; which was done. He then related that the prisoner had made an application to him at different times. Mr. GOODHUE told him that he knew very little of the Western country; he had always lived on the seacoast, and land jobbing was quite out of his line. Whitney did not make any corrupt proposals to him. He believed that it was because he was very averse to wasting time in speaking at all on the matter.

Mr. SEDGWICK said that, as no direct charge of corruption had been made against Whitney, he apprehended it would be improper to detain him as a prisoner. It might be considered as a wanton act of arbitrary power.

Mr. BUCK then rose, and said that he had not yesterday told the whole of what passed between him and Whitney. Mr. BUCK had received offers plain enough to be understood. He might either have land, or money in lieu of it.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that he had now no opposition to the resolutions; which were carried.

Mr. HARPER then laid on the table a resolution relative to the duties on exports, which was read;

And the House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 30.

JOHN PAGE, from Virginia, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

CASE OF RANDALL AND WHITNEY.

Mr. W. SMITH moved an amendment of the Journal to this effect, that the said Charles Whitney had made overtures to Mr. BUCK, to this purpose, that he should have a share in the lands to be purchased, or in money.

Mr. NICHOLAS objected to the motion. The reading of the Journal was called for. It was read.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that the original charge against the man was complete and full. He thought the amendment unnecessary.

A petition was then presented from Randall requesting that he might be indulged with a reasonable time to make his defence, and with counsel.

Mr. W. SMITH moved that the prayer of the petition should be granted, and that the further examination should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. HILLHOUSE had no objection to granting counsel. I am willing, said he, that every man shall make the best defence which he can. But bring him before us. Were I to decide on the criminality, I would wish to hear the evidence.

Mr. WILLIAMS observed, that as it had been said that a number of members were implicated in the business, he conceived that all further proceedings should be before the whole House. It was true, it might require more time; but the honor and dignity of the Legislature is concerned in giving the greatest publicity to their proceedings.

Mr. SWANWICK objected to a reference to a select committee. The attempt is the first of the kind that has ever been made against the members of the Legislature of the United States; and, therefore, our proceedings cannot be too public, and ought to be attended with the utmost solemnity.

Mr. BRADBURY proposed a division of the question, and that the sense of the House should be first taken on that part relative to allowing him counsel.

Mr. KITCHELL objected to allowing counsel; he stated the difficulties and delays which would be the result of allowing counsel. The consequences he feared would be, that an opening would be made for an imputation on the honor of the House. He thought the duty of the House was plain, and that they ought immediately to proceed to an examination of the prisoner.

Mr. LIVINGSTON objected to both parts of the motion in the present stage of the business. When the interrogatories are put, and the answers received, it will then be time to determine on the propriety of granting counsel. He was equally opposed to a reference to a select committee until a more complete examination of the business.

Mr. SMITH withdrew his motion, so far as it relates to a reference to a select committee.

Mr. BALDWIN said, that the motion for a reference to a select committee, if rejected, would be to counteract the report of the Committee of Privileges, which has already been adopted by the House. Mr. B. entered into a consideration of the inconveniences attending the discussion of complicated facts by so large a body as the House. He instanced several precedents to show that Congress had almost in every case proceeded by select committees. Mr. B. added, that if further satisfaction was wanted by any member, he supposed it proper that the prisoner should be further interrogated.

Mr. SEDGWICK was in favor of allowing counsel. He insisted that it was not merely a privilege, but a right of every citizen of the United States. He said that the circumstance of the House being both accuser and judge, afforded very great additional reason why he should be allowed counsel. Mr. S. cited the Constitution to show the right of the prisoner to counsel.

Case of Randall and Whitney.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MADISON was in favor of allowing counsel. He thought the motion would stand better if it went to allow him to answer the interrogatories by the advice of counsel.

Mr. NICHOLAS supported the affirmative of the motion. He thought it of consequence that every indulgence used in courts of law, so far as they are applicable to the present case, should be allowed.

Mr. MURRAY said, that he was decidedly for the prayer of the petition itself, rather than for any amendment of the proposition before the House. He wished the prisoner to have the advantage of all the ingenuity of all the counsel he chose to employ. He thought Randall entitled certainly to the aid of counsel, as well on his examination as on his defence: and he believed that the dignity of the House, as well as the rights of the offender, would be best consulted by permitting him to have every advantage. As he was one of those who disclosed the prisoner's crime, so he felt himself peculiarly bound to see that every indulgence consistent with the justice which gentlemen owed themselves, should be extended to him. He felt that the grant of the prayer would be a particular indulgence to himself.

Mr. HARPER objected to the interference of the House in respect to counsel. It appeared to him that the prisoner had a right to employ what counsel he pleased; and he may answer the interrogatories of the House by the advice of one or more lawyers, standing at his side, as any other citizen might stand. He suspected, however, that the prisoner meant, by counsel, to bring a lawyer into the House to plead his cause. If this was the case, he thought the prayer of the petitioner was improper.

Mr. W. SMITH was very ready to allow the prisoner counsel for his defence, but, in so doing, he wished it to be understood, not as a matter of right, but of favor. He was apprehensive that gentlemen in proceeding from one step to another, would at last reason away the privileges of the House altogether. His friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SEDGWICK] had quoted the clause of the Constitution which gave a right to have counsel in all trials for crimes: but it did not apply to this case, any more than the clause which immediately followed it, declaring that all trials for crimes should be by a jury of the vicinage, and after presentment by a grand jury. The present inquiry was of a special and peculiar nature, resulting from the rights and privileges which belonged to every Legislative institution, and without which such institution could not exist. As every jurisdiction had certain powers necessary for its preservation, so the Legislature possessed certain privileges incident to its nature, and essential for its very existence. This is called in England the parliamentary law; and as from that law are derived the usages and proceedings of the several State Legislatures, so will the proceedings of this House be generally guided by the long-established usages of the State Legislatures. There would be a manifest absurdity in conforming the proceedings in this case to the ordinary proceedings at law in jury trials, for the House, instead of being able to protect itself, would be altogether dependent on the other branches of the Government, and in every case of aggression be obliged to send the offenders to the civil magistrate. If there was any weight in such reasoning as had been heard, then the House would have to tread back all the unconstitutional steps they had been taking, and to discharge, without delay, both the prisoners, for the arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the SPEAKER'S warrant, was only justifiable on the ground he had mentioned, namely, the inherent and indispensable power of self-preservation. That the House possessed power to arrest had not been denied, but the power of commitment was incident to that of arrest, and if it possessed both these high powers, it must of consequence possess the necessary incident of trial or inquiry, in regulating which the House was only to be governed by its own wisdom and discretion. On this occasion Mr. S. said he felt, as he trusted every member did, a proper respect for the rights of individuals brought to the bar, as well as for those of the House, and he hoped that their conduct would be marked with discretion and temper: but, willing as he was to grant the prayer of the petitioner, he could not suffer the argument which had been relied on to pass unanswered. This was the first instance, since the organization of this Government, in which it had been found necessary to resort to this high prerogative: it was right, therefore, that the principles on which it was founded should be well understood, and that the privileges of the House should stand unimpaired. The importance of the subject would be his apology for deviating a little from the question before the House. He then remarked, on the assertion of his colleague, [Mr. HARPER,] that "there was no rule of the House which prevented the prisoner being accompanied to the bar by half a dozen lawyers, who might all prompt him in his replies." If any person, said Mr. S., whether lawyer or not, should intrude himself to furnish answers for the prisoner to the interrogatories put by the SPEAKER, such person would be undoubtedly guilty of a gross indecorum, for which he would be liable to the censure of the House. He confessed he saw no necessity for counsel to aid the prisoner in simply answering whether he was guilty or not; if he acknowledged the charges, they would then decide on the mode of punishment; if he denied them, then counsel would be very properly allowed to aid him in proving his innocence. In the precedents, he said, which had come to his knowledge, he found the practice to be this: The prisoner, on being brought to the bar, was interrogated as to the charges; if he admitted them, he was either reprimanded and discharged, or committed to prison, to abide the further order of the House, but such imprisonment could not continue beyond the session; if he denied the charge, then an inquiry was had before a select committee, who reported the facts to the House. This appeared the proper mode of proceeding, and he hoped it would be pursued on the present occasion. He concluded with saying, that he should vote for allowing counsel to assist the prisoner in his defence.

Mr. DREW moved that the prayer of the petition should be granted, and that Randall be allowed till to-morrow, to be heard at the bar.

The petition was again read.

Mr. CHRISTIE had known Randall for many years, and had never heard of any thing against him before. He had lately been at Detroit, and Mr. C. believed that he had been injured by keeping bad company. He was not the first man in the country who had been corrupted by British influence and British company. He moved that Randall should be allowed till to-morrow at twelve o'clock. This was negatived.

The SPEAKER then said, that, if agreeable to the House, he would send for Randall, and inquire what time he wanted. This was done; Randall came in, and asked till Saturday, but as the House does not sit on Saturday, Friday was appointed.

The bond or agreement between the intended purchasers of the land was then read. It was dated at Detroit, the 26th of September last. Allen, Whitney, and Randall, were to have the disposal of 36 shares out of 41.

Mr. MURRAY informed the House that he had yesterday morning made a deposition as to the circumstances of the application to him before a District Judge, and that he would move for putting it on the Journals.

Charles Whitney was then called in; the information of Mr. BUCK was then read to him. He denied having made any corrupt overtures. He was ordered to withdraw.

Mr. MILLEDGE observed that the proposals to Mr. BUCK took place before the session began. It is admitted that the utmost which can be done to the prisoners is confinement till the rising of the session; if our power does not go beyond the end, it seems not to extend previous to the beginning of the session.

Mr. W. SMITH thought this a new question. He was for referring to a select committee.

One or two resolutions were made and withdrawn: at last, on a motion made by Mr. MADISON, the subject was referred to the Committee on Privileges, to consider and report to the House the proper mode of conducting the further inquiry. Adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 31.

RICHARD WINN, from South Carolina, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

TARIFF OF DUTIES.

Mr. HARPER called up his resolution, laid on the table some days ago, that the proper officers of the Treasury Department should be ordered to make out a tariff of duties, and goods imported, and the respective amount of the duty on each article, in the years 1793 and 1794, with a statement of the expenses of collection. Mr. H. thought it of consequence for the House to know precisely the effect of their operations in imposing duties.

On some articles it might be found expedient to reduce, and on others to augment the burden.

Mr. GALLATIN proposed that the resolution should be printed, as it was of considerable length, in order that the members might know exactly its meaning.

Mr. VENABLE did not entirely comprehend the object of the resolution. He imagined that a tariff of duties might be obtained from the laws without having recourse to the officers of the Treasury.

Mr. HARPER thought it was not unusual for a Legislative Assembly to cause the officers of the Treasury, or other characters of that kind, to select and combine materials for their own information.

The resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

CASE OF RANDALL.

A letter was read from Robert Randall, addressed to the SPEAKER. He represented that at present counsel were not to be had, because the Supreme Court sits till Saturday evening, and, till it rises, all the gentlemen of the bar are pre-engaged. Sensible of the obligations which he had incurred already to the indulgence of the House, it was painful for him to solicit any further delay. The circumstances of the case made this step necessary. But if the House were to grant him a further indulgence, he should be prepared with his defence by the earliest part of next week; and, at any rate, he should on no account whatever ask longer time.

Mr. SWANWICK was for granting Randall a delay till Tuesday. To-morrow was the first day of the new year, and it was likely, when the House adjourned, that they might adjourn till Monday. On some explanation he withdrew his motion, and Randall's letter was ordered to lie on the table.

FORTIFICATIONS, MILITARY STORES, &c.

Mr. MALBONE laid on the table a resolution for appointing a committee to take into consideration the state of the harbors and fortifications of the United States, and of the military stores, and what measures had been taken for procuring proper sites for arsenals. The resolution was taken up and agreed to, and a committee of three members was appointed to inquire and report.

NAVAL ARMAMENT.

Mr. S. LYMAN observed, that two years had elapsed since, upon an estimate then brought forward, a Naval Armament was ordered. As progress had been made in the business, he wished that the House should learn how far experience had proved the estimates just. It was also interesting to know what sums had been expended in this business. Towards obtaining this information, he laid on the table a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the proper officers to lay before the House a statement of expenses already incurred for the Naval Armament."

PENAL CODE.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what alterations may be necessary in the penal laws of the United States, laid on the table a motion from that committee. This was, that the PRESIDENT should be requested to obtain for their information a list of all the convicts who have been tried under the present laws, with a note of the date of their trial, the place where the offence was committed, and an account of the punishment inflicted. The committee were not able to proceed without information of this sort to make a basis for their report. It was moved to amend the motion by adding, after the words "criminal offences," "after conviction," as it might be an endless business to inquire about offences, where no trial or punishment had ensued. This amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VENABLE did not know of any immediate connexion between the PRESIDENT and the Federal Courts. Many convictions might happen in places where records would not easily be come at. He did not wish to cast obstruction in the way of the business, but had mentioned this as a difficulty which struck him.

Mr. HILLHOUSE did not see the use of the motion. There must be some uniform system of punishment in every part of the United States. If more crimes were committed in one State than another, still the punishment would be the same.

Mr. LIVINGSTON defended his resolution; which was carried.

Mr. SEDGWICK then moved that a committee should, as usual in such cases, be appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT with the resolution. A committee of two members was accordingly appointed.

CASE OF RANDALL AND WHITNEY.

Mr. BALDWIN, the Chairman of the Committee of Privileges, reported, in part, on the subject of the further proceedings to be had in the case of R. Randall and C. Whitney, in substance as follows:

1. That a further hearing of R. Randall should be held at the bar; that the information given by members against the said Randall be reduced to writing, signed by the informants respectively, and entered at large on the Journals; that the said information should be read to the prisoner, and he be asked by the SPEAKER what he had to say in his defence. If the prisoner should desire to produce any parol evidence to exculpate himself, the same shall be heard at the bar, and the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania be requested to attend to administer an oath or affirmation to the witnesses on the part of the prisoner; that the SPEAKER shall put all questions to the witnesses. When any debate should arise, that the prisoner and his counsel be directed to withdraw; and, when he has concluded his defence and withdrawn, that the sense of the House be taken on the guilt or innocence of the prisoners, respectively.

Mr. LYMAN wished to know upon what principle the committee had introduced the Judge into their report. He could see none. He feared that they would encroach on the privileges of the House. Mr. L. moved to strike out that clause.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. THATCHER then moved to amend the clause thus: "Witnesses on behalf of this House and of the prisoner." After some debate the motion was withdrawn.

A motion was then made to insert the words "sworn to," after the word "writings;" referring to the information already given by members to the House.

Mr. W. SMITH objected to this amendment. He stated a distinction between this examination and a common law suit. He had never heard of any member of a Legislative Assembly being called on to make oath to his information. He would for his own part, cheerfully acquiesce in the resolution adopted by the House. A member might be liable to be cross-questioned by the counsel for the prisoner or by himself. We are not here to proceed by law, but by privilege. Suppose a member were to be insulted by a stranger in the lobby, would he, on making his complaint be obliged to swear to it? Surely not. What is to become of the privileges of the House if we go on as a Court of Law? It would be giving them up. Mr. S., as to himself, was ready to make oath over again to his deposition before the Judge of the District.

Mr. MADISON was of opinion that no citizen can be punished without the solemnity of an oath to the fact. Of consequence, it is needful to the information of members, if the punishment of a fellow citizen is implicated. Perhaps it may be urged that members, having taken an oath to support the Constitution, this supersedes the necessity of an oath in the present case.

Mr. MURRAY had his deposition in his hand. He believed that all the gentlemen who had given information on this affair would make oath to it. He imagined that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] had done so already.

Mr. GALLATIN thought it reasonable that members should be liable to be questioned upon oath. That there was no precedent for it, had little weight. There are many absurdities in the Law of Nations which gentlemen would not wish to introduce here.

Mr. SWIFT was against the members being subject to this regulation. The case was quite novel to him. But this was, at first view, his way of thinking. Suppose that some person in the gallery were to commit an insult on the House, before the whole members, would it be necessary that they should all swear to the offence before proceeding to punish it? This Mr. S. regarded as a parallel case.

Mr. THATCHER made a distinction when an offence had been committed in presence of the whole House, and when committed out of their view. In the former case, there could not be any use for evidence being sworn, because the whole House had the testimony of their senses. It was different when the circumstances occurred in another place; and Mr. T. was convinced that the charge ought to be sworn to. The passage under amendment was in these words: "That it should be reduced to writing;" and the dispute was about adding the words, "and sworn to." Mr. T., though for examining the members on oath as to the charge against Randall, was opposed to the amendment as useless, because the members must, in his opinion, be sworn when Randall is brought to the bar. The mere declaration of a prosecutor, not under oath, and of a defendant in the same situation, are equally exceptionable. A phrase had been repeatedly used which Mr. T. did not understand. It was said that a member was entitled "to stand up in his place" and give information so and so. With the meaning of this expression Mr. T. was unacquainted, nor did he know any law which authorized the imprisonment of a fellow-citizen on a mere charge unsupported by oath. He did not see the use of the amendment, but he was clearly satisfied that members ought to be examined and sworn touching their accusations, as well as any other persons.

Mr. NICHOLAS was not, in this instance, for departing from the principles of Common Law. Instead of supporting the dignity of the House, about which so much has been spoken, he was afraid that, by arrogating too much on the side of privilege, they might lessen their dignity. He declared, upon his honor, that he thought the gentlemen concerned should, for their own sakes, insist on being cross-examined by the prisoner and his counsel. To be cross-examined implies no reflection on a witness. The imperfection of human nature requires such a precaution, and were Mr. N. a party, he would insist on being cross-examined. The proposed amendment would narrow the business too much. It would be better to lay it aside, and let the members be, as above proposed, subject to cross-examination from the prisoner.

Mr. MADISON said, that when Randall came to the bar he would possibly save all this trouble, by confessing his guilt, and casting himself on the mercy of the House. He mentioned an anecdote of a Judge who had been publicly insulted. He informed his brethren of the Bench, and, on his complaint, the offender was apprehended. When he was brought before the Court the oath was administered to the Judge. Mr. M. related this story to show the propriety of every accusation being sworn to, whatever may be the rank or situation of the accuser.

The motion for amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SENGWICK hoped that the members would be sworn and cross-examined. He was decidedly of opinion that this ought to be the case.

Mr. MURRAY said that if the House were not defensible on the doctrine of privilege, where would an authority be found for what they had already done? We all know, and we all knew at the time of committing Randall, that it was done without any support from law. By carrying this reasoning to its utmost length, the SPEAKER might be liable in an action of damages; and Mr. M. would rejoice in the ingenuity of any lawyer who should discover that all the House were in the same predicament.

It was then moved to adjourn. The motion was negatived. Another amendment was proposed, and, after a few words, withdrawn. A member next proposed that when this House adjourn, it shall be till Monday next. Negatived. The House then, without coming to any decision, adjourned till to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 1, 1796.

A letter from Mr. Charles Petit to the SPEAKER, was read by the Clerk. Mr. Petit stated that he was the surviving partner of the late Major General Greene and Mr. John Cox, in the office of Quartermaster General. There was enclosed a long memorial to the House, to which he requested particular attention. The memorial was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CASE OF RANDALL AND WHITNEY.

The House proceeded in the consideration of the report of the Committee of Privileges. The report was read.

Mr. BALDWIN remarked that the discussions of yesterday had served to convince him more and more that the plan proposed by the Committee of Privileges in their first report, was the most eligible that could be adopted; and, he added, that the further the House proceeded in the business, as they did yesterday, the more they would be convinced of the necessity of referring the ulterior proceedings to a select committee. After the House have had the parties before them, interrogatories have been proposed and answered, the prisoners do not plead guilty, and yet there appears to be cause for retaining them in custody. He was convinced that the select committee was alone competent to taking and arranging the evidence for the decision of the House. Mr. B. concluded his remarks by moving that the further consideration of the report of the committee of Privileges should be postponed till Thursday next. If that was agreed to, he should then move for a select committee.

Mr. HULLHOUSE stated a variety of objections to a reference to a select committee. He supposed it highly improper for the witnesses to be sworn by a select committee, and that committee to send for the members and have them sworn and examined in that private way. However troublesome and difficult, the House must meet all the questions and decide them on this floor. He insisted that the practice of the House did not justify a reference to a select committee of a business of this magnitude. Adverting to the debate of yesterday, relative to the members being under oath, he said that he was opposed to the measure. The great and important interests of the citizens of the United States are committed to the wisdom of the members of this House, and they are under a solemn oath for the faithful discharge of their duty; and, therefore, the declaration of the members, as such, is entitled to full and entire credit.

Case of Randall and Whitney.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. W. SMITH said, that the objections of the gentleman from Connecticut are contrary to the daily practice of the House. The investigation of facts is constantly performed by select committees, and he saw no force in the remarks of the gentleman relative to a private investigation. The prisoners will be attended by their counsel, and, as to the members of the House, the committee can take no measures which are not sanctioned by the House. Mr. S. cited several incidents in the precedents of the House, to show that equally important cases had been referred to select committees. The report is not to be final, it is to be submitted to the House for a final decision. Mr. S. remarked that he supposed a select committee would be appointed which would not include any of the members who had given information to the House on the subject.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH next rose, and spoke as follows: I will take up the subject where we left it yesterday. Debates have run into length and perplexity on this occasion, which, I presume, has been owing to our ideas running too much in the legal line. We seem to consider ourselves as bound by the rules and usages of Common Law Courts. If we are, I am free to say that we have begun wrong, we have progressed wrong, and we will end wrong. The rules and usages of Law Courts arise from, and are founded upon, pre-existing laws. Here there is no preceding law, and, therefore, whatever we have done, or shall do, is a mere nullity. Shall we then give up this business as impracticable? No. We will assert the privilege of this House. And what is this privilege? Perhaps it never has been defined, nor its extent and limits ascertained; perhaps it never ought. The Parliament of Great Britain has studiously avoided the discussion. But I will presume to assert that it is a necessary and competent power lodged in this House, ex necessitate rei, by which we are enabled to defend ourselves against insult from within and contamination from without; and this power is to be exercised at the discretion of the House, and is bound by no rules but what arise from common sense and common justice. Shackle it by standing regulations and it is no longer discretion, it is law. Every case that occurs must stand on its own bottom, and be determined according to attendant circumstances.

My opinion, therefore, and I do assure you, sir, I speak with great diffidence, but my duty compels it—is this: that Randall be brought to the bar of this House; that it be demanded of him whether he is guilty of the facts he has already been charged with? He no doubt will say, No, I am not guilty. In reply, I would say to him, sir, I do not believe one word you say, for several honorable members have solemnly declared that you are guilty; and what you have now to do, and all you have to do, is to convince the House, if you can, that, although your conduct was crime, still you are not criminal, because your motives were not corrupt, and your intentions were pure, and you offended merely from ignorance. Then you may, perhaps, meet with a gentle reprimand for your indiscretion. But, if you fail in this, we will put it out of your power, during the session, to insult the members with your rascally proposals. A dozen lawyers may attend him, pocket his money, and walk away at their leisure. I have no objection, if they do but keep silence whilst they are here.

Mr. SHERBURNE said, that, if the gallery had been cleared before the affair of Randall and Whitney was first brought before the House, he would have been ready to consent to a private examination before a select committee; but the charge was made in the face of the world, and hence a citizen of America was entitled to an open trial. Alluding to the speech of Mr. ISAAC SMITH, Mr. SHERBURNE thought it highly injurious to presume any man guilty, because he had been accused by members of the House. What is it to Randall who are the accusers, what are their characters, or whether they are members of this House or not? We talk about the dignity of the House—the rights of our fellow-citizens are equally entitled to respect and attention. What a doctrine has been held up to day! That a man is guilty, because he has been accused by members of this House! No, sir: every man is presumed innocent till he is proved guilty. Mr. S. concluded by wishing that the doors had been shut when the subject was first introduced.

Mr. MURRAY recommended that the subject should be remanded to a committee, which would save a good deal of time.

Mr. SHERBURNE.—When we speak of privileges of the House, it seems a word of cabalistic meaning. Will any gentleman define or point out these privileges? In what book of the laws are they written? If they are indefinite, we may come to be hereafter as irregular as a Convention, and our sentences as dreadful as those of a revolutionary tribunal. The latter, when they thought fit, refused to hear the evidence of a prisoner, under pretence that they had already conveyed to their minds a sufficient conviction of his guilt, and he was instantly hurried off to the scaffold. It seemed that this allusion referred to the idea of a gentleman from New Jersey, that because Randall had been accused by members of that House, the House were authorized to conclude him guilty.

The term of leges non scriptas had been used by the gentleman last up as to the privileges of the House. The phrase, Mr. S. thought, to be derived from the first Constitutional Assembly of France. They had applied it, along with the word inviolability, to Louis XVI., and soon after cut off his head. They had declared that he, like the King of England, could do no wrong. We have no such officers, thank God, in America, and Mr. S. hoped that we never should have them. The PRESIDENT is, by the Constitution, declared impeachable; this House, &c., are also declared to be so. Where, then, is the inviolability talked of?

Mr. MURRAY said, that we might represent this matter in a painful light to the public eye; but he insisted that it was essential to support the privileges of the House. The measure of apprehending Randall and Whitney had at first been assented to by all the members. The gentleman who spoke last had, among others, embarked himself in it.

A vote was then taken on the motion for postponing the further consideration of this affair till Thursday next. Only eighteen gentlemen rose in the support of it.

Mr. HILLHOUSE then moved to strike out the following words from the report, viz: "witnesses on behalf of the prisoner," and to insert, "all witnesses, excepting members of this House, who may give information in their places; and that all questions to any member shall be put by the SPEAKER, under the direction of the House."

Mr. S. SMITH rose to speak a few words on the question of swearing members; because, when the examination should commence, it would be necessary for him to come forward. He also had the honor of a visit from Mr. Randall. Before Mr. SMITH went last to Baltimore, the man had called upon him at his lodgings. He requested and obtained a private conference, wherein he represented the great advantage that would accrue to the United States by removing the Indians to the other side of the Lakes; that this could be done by the influence of certain merchants in Canada. And then he proceeded to the detail of the plan, in much the same terms as have already been mentioned in the accounts of Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. GILES. When Mr. S. SMITH came back into the room, he said to a gentleman now sitting by him, and who lodged with him, [Mr. BRENT, from Virginia,] that he suspected there was another Georgia business going forward; and that "I might, perhaps," said Mr. SMITH, smiling, "make my fortune in the Northwestern Territory." The man spoke with so much decisiveness, that Mr. SMITH was forced to give him some degree of credit when he said that he had secured a majority. He was afraid of coming into a delicate situation, if he should mention the proposal in the House, if there really was any sort of foundation for the report. He could not have had an idea of any man coming forward and flatly telling such a story, without some reason to think himself telling truth. Mr. SMITH now understood how these people, while attempting to deceive others, had in reality deceived themselves. Mr. S. SMITH had listened with patience to the man in the view of getting the whole out of him. Other gentlemen did the same, and this Randall construed into approbation. Randall clearly conveyed to me the idea that such members of Congress who actively supported their memorial might have a large share in those lands, and those who only gave their consent, a smaller. These were the words of Randall, who likewise mentioned the number of Senators who were, as he termed them, snug. Just after this application, Mr. SMITH was obliged to return to Baltimore on business, and had, on his way, been puzzled in his own mind what to think of this intelligence, or what to make of it. [Mr. S. SMITH had not been in the House since the Randall affair was laid open, which explains the lateness of his rising to speak.] As to the point before the House, Mr. SMITH was for the members (of whom he would be one) being examined upon oath.

Mr. NICHOLAS was in favor of the oath being administered to members. It had been alleged that the oath taken to the Constitution took away the necessity for another on giving evidence against Randall and Whitney. If that oath serves here, it may also regulate our conduct everywhere else, and we may refuse to swear before an ordinary Court of Justice. The oath to the Constitution was not sufficiently connected with the present case. It either does not apply to the question before the House, or it likewise applies to all other judicial cases. He hoped that the House would never arrogate to themselves such a privilege as that now contended for. Any improper assumption would make the House incur suspicion, and, he would add, contempt.

Mr. SHERBURNE, in reply to something which had fallen from a preceding member, rose again to take away any possibility of suspicion that his arguments glanced at members personally—an idea the most remote from his mind. If he had a trial depending where all he had to lose in the world was at stake, so perfect and unlimited was his confidence in the members who gave information about Randall, that he would take their verbal declarations on any point with as much readiness as if they had been on oath. It was the principle which he looked to. Randall himself had a right to be satisfied of his having a fair trial. The House, like Cæsar's wife, ought to be above suspicion. As to the argument that the oath taken by members at their admission to a seat in the House prevented the necessity of swearing in the present case, this doctrine reminded Mr. SHERBURNE of something which he had once seen. A clergyman of New England was, in the course of a trial, called on to give evidence. When the Clerk was going to administer the oath, he turned round to the Judges, and inquired whether his ordination oath, taken many years before, would not save him a repetition of that ceremony now.

Mr. BRENT, in a few words, related the application of Randall to Mr. S. Smith, as already stated, with Mr. S. SMITH's remark that this seemed to be a second Georgia business.

Mr. GILES had hitherto been silent; but the turn which the question was taking, induced him to rise and submit his opinion to the House. He saw only two reasons for proceeding on the doctrine of privilege. First, where it rose from the necessity of the case. In the present instance, he saw no necessity for any exemption of members from giving evidence with the usual solemnities. The second reason for insisting on privilege might be the dignity of the House. In a country like this, where parade is laid aside, dignity consists in doing right—in adhering to the principles of substantial justice. The House would not consult their dignity if they should attempt to separate themselves from the mass of the people. For his own part, Mr. G. should not feel right, if he was to give information without the usual solemnities. He would, therefore, vote that the amendment, so far as it related to exempting members from giving oath, should be struck out.

Two other amendments were successively proposed to the amendments of Mr. HULLHOUSE. It was difficult to hear them distinctly; and the less material, because all the reasonings of gentlemen turned on this single point, whether it was consistent with the privileges of the House to let its members be examined upon oath.

Mr. W. SMITH stated the inconsistent situations in which this plan, if adopted, would involve gentlemen. A member is giving evidence, upon oath, at the bar: a question is proposed to be put to him, and the member leaves his place as an evidence, and assumes that of a judge to give his vote in deciding whether such a question shall be put to himself. Where was the propriety of shifting characters in this Proteus-like manner? Mr. S. knew no instance where the members of a Legislative body were ever sworn by that body, on giving evidence about a question of privilege. It happened only where there was a trial before the House. The moment you decide that members are to be sworn, they are virtually suspended; for, on any question which they were to answer as witnesses, they would not have a title to determine as judges. The moment that you resolve this thing to be determined by the rules of judicial evidence, you alter the whole nature of the transaction: your former proceedings are admitted to have been wrong, and Randall may bring an action against the SPEAKER for damages and wrong imprisonment.

Mr. BRENT observed, that when the writ for apprehending Randall and Whitney was issued, he had his doubts that the House were proceeding too far: he was suspicious that they exceeded the limits of their authority. In the present stage of the business, he was less indeterminate in his opinion on the present question, relative to the members being on their oath as witnesses. He thought it noways derogatory to them as members, nor would it be so to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; it could not lessen the dignity of any character whatever. Mr. B. was in favor of the House proceeding so as to give the accused all the advantages they could derive from counsel in a Court of Law. He saw no reason for a departure from the common rules of taking evidence. It is said not to be usual for Legislative bodies to proceed as a Court of Judicature, and that members of Legislative bodies are not put on oath in their Legislative capacities. This idea is derived from the practice of the Parliament of Great Britain. Is that a sufficient precedent for us? He hoped not. Our great object is this: that the House be secured from disrespect and insult. This idea forms the basis on which its privileges as a Legislative body are supported. It is from the nature of the case, and not from British precedents, that the privileges of this House are derived. Adverting to the members being sworn, he conceived that there was no more impropriety in it, on the ground of their being judges, than there is in the Judge of a Court, who, when called on to give evidence, descends from the Bench—is sworn—gives his testimony with the customary solemnities—resumes his seat—and ultimately gives judgment.

Mr. HARPER was in favor of the members being sworn to the truth of the declarations, when called on to give evidence. He knew of nothing in the present case that rendered it necessary they should be exempted. Evidence on oath is the basis of law proceedings in this country. It had been affirmed by Mr. SMITH, (his colleague,) that if a Judge were insulted in his office, the Court would proceed immediately to punish the offender. Mr. H. said he apprehended not: the Judge must make oath to his complaint. It has been said that the members cannot with propriety be interrogated or cross-questioned. The inference from this is, that because we are judges in our own cause, we will preclude the accused from the usual modes of vindicating themselves. Mr. H., in adverting to the members being sworn, disclaimed all personal considerations. The gentlemen who would probably be affected by the regulation possessed characters far above suspicion. Mr. H. considered the discussion as forming an uninteresting precedent.

A motion was now made to adjourn—ayes 34, noes 50.

The amendment before the House at this particular place of the debate, was, in substance, as follows: Instead of saying, in the report, that "the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania should be requested to attend to administer the oath to witnesses on behalf of the prisoner," the amendment proposed to strike out the last six words, and insert, "to all witnesses."

Mr. W. SMITH rose after Mr. HARPER, and remarked, that if the doctrine laid down by that gentleman was right, it was a judicial proceeding altogether, and the House had been in the wrong from the beginning to the end of the matter. He would oppose the present motion, in every possible shape and stage of it; for if we must go on by judicial rules, we must have a Grand Jury, &c., and (though by what authority Mr. S. could not tell) must convert ourselves into a Court of Law. If the motion succeeded, he gave notice of his design to move that Robert Randall and Charles Whitney should be dismissed from the bar of the House, and that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES should be requested to prosecute them for their offence in one of the Federal Courts.

Fifty-four gentlemen rose in support of the amendment which was carried. The House then agreed to the report of the Committee of Privileges; which report, as amended, is in the following words:

"That the proper mode of conducting the further inquiry and the trial in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney will be to proceed, first, with a further hearing of Robert Randall at the bar of the House.

"That the information that has been given against the said Robert Randall and Charles Whitney be reduced to writing, and signed by the informants themselves, respectively, and entered at large on the Journal; that the said information be read to the prisoners, and that they be called upon by the Speaker to declare what they have to say in their defence.

"That, if the said prisoners shall offer any parole evidence in their exculpation, the same shall be heard at the bar of the House, excepting the members of the House, who may give their testimony on oath, in their places; and no question shall be put to any member on the part of the prisoner, by way of cross-examination, except leave be first given by the House; and every such question shall be put by the Speaker; and that the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania be requested to attend for the purpose of administering an oath or affirmation to all witnesses. That all questions on the part of the House, to be asked of the said witnesses, shall be put by the Speaker.

"That, on every debate, the prisoners and their counsel shall be directed to withdraw; and that, when they shall have concluded their defence, and are withdrawn, the sense of the House shall be taken on the guilt or innocence of the prisoners, respectively."

THE BRITISH TREATY.

Mr. PARKER presented five petitions against the late Treaty with Britain, from certain citizens of Virginia. He said that they were copies of some other petitions on that head already presented to the House, which made it perhaps unnecessary to read them. Mr. TRACY asked whence the petitions came? Mr. PARKER answered, from Norfolk county. Mr. THATCHER inquired if they were from corporate bodies? Mr. PARKER replied that they were from individuals. The petitions were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

COMMERCIAL RESTRICTIONS.

Mr. S. SMITH laid on the table a resolution which was ordered to be printed. It was in substance as follows:

"Resolved, That, from and after the — day of —, it shall not be lawful for any foreign ship or other vessel to land in the United States any goods, wares, or merchandise, except such as are of the produce, growth, or manufacture of the nation to which such ship or other vessel may belong."

Mr. S. observed, that at the session before last, one of the resolutions offered by a member from Virginia was in substance analogous to the present resolution, and that resolution, there was reason to believe, would have passed. The Treaty lately negotiated made some provision of the kind contemplated, more essentially necessary than ever. Such a protecting encouragement to the American navigation was the more proper, as, when the said Treaty should be in force, it must receive a severe shock.

PRESENTATION OF THE FLAG OF FRANCE.

The SPEAKER informed the House, that a Message was ready to be delivered to the House, of a nature calculated to give the most pleasing satisfaction to every American breast. He suggested to the House, and the citizens in the galleries, the propriety of not suffering the fervor of enthusiasm to infringe on the dignity of the Representative Councils of the United States. He recommended that a respectful silence should be observed, as most compatible with the true dignity of the House, and the honor of the magnanimous Republic that was the subject of the Message.

The PRESIDENT'S Secretary was then introduced, with an American officer bearing the Standard of the French Republic,* sent by the Committee of Public Safety, Organ of the National Convention, as a token of friendship to the United States. The Secretary presented a Message in writing from the PRESIDENT, with sundry papers accompanying it to the SPEAKER, by whom they were read as follows:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

A Letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, received on the 22d of the last month, covered an Address, dated the 21st of October, 1794, from the Committee of Public Safety to the Representatives of the United States in Congress; and also informed me that he was instructed by the Committee to present to the United States the Colors of France. I therefore proposed to receive them last Friday, the first day of the new year, a day of general joy and congratulation. On that day the Minister of the French Republic delivered the Colors, with an Address, to which I returned an answer. By the latter, the House will see that I have informed the Minister that the Colors will be deposited with the archives of the United States. But it seemed to me proper previously to exhibit to the two Houses of Congress these evidences of the continued friendship of the French Republic, together with the sentiments expressed by me on the occasion in behalf of the United States. They are herewith communicated.

UNITED STATES, January 4, 1796.

The Representatives of the French People, composing the Committee of Public Safety of the National Convention, charged by the law of the 7th Fructidor, with the Direction of Foreign Relations, to the Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Citizens Representatives: The connexions which nature, reciprocal events, and a happy concurrence of circumstances, have formed between two free nations, cannot but be indissoluble. You have strengthened those sacred ties by the declarations, which the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States has made, in your name, to the National Convention, and to the French people. They have been received with rapture by a nation who know how to appreciate every testimony which the United States have given to them of their affection. The Colors of both nations, united in the centre of the National Convention, will be an everlasting evidence of the part which the United States have taken in the success of the French Republic.

* DESCRIPTION OF THE FLAG.—It is tricolor, made of the richest silk and highly ornamented with allegorical paintings. In the middle, a Cock is represented, the emblem of France, standing on a thunderbolt. At two corners, diagonally opposite, are represented two bombshells bursting; at the other two corners, other military emblems. Round the whole is a rich border of oak leaves, alternately yellow and green; the first shaded with brown and heightened with gold; the latter shaded with black and relieved with silver; in this border are entwined warlike musical instruments. The edge is ornamented with a rich gold fringe. The staff is covered with black velvet, crowned with a golden pike, and enriched with the tricolor oravette and a pair of tassels worked in gold, and the three national colors. The flag is to be deposited in the archives of the United States.

Flag of France.

[H. OF R.]

You were the first defenders of the rights of man in another hemisphere. Strengthened by your example, and endowed with an invincible energy, the French people have vanquished that Tyranny, which, during so many centuries of ignorance, superstition, and baseness, had enchained a generous nation.

Soon did the people of the United States perceive that every victory of ours strengthened their independence and happiness. They were deeply affected at our momentary misfortunes, occasioned by treasons purchased by English gold. They have celebrated with rapture the successes of our brave armies.

None of these sympathetic emotions have escaped the sensibility of the French nation. They have all served to cement the most intimate and solid union that has ever existed between two nations.

The citizen ADET, who will reside near your Government in quality of Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, is specially instructed to tighten these bands of fraternity and mutual benevolence. We hope that he may fulfil this principal object of his mission, by a conduct worthy of the confidence of both nations, and of the reputation which his patriotism and virtues have acquired him.

An analogy of political principles; the natural relations of commerce and industry; the efforts and immense sacrifices of both nations in the defence of liberty and equality; the blood which they have spilled together; their avowed hatred for despots; the moderation of their political views; the disinterestedness of their councils; and especially, the success of the vows which they have made in presence of the Supreme Being, to be free or die; all combine to render indestructible the connexions which they have formed.

Doubt it not, citizens, we shall finally destroy the combination of tyrants. You, by the picture of prosperity, which, in your vast countries, has succeeded to a bloody struggle of eight years; we, by the enthusiasm which glows in the breast of every Frenchman. Astonished nations, too long the dupes of perfidious Kings, Nobles, and Priests, will eventually recover their rights, and the human race will owe to the American and French nations their regeneration and a lasting peace.

Paris, 30th Vendemaire, 3d year of the French Republic, one and indivisible.

The Members of the Committee of Public Safety.

J. S. B. DELMAS,

MERLIN (of Douai) &c.

OCTOBER 21, 1794.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. President: I come to acquit myself of a duty very dear to my heart; I come to deposite in your hands and in the midst of a people justly renowned for their courage and their love of liberty, the symbol of the triumphs and of the enfranchisement of my nation.

When she broke her chains; when she proclaimed the imprescriptible rights of man; when, in a terrible war, she sealed with her blood the covenant she had made with Liberty, her own happiness was not alone the object of her glorious efforts; her views extended also to all free people. She saw their interests blended with her own, and doubly rejoiced in her victories, which, in assuring to her the enjoyment of her rights, became to them new guarantees of their independence.

These sentiments, which animated the French nation from the dawn of their revolution, have acquired new strength since the foundation of the Republic.

France, at that time, by the form of its Government, assimilated to, or rather identified with, free people, saw in them only friends and brothers. Long accustomed to regard the American people as her most faithful allies, she has sought to draw closer the ties already formed in the fields of America, under the auspices of victory, over the ruins of tyranny.

The National Convention, the organ of the will of the French nation, have more than once expressed their sentiments to the American people; but above all, these burst forth on that august day, when the Minister of the United States presented to the National Representation the Colors of his country. Desiring never to lose recollections as dear to Frenchmen as they must be to Americans, the Convention ordered that these Colors shall be placed in the hall of their sittings. They had experienced sensations too agreeable not to cause them to be partaken of by their allies, and decreed that, to them, the National Colors should be presented.

Mr. President, I do not doubt their expectations will be fulfilled; and I am convinced that every citizen will receive, with a pleasing emotion, this flag, elsewhere the terror of the enemies of liberty, here the certain pledge of faithful friendship; especially when they recollect that it guides to combat, men who have shared their toils, and who were prepared for liberty by aiding them to acquire their own.

P. A. ADET.

The Answer of the President of the United States to the Address of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, on his presenting the Colors of France to the United States:

Born, sir, in a land of liberty; having early learned its value; having engaged in a perilous conflict to defend it; having, in a word, devoted the best years of my life to secure its permanent establishment in my own country, my anxious recollections, my sympathetic feelings, and my best wishes, are irresistibly excited, whensoever, in any country, I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banner of freedom. But, above all, the events of the French Revolution have produced the deepest solicitude, as well as the highest admiration. To call your nation brave, were to pronounce but common praise. Wonderful people! Ages to come will read with astonishment the history of your brilliant exploits! I rejoice that the period of your toils and of your immense sacrifices is approaching. I rejoice that the interesting revolutionary movements of so many years have issued in the formation of a Constitution designed to give permanency to the great object for which you have contended. I rejoice that liberty, which you have so long embraced with enthusiasm; liberty, of which you have been the invincible defenders, now finds an asylum in the bosom of a regularly organized Government; a Government, which, being formed to secure the happiness of the French people, corresponds with the ardent wishes of my heart, while it gratifies the pride of every citizen of the United States by its resemblance to their own. On these glorious events, accept, sir, my sincere congratulations.

In delivering to you these sentiments, I express not my own feelings only, but those of my fellow-citizens, in relation to the commencement, the progress, and the issue of the French Revolution: and they will cordially join with me in purest wishes to the Supreme Being, that the citizens of our sister Republic, our magnanimous allies, may soon enjoy, in peace, that liberty which they have purchased at so great a price, and all the happiness which liberty can bestow.

I receive, sir, with lively sensibility, the symbol of the triumphs and of the enfranchisement of your nation—the Colors of France—which you have now presented to the United States. The transaction will be announced to Congress, and the colors will be deposited with those archives of the United States, which are at once the evidences and the memorials of their freedom and independence. May these be perpetual, and may the friendship of the two Republics be commensurate with their existence.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 1, 1796.

When the reading of the Message and papers had been concluded—

Mr. GILES informed the House that, having been aware that the Flag would be presented to the House this day, considering it as an additional testimony of the affection of France, and it having been the practice on analogous occasions for the House to express their sentiments independent of the other branch, he had prepared a resolution expressive of what he conceived would be their sense on the occasion. It was nearly in the words following:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to make known to the Representatives of the French people, that this House has received, with the most lively sensibility, the communication of the Committee of Public Safety, of the 21st of October, 1794, accompanied with the Colors of the French Republic, and to assure them that the presentation of the Colors of France to the Congress of the United States is deemed a most honorable testimony of the existing sympathy and affections of the two Republics, founded upon their solid and reciprocal interests; that the House rejoices in the opportunity of congratulating the French Republic on the brilliant and glorious achievements accomplished under it during the present afflictive war, and that they hope those achievements will be attended with a perfect attainment of their object, the permanent establishment of the liberty and happiness of that great and magnanimous people.”

Mr. SEDGWICK wished that a thousand copies of the communications might be printed, and the further consideration of the Message deferred till to-morrow.

Mr. W. SMITH also recommended a delay. In the sentiments of the resolution they all agreed. Perhaps the wording might be somewhat altered.

Mr. HARPER rose and moved that, for various reasons, which he stated, the resolution should be immediately taken up and acted upon.

Mr. SWANWICK was against postponing the consideration of the Message, and observed that the Convention, on receiving a similar present from this country, had proceeded instantly to a vote respecting it.

Mr. W. SMITH, recommended to alter the wording of the resolution, by inserting the Executive of France, instead of the Representatives of the French people, to whom the message in reply was to be directed.

Mr. SHERBURNE observed, that the difference of opinion respecting the branch of Government to which the answer of the House should be addressed, furnished an additional reason for postponement. He highly respected the author of the motion, and believed his own feelings on the present occasion as fervent as those of any member. And though the feelings of the House might not be as ardent on the morrow as at this moment, yet he presumed that the sentiment would be the same. He conceived that it would be more satisfactory to the Republic, and more consistent with the dignity of the House, that their answer should be the result of cool deliberation, than a sudden impulse of enthusiasm, which the present occasion was calculated to inspire. He would therefore move that the further consideration of the resolution on the table be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SWANWICK thought a postponement in this case, as in any others, would only be a waste of time. The motion was negatived.

Mr. W. SMITH's amendment was then taken up, and, after some conversation, was also negatived.

Mr. PARKER moved an amendment as follows: “That this House has received with the most sincere and lively sensibility,” &c. The amendment was for inserting the two words in italics, to which the House consented. The message was then voted unanimously, and a thousand copies of the communications and resolution were ordered to be printed. A committee of two members was appointed to wait on the President, and inform him of the resolution agreed to by the House.

CASE OF RANDALL AND WHITNEY.

Pursuant to the proceedings of the House on Friday last, Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, Mr. MURRAY, of Maryland, Mr. GILES, of Virginia, and Mr. BUCK, of Vermont, delivered in at the Clerk's table their several informations in writing, subscribed with their names, respectively, in the cases of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney; which are as follow:

WILLIAM SMITH, one of the Representatives of the State of South Carolina in the Congress of the United States, declares—

That, on Tuesday last, the twenty second instant, a person who called himself — Randall, and who is said to be from the State of Maryland, applied to him at his lodgings, in the city of Philadelphia, and requested a private and confidential conversation of an hour, which the informant agreed to; and at the time appointed, which was the same evening, the said Randall, being alone with the informant, communicated to him a proposal for procuring from the Legislature of the United States a grant of about eighteen or twenty millions of acres in the Northwestern Territory, between Lakes Michigan, Huron, and Erie. That the said Randall observed; that the grant he proposed would be of great service to the United States, from the persons who would be interested therein, (to wit: certain Canada merchants at or near Detroit, whose names he did not mention,) having great influence over the Indians, who were not pacified by the late Treaty concluded with General Wayne; and that the said persons would extinguish the Indian claims at their own expense; and after setting forth the saving of expense, by the cessation of the Indian war, and other reasons to induce a belief that the proposed grant would be of public utility, he proceeded to inform the informant, that the intention was to divide the land into about forty shares, twenty-four of which would be allowed to, or distributed among, such persons (meaning, as this informant understood him, from the whole purport of his conversation, members of Congress) as would favor the measure: that of these twenty-four shares, he had the management or distribution of twelve for the Southern part, (meaning, as the informant understood, the Southern members of Congress,) and another person, whose name he did not mention, had the disposition of the other twelve, for the Eastern part, (still, as the informant understood and believes, meaning as aforesaid.) That he, the said Randall, proposed subdividing the said shares into so many portions, as to have a sufficiency to obtain a majority, (meaning, as the informant understood him, a majority of Congress,) and that gentlemen, after the session was over, or when they returned to private life, might then have such parts of shares, as the said twenty-four shares would be reserved for such of them as would favor the business, on the same terms as the original associators. That the view of him, the said Randall, and of those concerned with him, was to present a memorial on the following Monday, to Congress, to obtain the said grant for a small price, mentioning half a million of dollars; and that he supposed the land was worth more than two shillings an acre. On taking leave, he pressed the informant for an early and decisive answer to the foregoing proposals; to which the informant replied, that he would not wish to see him again before Friday morning, and requested him to call on him at Congress, and not at his lodgings; but the House did not sit on Friday, and the informant has not seen him since. The informant further says, that the foregoing is the substance and purport of the communication to him made by the said Randall, on the subject above set forth; and that the impression clearly made on the mind of the informant, by the overtures, was, that, under a pretext of public utility, the object of the application was, to secure the informant's influence, as a member of Congress, by a temptation of great personal advantage. That the informant, the next morning, communicated the substance of the foregoing to Mr. Murray, one of the members from Maryland, and consulted him on the most proper mode of proceeding on so delicate an occasion; that Mr. Murray advised a consultation with Mr. Henry, of the Senate; and that, in consequence of such consultation with Mr. Murray and Mr. Henry, on the following day (Thursday) it was resolved, that the informant should immediately communicate the whole transaction to the President of the United States; which he accordingly did.

WILLIAM SMITH.

DECEMBER 28, 1795.

Mr. MURRAY declares, that, on Wednesday last, the twenty-third instant, Mr. Smith, member of Congress, of South Carolina, informed him that a man of the name of Randall, of Maryland, had, the evening before, attempted to bribe him in Western lands, on condition of his supporting an application which Randall told him he should soon make to Congress; the object of which application was, a grant from Congress of from eighteen to twenty millions of acres of land, between Erie, Huron, and Michigan. That Mr. Smith was extremely solicitous that some other gentleman should immediately be informed of the infamous proposal, and that he said he would mention it to Mr. Henry, of the Senate, and advise with him upon proper measures for the detecting of the full extent of the scheme, and crushing it: That he had no opportunity of talking to Mr. Henry on that day; but early on the morning of the twenty-fourth instant, communicated the intelligence to Mr. Henry, who recommended that Mr. Smith should immediately inform the President: that on the said day, Mr. Randall, of Maryland, was introduced to him, the informant, and requested a confidential interview at his, the informant's lodgings, which the informant readily promised him, to be at five, for the purpose of developing his scheme. That Randall came at or near five, that day last named, to wit: on Thursday, and communicated to Mr. Henry and himself, in general terms, the outline of a plan by which he, Randall, and his Canada friends, would extinguish the Indian title to all the lands between lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, as marked on a map which Randall then showed, containing from eighteen to twenty millions of acres. That he, the informant, then asked Randall into his apartment, where they were alone. That Randall expatiated at first upon the public utility of his scheme, which was, that Congress should grant to him and his company, all the land aforesaid mentioned, for five hundred thousand, or, at most one million of dollars; and that he would undertake, in four months, that the harmony of the Indians should be secured to the Union: or, if Congress thought proper, that the Indian tribes now on said land should be removed to the British side, or down lake Michigan, reserving to some aged chiefs a few miles square; that his company and himself had determined to divide the lands aforesaid into forty (or forty-one) shares. That of these shares twenty-four were to be reserved for the disposal of himself and his partner, now in town, for such members of Congress as assisted them, by their abilities and votes, in obtaining the grant aforesaid: That of these twenty-four shares, his partner had twelve under his management for the Eastern members of Congress, and that he, Randall, had the other twelve shares under his management for the Southern members of Congress. That these shares were to be so divided as to accomplish the object by securing a majority of Congress. That the informant started an objection to land speculation as troublesome, and that he, Randall, said, if you (meaning the informant) do not choose to accept your share of the land, you shall have cash in hand for your share. That the informant appointed Randall to meet him in the lobby of the House on Monday, the twenty eighth instant. That Randall told him a memorial was to be handed in upon this subject on said Monday; but refused to inform the informant what member was to present it: That Randall told him, that he, Randall, mentioned his plan to some members in the general way only—meaning thereby, as he understood him, a view of the sounder part of the plan, as being conducive to public utility. That, in the early part of the confidential and secret conversation, Randall said, that the members of Congress who would behave handsomely, should come into their shares on the same terms upon which the company obtained the grant; but soon after, made proposals more openly seductive and corrupt; closing them with the offer of cash in hand as aforesaid. That the informant, on that evening, when Randall went away, told Mr. Henry of the whole of Randall's offers aforesaid; then called on the Secretary of State, and communicated the same to him; and the next morning, early, informed the President of the transaction.

H. OF R.]

Case of Randall and Whitney.

[JANUARY, 1796.]

WILLIAM B. GILES, a member of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, declares,

That in the evening of Thursday, the seventeenth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, as well as this informant recollects, a person called upon this informant at his lodgings, under the name of Robert Randall, with an introductory note from Mr. Gabriel Christie, in the usual form, dated the fifteenth of the said month.

That the said Robert Randall informed this informant, that he had some business of importance to communicate to this informant, which would probably come before Congress: That it respected the fur trade at present carried on by the British traders with the Indians, through the lakes. He observed that it would be important to change the course of that trade into some channel through the United States: That he believed he could put Congress upon some plan for effecting that object: That the plan was of a secret nature: That he was not then prepared to disclose it, and requested a private interview with this informant for that purpose, at some other time. Upon which request, this informant appointed the next Saturday, at twelve o'clock, (being the nineteenth of December,) to receive the communication.

That about the time appointed, the said Robert Randall called on this informant, and after some general conversation, informed this informant, that an association had been formed by himself and others, with some of the most influential traders at Detroit, for the purpose of purchasing all the lands contained in the Peninsula formed by lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, and the waters connecting those lakes, amounting in the whole to twenty or thirty millions of acres, if the consent of Congress could be obtained for the extinguishment of the Indian claims thereto. The said Randall then produced a map of the Peninsula and Lakes.

That this tract of country was to be divided into shares, and that a number of shares was to be left unappropriated, until the necessary law of Congress should pass, authorizing the extinguishment of the Indian claims; and might then be filled up by those who might think proper to concur in the plan, and should give their aid for procuring the passage of such law. Upon this intimation, this informant observed, that he hoped the said Randall did not intend to address the information of the unappropriated shares particularly to this informant.

To which the said Randall replied that he did not; that he only meant it as general information; but he could see no impropriety in the members of Congress being concerned in the scheme, if the public good was to be promoted by it; and that thirty or forty members were already engaged in its support; or words to that effect.

After some further conversation of a general nature, respecting the present state of the fur trade, the value of the lands contained in the peninsula, and the probable effect of the late Treaty upon that trade and country, the said Randall inquired of this informant "whether he deemed his plan advisable, and whether it would meet with the support of this informant in Congress." To which this informant replied, that if the said Randall should bring his proposals before Congress, this informant would give them the consideration which his duty required, and should give such vote as he deemed right; or words to that effect. Very shortly after this conversation, Mr. Edward Livingston, a member of Congress from New York, entered the room, and the said Randall left it, without further observation, as well as this informant recollects. This informant immediately communicated the contents of this conversation to Mr. Livingston, and declared that he considered the proffer of the unappropriated shares to the members of Congress, as a direct attempt at corruption.

This informant, on the same day, communicated the substance of the conversation to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to Messrs. Blount, and Macon, of North Carolina, and to Messrs. Madison, and Venable, of Virginia. It was deemed advisable, by all these gentlemen, as well as by this informant, to permit the plan to be brought before Congress in the usual way, by memorial, and to cause a detection, by means of a committee, to whom the said memorial should be referred: and in the mean time, if the said Randall should again call on this informant, he should proceed to make further discovery of the real state and nature of the transaction.

That on the next day the said Randall did again call on this informant, and informed him, that he, the said Randall, then proposed to disclose his plan more particularly; and after some general remarks upon the public utility, as well as individual benefit of the plan, he said that it was in substance as follows:

The tract of country before described was to be divided into forty-one shares, five of which were to be reserved to the Indian traders at Detroit; the other thirty-six were to be divided into two departments; eighteen to the Eastern and eighteen to the Southern department. That six out of the eighteen shares were to be reserved to his Eastern partner and associates, and six out of the remaining eighteen, to himself and his associates. That the remaining twenty-four shares were to be left unappropriated, for the use of such members of Congress as should support the measure. That the names of those members were not to be made known until after the law for the extinguishment of the Indian claims had passed; and then requested this informant to prepare some writing which would compel the ostensible persons to surrender the unappropriated shares to the real supporters of the measure, after it should be effected. That one million of dollars were spoken of as the price of the lands; but that he deemed that sum by far too much; and as Congress would have to fix the price, they might make the terms such as to insure considerable emoluments to the purchasers. That a majority of the Senate had consented to give the plan their support, and within three of a majority of the House of Representatives. After much further conversation on the subject, which this informant thinks unnecessary to particularise, the said Randall promised to wait again on this informant, at his lodgings, on Tuesday evening, at seven o'clock, and introduce to this informant his Eastern associate.

The said Randall did not call at the appointed hour, and this informant did not see him again until Friday, the twenty-fifth of December, when the said Randall again called on this informant, and, after making an apology for not calling at the appointed hour of the preceding Tuesday, informed him at the door of his apartment, that his memorial to Congress would be ready to be presented on the next Monday; but as several gentlemen were in this informant's room at that time, the said Randall did not enter, and no further conversation was then had; since which time this informant has not seen the said Randall, until he was brought to the bar of the House of Representatives, in custody.

Case of Randall and Whitney.

[H. OF R.]

This informant further saith, that he communicated the substance of every material conversation with the said Randall, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the several gentlemen before mentioned.

WILLIAM B. GILES.

JANUARY 1, 1796.

I, DANIEL BUCK, inform and say, that about ten days previous to my setting out on my journey to Congress, (which was on the thirtieth day of November last,) a stranger whom I now know to be Charles Whitney, in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, called at my office in Norwich, in the State of Vermont, introduced himself by the name of Whitney, and informed me that he had some business of importance which he wished to converse with me upon. I asked if he wished to be in private; he signified that he did, upon which my clerk withdrew; and the said Whitney proceeded to inform me that the business of which he wished to converse was of great importance to the public, as well as to the individuals immediately concerned. That it would come before Congress, but was so circumstanced as to render it necessary to make a previous statement to some of the members, that they might be able to explain to others; and the whole thereby be better prepared to judge upon the business; he declared he wished for nothing improper, and that he did not want that I should favor the plan unless I saw it to be consistent; for he said he wanted nothing but what was perfectly just and honorable, and was confident that if the matter could be understood, it would appear to be of great public utility. He then stated that he and his associates had discovered a large and immensely valuable tract of land, between or contiguous to lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, (if I mistake not the names,) which he said might be purchased of the Indians at a low rate: That this purchase would conciliate the affections, and secure the friendship of the hostile tribes: That he, the said Whitney, together with Ebenezer Allen, Doctor Randall, and a number of Canadian merchants at Detroit, had formed an association for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian title, and petitioning Congress for the pre-emption right to those lands; that if they succeeded, it was their intention immediately to make settlement on them: That those merchants had such influence with, and control over the Indians, that there would be no difficulty with them; and that such a settlement would be a barrier against the savages, and effectually secure peace to the United States: That those merchants were then employed in the business among the Indians; and that his partner, Doctor Randall, and his other associates, had such connexions, that there was a fair prospect of success. That it was not their intention, however, to engross all this property to themselves; but that it was to be divided into a number of shares, and that he and the said Randall had the disposal of them. That he, the said Whitney, was then directly from Philadelphia, and that it was agreed that Randall should dispose of a part amongst his friends, and the influential characters in the Southern States; that he, the said Whitney, was to distribute the other part amongst his, the said Whitney's friends, and the influential characters in the Eastern and Northern States. That they had already got a number engaged, but that the subscription was not full, and that I might become an adventurer if I wished for it; and as he conceived that I could make myself acquainted with the facts, they, the said associates, would be able so clearly to demonstrate the public utility of the measure, that there could be no impropriety in my being concerned in the business, as I should thereby only connect my private interest with the public good; and while I was advancing the greatest interest of my country, might put two or three thousand dollars into my own pocket. Upon my suggesting, that, by a late Treaty, a peace was already concluded with the Indians, and that this was a business that might involve in it an important national question, as, by the Treaty, the right of purchasing lands of the Indians, was reserved to the United States, the said Whitney replied and said, that the Indians were greatly dissatisfied with the Treaty, and would not keep it; and that another war would be the certain consequence, unless other measures were adopted. He then renewed the protestation of the purity of his intentions, and said that he conceived that they (meaning himself and associates, as I understood him) should so clearly evince the utility of the plan, as that there could be no doubt of its propriety in the mind of any well wisher to his country; and said, that he thought it would be hard to suppose that members of Congress were, in consequence of their appointment, to be deprived of those advantages to acquire property which might be taken by others. The said Whitney showed me a plan of the country, and the articles of agreement between the associates, which appear to be the same as have been read in Congress: he also said much upon the magnitude of the object, in respect to the subscribers and partners; and though I cannot now repeat his expressions, yet I can truly assert, that I then clearly understood him, that if I would subscribe as a partner, my name might be kept secret, and after the grant was obtained, if I chose to relinquish my share in the lands, I might receive money in lieu of it; though no specified sum was mentioned, other than has already been stated; and the conversation finally broke off, upon my declaring that I would make no engagement in the business, until I was better informed as to the merits of the question.

DANIEL BUCK.

JANUARY 2, 1796.

It was then moved that Robert Randall should be brought to the bar of the House. He was brought in accordingly. Seats were placed for the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania, and the two counsellors for Randall, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Tilghman, jr. The informations given in by Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. GILES, were read over, and the SPEAKER asked the prisoner, what he had to say in his defence? I am not guilty. You declare yourself not guilty? Yes. Have you any proof to cite that you are not guilty? No. Are you ready to answer?

Mr. Lewis then rose. He observed, that these declarations had been made in the absence of the prisoner, who, as he conceived, was entitled to have been present. His request was, that the informants might now be placed in a situation to be examined by the prisoner and his counsel, and that the information may now be given in the prisoner's hearing. The prisoner and his counsel were ordered to withdraw.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH made the following motion:

"That the prisoner be informed, that if he has any questions to propose to the informants, or other members of the House, he is at liberty to put them, [in the mode already prescribed,] and that they be sworn to answer such questions as shall be asked, and that the informants be sworn to the declarations just read."

The words in parenthesis were an amendment suggested by Mr. GILES. The resolution and amendment were adopted by the House, and the prisoner with his counsel were again brought to the bar. The resolution above stated was read to Randall.

Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. GILES, were then sworn, standing up in their places: the oath being administered by the Judge.

Mr. Tilghman then observed, on the delicate situation in which the counsel stood, with which they were strongly impressed. The high character of the gentlemen who stood forth in support of the accusation, gentlemen whom Mr. T. had known personally for many years, with the odious nature of the crime charged on the prisoner, embarrassed them considerably; as they had, however, been permitted by the House to appear in this business, they were bound in duty to do every thing consistent with a fair and honorable defence. If Mr. T. were to declare his own opinion of the conduct of the prisoner, it would be thus, that his behaviour was highly improper and indelicate; but Mr. Randall denied having made any offer either of lands or money, as in fact he had none to give. The disposal of the lands depended entirely on the subsequent vote of Congress.

Mr. Lewis spoke a few words. The prisoner's defence was, that he denied any proposal of a corrupt nature. The members who favored the sale of the lands, were only to have their shares on the same terms, and on paying an equal share of the expenses, as the other partners.

Mr. W. SMITH was then examined upon that part of his information where he says, that those members who should be concerned with Randall, were to have shares of the lands. Mr. SMITH was asked whether the offer was that they were to be granted at an inferior rate? In reply, he understood it was to be on the same terms as other partners were to have them. Mr. GOODHUE proposed a query, whether the offer made by Mr. Randall was in order that Mr. SMITH might use his influence to forward the scheme in Congress? Mr. SMITH replied, that he certainly understood it so. The prisoner had all along referred to members of Congress, though he did not expressly name them. His phrase was, "for persons who would favor the scheme."

Mr. Tilghman then, through the SPEAKER, asked Mr. MURRAY, whether he understood he was to pay for his share of land as the other associates or not?

Mr. MURRAY.—I understood him as is explained in the declaration. At first I understood, that the members who should assist in getting the thing through, might then retire to their homes, and when the scheme was in activity they might come in on the same terms as the original associates. But afterwards, I understood from Randall that I might have a share if I would accept of it, and this I understood from the whole tenor of the latter part of his conversation. The shares set apart were to be for acceptance as donations. I so understood him.

Mr. Tilghman.—Did he expressly say, that they were intended as donations, or did Mr. MURRAY collect this to be the man's meaning from a variety of circumstances?

Mr. MURRAY.—He did not say, if you will do so and so, I will give you so and so; his proposal, though more delicate, was as unequivocal as a direct offer. I so understood him.

Mr. HARPER asked Mr. MURRAY, whether Randall did not tell him, that if he did not like land, he should have money, and whether the money was not to be more than the value of the share of land?

Mr. MURRAY said, that from this part, and indeed the general tenor of the conversation, he did infer, that a donation was intended, and when he objected to land, the prisoner then said, if he did not choose to accept of a share in land, he might have cash in hand.

Mr. Lewis, counsel for the prisoner, asked Mr. MURRAY, whether he did not state to Randall his aversion to dealing in land, and whether Randall did not say that this need not be an objection, since the share might be sold, and then that he would have cash instead of land?

Mr. MURRAY. I did not so understand it.

Mr. HARPER wished Mr. MURRAY to relate, as nearly as possible, the words of the prisoner in this important part of the conversation.

Mr. MURRAY said, that immediately after it took place, and he had communicated it to his friends, he took notes of it. It stood in this manner: "I stated objections to land speculations as troublesome: Randall then said, if I did not choose land, I might have cash in hand."

Mr. Tilghman asked, what Mr. MURRAY did not, to get the man's whole secret from him, go beyond his views to draw him on?

Mr. MURRAY said, he affected to think well of the more sound part of the plan.

Mr. Tilghman asked whether Mr. MURRAY expressed to Randall when it was proposed to him to engage in the land scheme?

Mr. MURRAY. A strong repugnance to land speculations.

Mr. Lewis. Then it was, he said, that if it was not convenient for Mr. MURRAY to be concerned in a share in land, he might have it in money?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. S. SMITH was next sworn. There was here a motion made for adjourning.

Mr. Lewis stated that Mr. Tilghman and himself had never seen the prisoner until yesterday in the evening. They had been into Court until late on Saturday evening. They went yesterday to prison, and back again this morning. They had received a long written state of the case from Mr. Randall, but, from absolute want of time, they had not been able to read one third part of it. The motion to adjourn was negatived.

Mr. S. SMITH was then proceeding with his evidence when Mr. SEDGWICK rose. He considered it as unfair to examine Mr. SMITH in order to prove the information given by other gentlemen.

JANUARY, 1796.]

Case of Randall and Whitney.

[H. OF R.]

It was totally inapplicable. The offences were as distinct as any two things could be.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to put this question, whether any conversation passed between Mr. S. SMITH and Randall, which had an appearance of intending to corrupt the integrity of members of this House.

Mr. SEDGWICK objected, that this was deviating from the original specific motion. Mr. GILES was of an opposite opinion. Mr. MADISON thought the motion proper, in the strictest sense. The charge was general; and the answer to the question might be of a nature to corroborate that general charge. After a few words from some other members, the motion was carried.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then on oath stated in substance as follows:

That on the 9th or 10th, Randall whom he had known in Maryland, called on him and asked half an hour's conversation with him. He said he had a plan in view, that would be to the advantage of the United States, and turn to his own private emolument.

Randall informed Mr. S., that he was last year at New York, that he thence went to Detroit to explore the country on lakes Eric, &c., that he contracted an acquaintance with certain influential characters with whom he had formed an association to procure the lands in question. He mentioned the outlines of the plan and dwelt on the public advantages that would arise from it. He indirectly insinuated that gentlemen in Congress who chose to be interested in the plan might have a portion of the land in contemplation. He asked Mr. S. to fix a day when he should enter more particularly into a detail of the business. Mr. S., fixed Saturday following, and then retired into the room where his fellow lodger was, and told him that some great land business was on foot and that he believed he might make his fortune. On Sunday, Randall came with a map on which he explained the position of the land and expatiated on the richness of the soil. He detailed the particulars of the project which Mr. S. related as has been heretofore stated with some little variations. He enlarged upon the public advantages to the United States if the purchase was allowed. He said, he would be glad if Mr. S. would embark in the undertaking, and give the plan his countenance; but, that, if he did not choose to so do, it could be accomplished without his assistance, as a decided majority of both Houses were agreed to support it. Mr. S. asked him, whether in the Senate? he said, yes. He asked him for names, he objected to mentioning any. Randall explained, that members who were most active were to have larger shares, and such as only gave their assent, smaller; Mr. S. understood that he might have one of the larger. No money was offered as a temptation to engage, but he fully understood that every gentleman was to pay his full proportion of the price. He stated to Mr. S., that it would save the United States much in men and money to have the scheme accomplished, and added, that if Congress desired it, he could remove the Miami Indians to the other side of the lakes. Mr. S. asked him what he proposed should be offered for the lands. He said, that would remain in the breasts of the gentlemen in Congress. Mr. S. asked whether one dollar an acre could be afforded, he objected to that as by far too much. Mr. S. mentioned twenty-five cents, that was too much. Mr. S. then suggested that he supposed two and a half cents were contemplated. Randall answered, that if Congress fixed this price it would be well so. He offered no direct bribe to Mr. S., but proposed to take such members into the scheme at first cost as chose to embark in it. Mr. S. asked him who was to offer his memorial. He mentioned a gentleman of great weight in the House.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, asked the date of this conversation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, answered, on the Sunday following the 10th, which must have been the 13th.

Mr. Lewis, through the SPEAKER, asked Mr. S., of Maryland, whether Randall had not said, that he had actually a majority in favor of his scheme; or, that he expected to get a majority?

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, understood that he had a majority, and on this ground, he said to Mr. S. that his co-operation was not absolutely necessary.

The prisoner was remanded and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 5.

CASE OF ROBERT RANDALL.

After disposing of the morning business—

Robert Randall was then brought to the bar, attended by his two counsel; the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania likewise took his seat, as yesterday, at the Clerk's table. The SPEAKER then addressed the prisoner as follows: "Robert Randall, this is the day and hour, to which your farther examination was postponed; you are now at liberty to proceed with your defence."

Mr. GILES then moved that Mr. CHRISTIE should be sworn. This was done. The member then stated that he had been at Philadelphia, about the month of October last. He met with Mr. Randall, who made up to him, and observed that he had this summer been in Canada. He had missed the object for which he went; but he had met with another which he thought would prove advantageous. He at first advised Mr. Randall to apply to the Secretary of State. Mr. Randolph had just then resigned his office; and no other person was appointed in his stead. Mr. C. then advised him to lay the affair before the PRESIDENT. When he came back to town at the sitting down of Congress, Randall came again to him, and said that by good advice he had altered his plan. He complained that Mr. C. was the only member who had not been ready to assist him. A considerable majority of the House of Representatives were secured to the scheme. Mr. C. said, that he never would advise Congress to sell their lands under a dollar per acre; and as Mr. Randall wanted the lands so much cheaper, he must in the course of his duty oppose the plan. Mr. C. inquired who were his advisers. He answered, that Mr. Whitney had told him that Mr. SEDGWICK recommended this way of proceeding, and was to draw up a memorial to be laid before the House upon the subject.

Mr. SEDGWICK finding his name thus unexpectedly introduced, wished to be allowed to give oath in order that he should tell all he knew.

The oath was administered to Mr. SEDGWICK, who gave information to the following effect: He had never in his life seen Randall, till he was produced at the bar. Whitney he had seen two or three times. The Mr. Jones mentioned by Whitney, in his declaration, lives within about thirty-four miles of Mr. SEDGWICK's house. Whitney, with Mr. Jones, came, a considerable time ago, to him one morning, while he was at breakfast. They asked his opinion; which was, that Government would not sell any lands, till the Indian claim was first extinguished. Mr. Jones endeavored to convince Mr. SEDGWICK of the benefits which would result to the United States from this sale. Mr. SEDGWICK accompanied them to the door of his house, where Mr. Jones asked him whether there would be anything improper in a member of the Legislature being concerned in such a purchase? Mr. SEDGWICK said, that this would depend entirely on the mode of application. If it was to the Land Office, there would be nothing wrong in it; if to Congress, then it would be a man making a bargain with himself. Whitney, since Mr. SEDGWICK came to town, had called two or three times on him. He got his servant, for more than once, to deny him, as he was busy. Once, however, he did see him; the first question of Mr. SEDGWICK was, from what State did he come? He said he resided in Vermont. He then spoke of the matter in a general way; and Mr. SEDGWICK, whose object it was to shake him off, advised his calling on Mr. BUCK, a member from that State, as it would be more proper to call on him. Mr. SEDGWICK believed that he was more teased with applications of this private kind than any member in the House. During the conference with Whitney, he did not remember that Randall's name was ever introduced. Mr. SEDGWICK heard, with astonishment, the name of Colonel Pepune mentioned. He lived opposite to Mr. SEDGWICK's house, in the town of Stockbridge. He rode down from that place to New York, along with Mr. SEDGWICK, and never spoke one word of the matter to him.

Randall had, among other stories, told Mr. SAMUEL SMITH that Mr. WM. SMITH should bring forward this land business, in the House. He positively said so to Mr. S. SMITH on the 13th of December, and it would be proved that he had never exchanged a word with Mr. W. SMITH, nor ever seen him till the 22d of that month, viz: about nine days after. This is the substance of a short explanation which took place between some of the members, after Mr. SEDGWICK had ended his declaration. Mr. W. SMITH then asked Randall, whether it was not true, that he spoke to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH before he spoke to himself? Mr. Tilghman, in reply, said that he was authorized to answer in the affirmative. This puts to rest the story related by Randall to the member from Baltimore.

The testimony being now closed, Mr. Tilghman asked leave to make some remarks in defence of the prisoner. He recapitulated the charges. They divided into two heads. The first, was an attempt to corrupt members. The second, was his having said that thirty members of the House of Representatives had engaged to favor his scheme. If the first head was not proved in the fullest manner, then it would be entirely improper to punish the prisoner at all; for he is entitled to the strictest justice.

Mr. T. began with the charge of corruption, which led him to take a view of the circumstances that gave rise to this subject, the journey of Randall to Canada, last Summer, the association for buying the Peninsula between Lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, the proposal of extinguishing the Indian claim, the scheme of forty-one shares, with many other particulars. In the plan itself, there was nothing exceptionable, provided that it was fairly pursued. It was at first view clear, that other assistance would be wanted, besides the persons subscribing the association. Five or six private individuals were altogether unequal to grasping so immense an object. Accordingly, Randall first applied to Mr. CHRISTIE. From the declaration of that gentleman, it appeared that no offer was made to him either of land or money, or any improper overture, for Mr. CHRISTIE had so little suspicion of foul play, that he afterwards gave a letter of introduction to another member to explain the subject. Randall had next applied successively to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, to Mr. GILES, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. MURRAY. From probability, independent of the proof which Mr. T. was about to examine, he argued that nobody but a madman would have attempted to bribe five gentlemen of respectable characters, and of independent fortunes. What was the language of the prisoner to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH: "If you, as a member of Congress, see no impropriety in being concerned, we shall willingly accept you; but, if you do not think it right, we do not ask your aid, for we can do without you." These were the identical words of Randall, as attested by the honorable member to whom they were addressed. There was no guilt here. It was the genuine language of innocence. Mr. SAMUEL SMITH said, that Randall had told him that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH should bring the matter forward. By this, Randall plainly signified, that he expected Mr. WILLIAM SMITH to do so, and Mr. S. SMITH had mistaken the supposition for an affirmation. The fourth gentleman, in the order of application, was Mr. WILLIAM SMITH; and there was not one of the first four gentlemen who said that any direct proposal was made to him. They only understood and inferred it. But a man is not to be convicted on the inferences, impressions, and ideas, of witnesses. It would, in a Court of Law, cost Mr. T. but a very few words, indeed, to establish this point. A witness was only to relate facts. The jury were to make inferences, and form conclusions. Every one of the four gentlemen had expressly declared that there was no explicit offer made to him. Had Randall said: "Give me your vote, and you shall have so many dollars or so many acres for it," the accusation of bribery would have been fully established. But we find no such thing. The offer was improper, indelicate, and indecent in the highest degree, but no direct offer was made, and none could be made, till the law passed. The lands were, by the lowest estimate, to cost five hundred thousand dollars of purchase money, besides the expense of extinguishing the Indian claim, and many other previous charges, before anything could be made of the speculation. Thus, each of the forty-one shares would require, in advance, a very large sum of money. There might even be a loss upon the business, instead of a gain. After adverting to the evidence of the four first gentlemen, Mr. T. came next to Mr. MURRAY. He seems to give the most heavy accusation against the prisoner; but Mr. T. was ready to rest the cause of his client, his good name, or his infamy, on proving that Mr. MURRAY had mistaken his meaning. In the first place, by the account of that gentleman, twenty-four shares out of the forty-one, were to be at the acceptance of members, which had been conceived as if they were to be given gratuitously. The donation was to come out of these thirty-six shares, reserved for Randall and Whitney; and it was too immense, in proportion to the whole shares, to have admitted any chance of profit to these two people, on the twelve remaining shares. For this inference, Mr. T. appealed to the candor and judgment of every gentleman within his hearing. The thing being thus, in its own nature, incredible, would, of course, require the highest degree of evidence to support it. It had been proved that no direct offer of this had been made to other members. They understood that these shares were to be paid for, in proportion, along with the other partners, in the sale. This was another reason for thinking that the member was mistaken. MESSRS. WILLIAM and SAMUEL SMITH, and Mr. GILES, had unanimously declared, that they were to pay for their shares. Upon the question being put to Mr. W. SMITH, he answered: "I understood that those should pay upon the footing of the original associators." Mr. GILES, on this point, had replied thus: "No direct offer was made him in land. The proposition was general, as related to members of Congress, who would favor the scheme. He considered himself as included; but, then, all were to come in on paying their proportions." Again, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH declared, that Randall "offered no direct bribe to him, but proposed to take into the scheme, at first cost, such members as chose to embark in it." These three testimonies clearly established, that Randall had not thought of any gratuitous offer to these gentlemen. Mr. T. could account for the mistake of Mr. MURRAY. He had heard from Mr. W. SMITH of the man, and his proposals; and that they were supposed to be of a corrupt nature. While his mind was filled with these impressions, Randall waited on him, but had so little dread of his being upon a criminal errand, that he made no scruple to begin the subject before Mr. HENRY, a Senator who happened accidentally to be in the room. Mr. MURRAY took him into a private room, for the purpose of sifting him; and there it was that he disclosed the unsound part of his scheme.

By the word accept, Mr. T. insisted that, while Mr. MURRAY understood a donation, Randall could only mean a share, as offered to other members. Where had Randall cash in hand to have laid down? [Randall was not long since insolvent] Now, could he give perhaps twenty or thirty thousand dollars in hand, for the vote of a member? The word accept, as coming from Randall, only meant, "you shall have a share on the same terms as others; and if you do not choose to have a share, we will sell your share of the lands for you, and you may get the profit made by the sale." Here Mr. T. quitted the first head of the charge, by expressing his hopes that no satisfactory proofs of direct bribery had been offered. He was happy to live in a country whose legislators possessed so much delicacy. The second head of the charge was, Randall having said that thirty members of the House of Representatives were to favor his scheme. The Counsel apprehended that this was no breach of privilege. He turned to the laws of the United States, and read over every passage regarding the privileges of the House and its members. Nothing was to be found which could even remotely apply to this kind of conversation. He then went into the subject of practice in the English House of Commons. There were no journals further back than the reign of Edward VI. Blackstone says, that Parliament never chose to define its privileges, lest afterwards a new case might arise that did not come within their rules, and then their ground against the offender might be foreclosed. Caution, in that respect, might be necessary in England, but not in the United States, where the House of Representatives are the darling of the people. They have nothing to fear as to any undue advantage being taken of a defect in their rules. Besides, it by no means follows that, because the privileges of the House of Commons extend to a certain degree, this country will bear the same extent of privileges in their Representatives. The idea of the Counsel was, that the House had the privilege essential to its existence to defend itself from any insult from within or from without, but not further. The Constitution says nothing of privilege, that reaches to the case of the prisoner; and one of the amendments to it, says, that the people shall be understood to have retained whatever they have not granted. It follows, then, that since what has been expressly granted reaches not to Randall, that it is retained. It is in contemplation to prosecute this man in a Court of Law. With what feelings must he be supposed to go there, if he shall be previously condemned in this House? A man would thus in fact be convicted in the public view, before his trial began. The Counsel then read a number of precedents from English books of law, to prove that, even for a direct offer of bribery to a member of Parliament, the prisoner would have been remitted to the Attorney General, and prosecuted with the usual and indispensable solemnities, in a

Court of Justice. Mr. T. said that he would next venture to ask what kind of a Court of Law is this? The members are not upon oath, while they are at once parties, judges, and witnesses. Mr. T. would have thought it more delicate for the House to leave the prisoner to a trial in the common form. He may be acquitted by a jury, after being condemned here, which may produce disagreeable feelings in the public mind. It is, in reality, trying a prisoner twice for the same offence, and making him hazard a double sentence. All this is inconsistent with every idea of justice. The offence was punishable at Common Law. What good reason can then be given for trying it here? The safety of the House is not in danger. This is not a case, wherein they ought to insist on privilege. A thousand reasons might be adduced, besides those stated by the Counsel, why it was inexpedient to bring the subject here. The privileges of an English Parliament rested on immemorial usage; those of this House, on a written Constitution, which had considerably narrowed them, in comparison with those of British Parliaments. The charge of having thirty or forty members engaged to support a scheme is not a breach of privilege. Mr. T. argued that, from the very face of the charge, as worded by the House, no crime arises. Are the House to bridle conversations without doors? When a bill comes into the House, is it not common for the people to say that such a law will pass, or it will not pass? Are they not at liberty to conjecture what members will vote for it, or against it? Randall's story about thirty members comes within this description. Are the House to lock up the mouths of people? Mr. T. closed, by urging that, as Randall was to be tried by a Court of Law, as he had been taken out of the hands of an officer belonging to a Court of Law, upon what authority the Counsel did not see, the best thing which could be done, was to remit him to the ordinary form of trial.

Mr. Lewis then rose. He read the charge, as adduced by the House, and agreed that this was not bribery, but a wild land-jobbing scheme. He objected to the having admitted subsequent depositions and informations in support of a charge previously made and specified. This alludes to the subsequent evidence given by some members after the prisoner had received a copy of the charge. He contended that the evidence of Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, given subsequently, had no connexion with the original charge, and should not have been admitted in corroboration of it. Mr. L. then took up the second point of the charge, that the prisoner had said thirty or forty members would favor his scheme. The saying so was no offence at all; for the thing itself, the agreeing to support a particular scheme, was consistent with perfect innocence. He trusted that the prisoner would be as safe in this House as anywhere else; that his unalienable rights would be as sacredly watched; for it would be a dreadful reflection if that House were less delicate in administering justice than the Courts of Law. He hoped that the House would adhere to these fundamental rules of trial, which had stood the test of ages. He then read some of the articles of the bond between the original partners, to show the absurdity of supposing that bribery ever could have been intended. It was impossible to have ever bribed members in the way alleged by Mr. MURRAY. He stated that, out of forty-one shares, Whitney and Randall were to have thirty-six, out of which they were to give away twenty-four; a proportion in itself incredible, inasmuch as the remaining twelve shares would, so far from making their fortunes, have cost them more than they were worth. Mr. L. then argued on the offer to Mr. MURRAY, on the same ground as the former Counsel. The plain history of the affair was this: A number of people wanted the lands. They thought that it would accelerate their scheme to get members of Congress to embark in it, and offered them, for this effect, a share in the lands, on paying an equal share of the expenses, and with a promise of concealing their names. "If the gentlemen," said Mr. L. "to whom this application was made, had kicked my client out of the room, they would have served him right; and there, I think, that the matter ought to have ended." The British Parliament send people attempting bribery to the Attorney General. They send people to a trial by jury. Mr. L. denied that any part of this offence came within the definition of corruption, or the reach of law. He had no conception that it could be punished upon any legal principle whatever. Besides, there was nothing in the history of privileges, like thus dragging a man from the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, by whom he had been apprehended, and whose prisoner he was. Again, there could be a breach of privilege only, if the proposal regarded a bill actually before the House. It never could arise from a thing not in existence. All the books which Mr. L. had consulted, spoke only of bribery, about a bill or lawsuit actually on hand. It was hazardous to quote precedents from an English Parliament. Its privileges had no limits, so that some writers on law called it omnipotent. Mr. L. admitted that the House had the essential power of punishing violence, or open insult, which did not reach the case before them. He would not further intrude on the time of the House, by apologising for the time which he had taken up already. He trusted that a power of creating offences would not be assumed; and that a thing which is not illegal, will not be declared punishable.

Mr. Lewis here sat down. The further defence of the prisoner was postponed till to-morrow, (Wednesday,) at twelve o'clock.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 6.

CASE OF ROBERT RANDALL.

Mr. SEDGWICK laid before the House some additions to his evidence, delivered yesterday. He gave in a written copy of the whole, and wished that it might be added to the declaration already made. The paper was read, and, on motion, ordered to be inserted in the Journals. Mr. SED-

[II. OF R.]

WICK said he had yesterday mentioned Col. Pepune being in Philadelphia, but he had not seen him. He has since done so. The Colonel lodges at the sign of the Drover, in Third street, and is ready, when called upon by the House, to tell every circumstance which he knows about the transaction of Randall or Whitney.

The following is Mr. SEDGWICK's written testimony:

"The informant, Theodore Sedgwick, a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, declares, that, some time before he left the place of his residence, in Massachusetts, one Israel Jones, Esq., of Adams, in that State, waited on him and introduced to him a man whom he now knows by the name of Charles Whitney, of the State of Vermont. That Mr. Jones is a man of respectable character, a magistrate, a member of the State Legislature, (as the informant believes,) and a trustee of the Corporation of Williams College. That Mr. Jones informed the informant that he, with others, had in contemplation an application to Congress for a grant of a tract of country lying between the Lakes Huron, Michigan, and Erie. Considerations of a public nature having been stated and enlarged upon, the opinion of the informant was requested relative to the propriety and success of the proposed application. He answered, in substance, that he believed it was to be doubted whether the Legislature would undertake actually to contract for any of the vacant public lands, and that the doubt was still stronger respecting these lands, the Indian claim to which had not been previously extinguished. He stated to Mr. Jones that, by reason of sickness in his family, it was not probable he should attend the next session of Congress; at all events, however, he advised Mr. Jones not to make an early application, as it was probable the subject of disposing of the public lands would occupy the attention of Congress during the then ensuing session; and that, by the delay Mr. Jones could form a more correct judgment of the course which it would be most eligible for him to pursue relative to this subject. That, while the informant was waiting on Mr. Jones to the door, at his departure, Mr. Jones asked him if there could be any impropriety in a member of Congress being concerned in an application for a grant of lands? The informant answered, that it would depend on the circumstances under which the application was made: proper, if the application was made to a Land Office, but otherwise, if made to the Legislature; because, in the latter case, it would be for a man to contract with himself. To this answer Mr. Jones gave an explicit assent. That the informant never, at any time, before or afterwards, to his remembrance, saw the said Whitney, until he saw him in this city, during the present session. That the informant came from his own home to New York in company with Colonel Pepune, stated by the said Whitney as one of his associates. That the informant hath been informed, and believes that the said Pepune is now in this city, but that he had never spoken to the informant on the subject of the said land speculation. That, not long after the arrival of the informant in this city, the said Whitney one morning waited on him, and stated to him an intended memorial respecting the tract of land aforesaid, and urged on the consideration of the informant the motives of a public nature for a grant thereof. That the informant inquired of the said Whitney to what State he belonged? and being answered, to Vermont, he recommended to him to request the Representatives of that State to present the memorial. That the said Whitney requested the informant to peruse his memorial, when it should be prepared, which he undertook was not then the case. That he answered, according to his best recollection, that, whenever he had leisure he should be willing to do it; or to that effect. That the whole time of the interview he believes did not exceed six, he is very confident could not exceed ten, minutes. That twice afterwards the informant's servant informed him that the said Whitney wished to see him, and that he caused himself to be denied; and the informant is very confident he never undertook either to draft or present any memorial for the said Whitney.

"On the morning of the twenty-eighth of December, Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, informed the informant of what he afterwards stated in evidence to the House respecting Robert Randall. The informant advised Mr. Smith, as soon as possible, to make the same known to the House of Representatives, which Mr. Smith informed the informant he had determined to do; and the informant, having previously advised the said Whitney to apply to the Representatives of Vermont, he thought it his duty, and he accordingly took the earliest opportunity to request Mr. Smith of that State, to avoid presenting any memorial with which he might be intrusted for a grant of land, and desired him to make the same request to Mr. Buck, the other member from the same State.

"The informant further declares, that he never, to his remembrance, saw Robert Randall, till he saw him at the bar of the House.

"THEODORE SEDGWICK."

Mr. W. SMITH submitted, whether it would be proper to proceed any farther in the case of Randall, till some hearing had been given to Whitney.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was happy to find the business drawing to a conclusion, and that the character of the servants of the people would come through it pure, in the view of every unbiassed mind. The grounds of the whole matter were plain enough. Some British traders wanted to secure the lands between the lakes to themselves, and the traffic with the Indians. They made dupes of these two men; and then the latter attempted to dupe the Representatives of the people. These circumstances were in the nature of things. They might be traced to that immense keenness for landed speculation so common in America. Randall had run the gauntlet very well. He had been through the hands of the civil officers. He had also been in the hands of another set of gentlemen, who, as Mr. RUTHERFORD judged, had conducted themselves with great propriety. The character of the House was fairly cleared, at which Mr. R. was happy. He wished Randall to be now sent for, to receive a reprimand from the SPEAKER, and then be sent back to a short confinement, perhaps for a day or two. Then let him go, without further loss of time. Some people have thought that it was wrong to have pushed the inquiry. This opinion was erroneous; but now, since we have got honorably over with it, let the man be set off.

It was then moved by a member that the case of Randall should be postponed. After some conversion, as to the point of order, the motion was negatived.

Mr. HARPER then read two resolutions. Of the first, the following is the substance:

"Resolved, That any attempt to influence the conduct of this House, or its members, on subjects appertaining to their Legislative functions, by motives other than the public advantage, is an high contempt of this House, and a breach of its privileges."

The second resolution was, in substance, that Randall having committed such an offence, was guilty of such a contempt, &c.

Mr. HARPER thought it proper, before deciding as to Randall, to lay down certain principles, and decide whether the offence was in itself criminal or not, before determining the conduct of the prisoner.

Mr. KITCHELL thought these resolutions unnecessary. The only thing before the House was to call on the prisoner, and pronounce him either innocent or guilty.

Mr. HARPER, in defence of his resolutions, said, that one misfortune attending privileges was, that they could not be exactly defined; but as far as they could be ascertained, it was the business of the House to do so. If this offence is a breach of privilege, we are entitled to declare it such, that the people of the United States may be informed that it is so.

Mr. W. SMITH could not conceive how any member would vote against this first resolution. If we refuse to say that the act itself is a crime, how can we condemn Randall as criminal? We are, in every sense of the word, bound to vote for the proposition. We have declared the attempt of Randall to be an high offence and contempt. If any member thinks it not so, then to be sure, he will vote against it. Mr. SMITH said that Legislative bodies had frequently, while a prisoner was on trial before them, laid down rules to guide them, previous to their pronouncing sentence. A former member had suggested that it was better to make the resolution a preamble to the sentence, and introduce it with a whereas. As it stands at present, it is agreeable to what had been done already.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped that members were not to be bound by anything yet done. At the first embarking of the House in this affair, he had felt doubts. His scruples had gradually augmented, and he was now of opinion that Randall should not have been meddled with at all in the present way. The right of privilege had been given up, unless in cases of absolute necessity. He did not think that any resolution had yet passed the House, upon due consideration, whether they had a right to proceed or not. Mr. NICHOLAS recommended lenity, rather than a parade of integrity, where there was no ground of suspicion—a parade which would not have been made if there had been any real danger.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought the resolutions altogether unnecessary. The principle is already entered on the Journals. All that the House have to do is to declare Randall guilty or not.

Mr. HILLHOUSE agreed with Mr. WILLIAMS, but he was astonished at the doctrine held up by the gentleman from Virginia. We had been told yesterday, at the bar, that the offence is not punishable by the common law. We are not to do so by privilege. The consequence is, that an attempt to corrupt members cannot be punished at all. It would not be proper to tell this to the public. Any body may then come here and bid for votes.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought that the counsel yesterday had fairly given up the point, for they admitted that improper violence without doors was a breach of privilege. Mr. H. argued that this was as great a violence as could be. He was for inflicting a punishment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON thought the wording of the first clause too broad. Any member spoken to without doors might come into the House and complain of a breach of privilege on trifling grounds.

Mr. GILES would not at present enter into the question whether there had been a breach of privilege or not. From anything yet seen, he was doubtful. He was against the preamble. Privilege was of an insinuating nature. Mr. LIVINGSTON had taken up a thought which occurred to Mr. GILES. Any man meeting on the street a member of this House, may say to him, "Sir, by voting for such a thing in the House, you will destroy your popularity in your district." This argument was not on motives of public good, and a member might by this resolution be warranted to come into the House and complain of it as a breach of privilege. He wished for the previous question, which was taken, and by a great majority the resolution was negatived.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then read two resolutions. Their tenor was, that it appears to this House that Robert Randall has been guilty of a contempt and a breach of the privileges of this House, by attempting to corrupt the integrity of its members, in the manner laid to his charge, and that Randall should be called up to the bar, reprimanded by the SPEAKER, and recommitted to custody, till further orders from this House.

On the first resolution the yeas and nays were called for—yeas 78, nays 17.

After some conversation, the second resolution was likewise agreed to.

Randall was then brought to the bar, and in a few words reprimanded by the SPEAKER. To call his offence indiscretion, impropriety, or indelicacy, was too mild a name. His conduct was crime. His apparent ignorance of the nature and extent of his guilt had induced the House to be more indulgent than they otherwise would have been. The SPEAKER informed him that he was recommitted to custody till further orders from the House.

Mr. CHRISTIE then asked leave to have his written declaration entered in the Journals, which was agreed to in the words following:

"The declaration of Gabriel Christie is, that some time in the month of October or November last, this informant was in Philadelphia, when he saw Robert Randall, who had, as he informed this informant, just returned from Canada, where he had been disappointed in the business he went to that country on; but he, Randall, informed this informant that, on his way home, he had called at Detroit, where he had spent some time, and had, he believed, entered into an association, to which, if he got the consent of the Government of the United States, would be a considerable advantage to him, and those who chose to associate with him, provided he liked the speculation. He then informed this informant that he had associated with a number of influential persons at Detroit for the purpose of obtaining the pre-emption right to a large tract of country within the territory of the United States, and produced to this informant the original association. After this informant had heard all that Randall had to communicate to him, this informant told Randall that he considered his scheme as a wild-goose one, and that this informant would not have any concern in it. Randall then requested this informant to give him his opinion in what manner he, Randall, ought to proceed. This informant told him that the most proper person to apply to was Mr. Randolph, the late Secretary of State, and if he, Randall, thought proper, this informant would inform Mr. Randolph of it, and get his advice; which Randall agreed to. This informant then went to Mr. Randolph, and gave him all the information that the informant had received from Randall. After considering the business for some time, Mr. Randolph advised that an application should be made to the President of the United States; which advice the informant gave to Randall, who seemed, at that time, fully satisfied with the proposal, and requested the informant to introduce him to the President for that purpose; but, as this informant was going out of town in a day or two, he told Randall that he would introduce him to the President on his return to Congress. When the informant came to Philadelphia, in December, he found Randall in the city; and, after asking Randall what he had done in his business, and whether he still meant to apply to the President, Randall then informed the informant that his friend and associate, Mr. Whitney, had arrived in Philadelphia, and that, upon consulting with him, they came to a determination not to apply to the President, as he heretofore had agreed, but had determined to present a memorial to the Legislature for a grant of the said land. This informant told Randall that he disapproved of this mode, and asked Randall who had advised him to it. Randall then informed the informant that the said Whitney had informed him that he had consulted with a number of the Eastern members of Congress, and in particular with Mr. Sedgwick, who had advised this mode of proceeding. Randall also informed this informant that Mr. Sedgwick had agreed to draw up and present his memorial. This informant then informed Randall that, by this mode of proceeding, he had put it out of this informant's power to be concerned with him, if he thought ever so well of it. Randall asked the informant the reason. The informant answered, that it would be improper in any member of Congress to be concerned in anything that he was to vote on. This informant was not able to impress Randall with the propriety of his remark. The informant never understood that Mr. Sedgwick was, in any manner, concerned with Randall or his associates; but that he, Mr. Sedgwick, thought the thing a public benefit, and would support it. That Randall never informed this informant that any of the members of Congress were concerned, but that a majority of them thought favorably of the plan, and would support it. In all the conversation the informant had with Randall, this informant told him that he could not expect this informant's assistance, as the informant would never agree to sell any of the lands of the United States for less than a dollar per acre. Randall then informed the informant, before a witness, that it was strange that the informant was the only person in Congress that he had applied to but what seemed to think favorably of his plan. The informant told Randall that his opinion was fixed, and still advised his application to the President, which Randall declined.

"G. CHRISTIE.

"January 5, 1796."

And then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 7.

CASE OF CHARLES WHITNEY.

After disposing of sundry petitions—

MR. SEDGWICK called for the order of the day, viz: the farther proceeding in the hearing of Charles Whitney. This was agreed to.

MR. GILES, while Mr. Whitney was sent for, rose, and said that he was strongly impressed with the propriety of paying honorably every man to whom the United States were in arrears for military service. He should therefore lay on the table a resolution on which he did not wish immediately to take the sense of the House. The resolution was then read, and, in substance, proposes that the proper officers be directed to lay before this House a list of all officers and soldiers of the late Continental Army and Navy who appear, on the books of the United States, to have arrears due to them, with a statement of the respective amounts.

MR. Whitney was now brought in. The SPEAKER addressed him as follows: "Charles Whitney, the information lodged against you on the Journals of the House will now be read to you by the Clerk." This was accordingly done.

MR. Whitney was next asked at what time he would be ready to proceed with his defence? He replied that he thought he could be ready to go on just now, if he had counsel. If he could get them to-morrow, he should be glad to go on then, in order to get the thing over. If counsel could not be got, he would request a delay till Monday. He was sure Mr. BUCK had mistaken his meaning. He was told that he would be called on again to-morrow, and if he had not been able to obtain counsel then, there was a probability of his being allowed a delay till Monday.

MR. BOVARS stated the hardship of obliging the prisoner to fee counsel; no probability existing of any thing farther being brought against him. There was but little in the charge, admitting it to be true. MR. B. made a distinction of the conversation having passed in Vermont, not in Philadelphia. It was before MR. BUCK came to Congress at all.

MR. GILES had yesterday expressed but little satisfaction at the mode of conducting this business, nor had his satisfaction been since augmented by farther reflection. He read a motion, which was seconded, for dismissing Whitney immediately. Admitting all which stood charged, MR. GILES did not consider it as containing any breach of privilege.

Mr. W. SMITH regarded this resolution as premature; he wished to have the regular forms of trial gone through, as in the other case. When the trial was finished, the House could then decide on the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. He thought that Mr. BUCK ought to be sworn. When the offer was made in Vermont, he was looked upon as a member of Congress, and the temptation which had been held out to him was a contempt of the House. There was not yet a sufficient explanation to justify his discharge.

Mr. HILLHOUSE supposed corruption to be equally criminal in Vermont as in Philadelphia. It would commit the dignity of the House to say that we have kept a man in jail for a week, and then have dismissed him without a trial. It implies that we never had any right to arrest him. Mr. H. had not formed his ultimate opinion on the subject. He wished the trial to be gone through, and then, if the prisoner proved innocent, dismiss him. He had made application to a member in this town, besides Mr. BUCK in Vermont. [Mr. GOODHUE, on whom Mr. Whitney called, after he came to Philadelphia.]

Mr. BUCK objected to the immediate dismissal of Whitney. It struck him as an impropriety to dismiss the prisoner by an unqualified resolution. It would be better to state, as a reason, that the attempt to corrupt the integrity of a member had happened in Vermont, before the sitting down of Congress. Then let the question come forward and be tried.

Mr. SEDGWICK had, more than was usual with him, avoided speaking on this question. He early entertained an idea that an application to a member of Congress, before it sat, was not a breach of privilege. It was an unfortunate circumstance when the same persons were to be both judges and parties. People were apt to get into a passion when one came to them and said, "I consider you as rascals, and I want to purchase a portion of your rascality."

Mr. MADISON said, it appeared to him that the House could have no privileges, unless what arises from the necessity of the case. He differed from the opinion formed by the House, but he wished them to act in conformity to their own principle. The object at present before the House is, to keep its members free from corruption. Whether a proposal is made in town or country, if we dismiss names and circumstances, and look only to the substance of the thing, there is no distinction between the two cases.

Mr. PAGE said, that if the motion for dismissing had come on a week ago, he would have voted for it. He wished to get rid of the matter as fast as possible. He alluded, though not in direct terms, to the idea of Mr. LEWIS, that it would have been better to have kicked some people down stairs, than to have made them objects of prosecution.

Mr. HARPER considered it as a material distinction between a member being attacked and beaten, for example, in Philadelphia, during his attendance on Congress, and the same accident occurring during the recess, in a distant part of the country. It was admitted that the doctrine of privilege violated the rights of the people, and could be justified only upon the plea of necessity: it being so liable to misapprehension and misconception, he wished to see as little of it as possible. He gave his hearty concurrence to the resolution of Mr. GILES. He had been desirous of seeing such a thing brought forward. He adverted to the delicate situation of the House, at once accusers, judges, and witnesses.

Mr. GALLATIN spoke a few words in favor of the motion.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH was persuaded that the House possesses privileges, and has a right to exert them. They are pointed out by the Constitution. Mr. S. wished to dismiss the prisoner. It had been said that dismissing him without a trial, after having apprehended and confined him, would be casting a reflection on the House. No such thing! There existed probable grounds of suspicion. We have waited full time, and no proof has come forward. Then let him go, and the sooner that we do it the better.

When Mr. ISAAC SMITH sat down, Mr. GILES rose to offer a resolution, in place of his former one:

"Resolved, That it appears to this House that the information lodged against Charles Whitney does not amount to a breach of the privileges of this House, and that he therefore be discharged from custody."

Mr. FREEMAN voted yesterday in a minority for dismissing Randall. He would this day vote for discharging Whitney. As to the dignity of the House, even an outrage upon it could be as well punished by a Justice of the Peace as by ourselves. He stated the extreme difficulty of adopting, in practice, the doctrine laid down, that an improper offer made to a member when in the country, was to be punished as a breach of privilege. A member, suppose from Georgia, comes here, and tells a story of somebody in that State who has made him an unsuitable proposal: the Sergeant-at-Arms is instantly despatched a thousand miles to bring this person to the bar for contempt of the House. What kind of a business would this be?

Mr. HARTLEY thought the resolution last offered by Mr. GILES had too much narrowed the ground of dismissing Whitney. He had been taken up as an associate with Randall. The charge had not been properly supported by evidence. Dismiss him, and let the want of proof be your reason for it. Mr. H. cordially agreed with the substance of the resolution, but he objected to the wording of it.

Mr. NATHANIEL SMITH believed that the great difference in opinion on this question arose from the different grounds on which the doctrine of privilege had been placed. Some gentlemen had supposed the only ground for the privilege contended for was to secure the members from actual bribery. Of course they supposed that equal danger might occur before or after leaving their residence in the country. Mr. SMITH contended that this idea placed privilege on a wrong ground. This idea would be disgraceful to the members. He would not admit that any gentleman in the House would take a bribe, that there was real danger of it, or that there could be a necessity to prevent it. Personally, he held such an imputation in the highest contempt. He imagined that the question ought to be set on a very different ground. If the opinion which he would now state was correct, it would evince the propriety of convicting Randall yesterday, and of acquitting Whitney to-day. The ground of privilege he took to be this: the indignity offered to the House through the medium of its members. It might be asked, why members ought to be privileged from insults while sitting as a deliberative body? He had several answers. In the first place, members ought to be able to proceed with due deliberation. They could not, as Mr. S. conceived, do so, if subject to be insulted with the offer of bribes, or with other indignities, every time that they went without the bar. Mr. S. had a second reason why members should not, while acting as a Legislative body, be liable to offensive intrusions. It was requisite for their being publicly useful, that they should enjoy public confidence, which confidence the being open to intrigues tended to destroy. These Mr. S. regarded as the true grounds on which the doctrine of privilege ought to be founded; he conceived that this doctrine could not extend to a member at his residence in the country. Hence the propositions made by Whitney to Mr. Buck in Vermont, were not a breach of the privileges of the House. For this reason he was in favor of discharging the prisoner from the bar, though in doing so, he differed from the reasons of several other gentlemen.

Mr. KIRCHELL pointed out the wide distinction between the cases of Randall and Whitney. It had been said that the latter must be criminal, for he was an associate with Randall. Mr. K. saw no such thing. There was no criminality in the bond. Keep a man in jail week after week upon idle suspicion! In justice, Whitney ought to have been tried at first, when he declared himself ready for trial. Mr. K. was for discharging him this day.

Mr. HARPER now moved an amendment to the resolution before the House: it was in these words:

"Inasmuch as the proposals made by the said Whitney took place before the member to whom they were addressed had taken his seat in the House."

Mr. GILES. If the amendment succeeded, he would vote against the whole proposition. This was a renewal of the attempt to define privilege. It was not practicable. Every case of the kind must stand upon its own merits. Mr. G. would vote against the amendment.

Mr. MACON read a resolution that Charles Whitney be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. This was, in fact, reducing the second resolution offered by Mr. GILES back into his first one.

Mr. SENDWICK thought it an awkward thing to attempt giving any reasons. If gentlemen are willing to agree to discharge Mr. Whitney, they ought to discharge him. They assign different reasons for the same proceedings, and will not consent to it, but each in his own particular mode.
4TH CON.—8

Mr. HARPER was astonished to hear so many invincible objections to telling the motives why we agree in a measure. It had been complained that privilege was undefined; that it was an assuming, creeping monster. An attempt had been made to define it, in part, and this also had been objected to.

Mr. MACON said, that he would vote to discharge Whitney, for a particular reason alleged by Mr. GILES.

Now, replied Mr. GILES, if the gentleman is to vote for the dismission because that is my reason, I desire him to vote against the dismission. My reason for discharging Whitney is totally different. I argue that all which we have entered on the Journals, admitting it proved, does not amount to any breach of our privileges. That is my motive for dismissing the prisoner.

An amendment was proposed to strike out of the resolution of Mr. GILES the following words: "That it appears to this House, that the information lodged against Charles Whitney does not amount to a breach of the privileges of this House; and." The amendment was agreed to—ayes 43, noes 41.

It was then moved to alter the remainder of the resolution, by striking out the word "he," and inserting "Charles Whitney." The amendment was adopted; and the resolution so amended, stood thus:

"Resolved, That Charles Whitney be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms."

This also was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH proposed an amendment. It was, in substance, assigning as a reason for the discharge of Mr. Whitney, that the offence against Mr. Buck had been committed in Vermont, before that gentleman took his seat in Congress.

Mr. MACON objected that this amendment was only bringing the House back to the ground which they had just quitted, and making them go over the same arguments a second time.

Mr. GILES said, that the former amendment to his resolution, viz: that suggested by Mr. HARPER, went at the head of his resolution. The one now proposed by the member from South Carolina went at the tail of it. This was the only difference between them. This way of making amendments was endless.

Mr. BOURNE was in favor of this amendment. It would be singular to discharge the man without assigning some reason for it on the Journals.

Mr. GALLATIN. Mr. Whitney was at the bar this morning, and we directed him to prepare for his defence. He is now gone, after having denied the charge laid against him. In the absence of the man himself, and without allowing him an opportunity for vindication, we are, by this amendment, to declare on the Journals, that he made an attempt on the integrity of a member, but because it was before the member took his seat, &c. What kind of treatment is this? What right have this House to keep an American citizen ten days in jail, and then declare him infamous, without permitting him to be heard in his defence? He has said that the gentleman from Vermont misunderstood him. I believe that what the member said is true; but it may possibly be explained away. I will not vote for insulting a man by declaring him guilty at the very moment when we are forced to dismiss him, because we cannot find proof that he is so.

Mr. W. SMITH, in answer to what Mr. GILES had said about the head and tail of his resolution, said that he could make neither head nor tail of the argument used by the gentleman from Virginia. He had risen to make his amendment, because he thought himself as well entitled as that member, or any other member in the House, to deliver his own opinions, and to suggest such amendments as he judged proper. The objections of Mr. GALLATIN could be readily obviated by an amendment which he would read.

Mr. VENABLE was against the amendment before the House. It was quite immaterial where an offence was committed. A plan might be laid in Vermont. A gentleman might afterwards come to this House and act upon it; and vote for a measure that would ruin the country.

The amendment of Mr. W. SMITH was, on a division, negatived.

Mr. LIVINGSTON was for discharging the prisoner immediately, though he believed both him and Randall guilty of the offences alleged against them. They had not been in good company; he did not like the proposal the better because it originated with British merchants; though that circumstance did not amount to a proof of guilt. He alluded to the wars excited by British emissaries on the frontiers. Timeo Danaos dona ferentes. I dread these Britons and the gifts they bring. He then entered into a calculation, in order to prove that Randall and Whitney could actually have given away twenty-four shares out of thirty-six, and still, at the rate proposed, have a very large reversion of profit to themselves. He warned the House that he did not intend to affirm that the guilt of the prisoners was positively ascertained, but the evidence adduced had made an impression of that sort upon his mind.

Mr. PAGE said, he would vote for the motion to discharge Whitney, that he might be consistent with his vote of yesterday, and because he could not find any definition of the offence with which Whitney is charged in the books of our laws. If he could even find it in definitions of breach of privilege in the British Parliament, he found no punishment which this House was, by the Constitution, authorized to inflict. Parliament rules are, it is true, applicable to the proceedings of this House, and some of them have been happily applied here. But Mr. PAGE did not think parliamentary precedents respecting cases of breach of privilege, by any means applicable to the situation or powers of Congress. The Constitution had defined those powers, and he hoped never to exceed them. He hoped that the House would get rid of an affair so foreign to their peculiar business of legislation as quickly as possible. He would have agreed to the present motion, had it been made a week since, and had it even extended to Randall. An insult had been offered by both prisoners to individual members; but how far that was an insult to Congress, or how Congress should resent it, might be doubted. He thought, with one of Randall's counsel, that the insulted member might have chastised him, or might have prosecuted him. He believed that there was no conceivable offence, but what could either be punished in a court of law, or a repetition of it be prevented by a new law. The present proceedings are not calculated to preserve the House against similar insults, nor necessary for securing the reputation and integrity of its members. As for protection from insults offered by the gallery, or persons in the street, he would go as far as any member in support of it; but he believed that the House might rely on the laws, and on their constituents, for protection, with more propriety than on British precedents. The present proceedings, if published as a precedent, will more likely produce discontent than respect. It is the duty of legislators to prevent injustice and establish uniform rules for proceeding against offenders. Hence it does not become them, in their own cause, to be prosecutors, witnesses, judges, and jurors. The majority who voted yesterday to punish Randall, may with consistency vote against the dismissal of Whitney. Both are charged with the same offence, and similar proof has, in both instances, been adduced. It is said that the offence was committed at Vermont, before the privilege of the member commenced. This was not an extenuation. It was more dangerous for a member to get such applications when at home than after he came to Congress. Mr. P. would rather be attempted here than at home. He was for the resolution.

Mr. W. SMITH had, early in the debate, observed, that a final determination this day, would be premature. He, therefore, moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till Monday. Gentlemen seemed to regret the extreme criminality of the plan. It went to rob the United States of a property worth perhaps twenty millions of dollars.

Mr. GILES was for discharging the prisoner instantly, because though every tittle were true, that stands on our Journals against him, it does not, altogether, amount to a breach of privilege. He had been, he believed, this day, a dozen of times upon his legs, to explain his reasons, and they had still been misunderstood. Indeed, if we are to talk on from day to day, for the purpose of protracting Whitney's confinement, it would be better to vote plainly for so many days of imprisonment. Mr. G. could not help observing, that in all which was said this day, he did not hear a single sentiment of sympathy for the sufferings of this poor man, who had been kept ten days in jail, on an accusation that, if proved, did not amount to an offence.

Indian Trading Houses.

[H. OF R.]

The motion for postponing till Monday was negatived, only eighteen members rising to support it.

A second motion was then made for postponing till to-morrow (Friday.) Only thirty-two members rose in its favor. Negatived.

The resolution was then read :

Resolved, That Charles Whitney be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The yeas and nays were called for and taken—yeas 52, nays 30.

The prisoner was then brought to the bar. The SPEAKER addressed him thus :

“Charles Whitney: the House have thought proper to discharge you without further hearing, by a resolution that will be read to you by the Clerk.”

This was done; the prisoner went off; and the House, at half past three o'clock, adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 8.

JEREMIAH CRABB, from Maryland, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MUHLENBERG in the Chair, on the bill to establish trading houses for the Indian tribes.

Mr. DAYTON objected to the bill, so far as it empowers those who are to sell the goods to the Indians, to procure or purchase the goods. He considered the uniting these powers in the same persons as highly exceptionable, and liable to great abuse. He moved to strike out the words “procure or.”

Mr. PARKER said that the objection was misapplied, for subsequent clauses placed the business under the special direction of the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES. He should not, however, object to striking out the words. His view in rising was merely to justify the committee who reported the bill, as they had supposed that sufficient guards were provided.

Mr. GILES did not think the reason given for retaining the words sufficient. The PRESIDENT cannot be supposed to have such cognizance of every part of this business as will enable him to secure the public, or Indians, from imposition. He was for increasing the checks against abuse.

The motion for striking out was agreed to.

In the third section, Mr. SEDGWICK objected to the words “laying aside all view of gain by the trade.” They might operate disadvantageously to the people of the United States, if Government should enter into this trade on a principle that would preclude all private adventures in the same line by citizens. The words were expunged.

Mr. PARKER presented a substitute. It relates to compensation of agents and clerks to be employed. The sum of ——— dollars was to be appropriated. The substitute was adopted by the Committee.

In the seventh section Mr. SEDGWICK moved an amendment, providing for the forfeiture of licenses in case of contravening the provisions of the law. This motion was withdrawn in order to introduce the provision elsewhere.

Mr. MILLENGER moved to strike out the whole of this seventh section. It appeared to him to involve provisions which would be proper in another law, but in this bill blended two different subjects.

Mr. SEDGWICK considered the provisions in this section referring to certain rules for regulating the public trade with the Indians, as proper, since similar rules would be made in regulating the trade of individuals with Indians. On this ground he was for retaining the section.

It was moved to modify the section by confining the provisions to “the agents or clerks,” specially employed by the United States. This amendment was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. SEDGWICK, the last clause of the seventh section, relative to the oath or affirmation, was expunged.

The Committee then rose; the Chairman reported the bill with the amendments, which were taken up, and agreed to by the House, with one verbal amendment.

Mr. SWIFT expressed his disapprobation of the bill. He thought the object unattainable to any important extent. He disapproved of public bodies being concerned in trade. It is always managed better by individuals. Great loss and dilapidation are the consequence; nor is it possible to guard against frauds and abuses. The public have no money to spare. It is the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means, that additional taxes will be necessary for the public service. We must not tax our constituents for the sake of trading with the Indians. He hoped not. Mr. S. concluded by a motion for striking out the first section.

Mr. PARKER supported the principle of the bill; he wished a fair experiment to be made. The plan is founded on humanity and benevolence. It has been recommended by the PRESIDENT from year to year. Mr. P., on this subject, had been in sentiment with him. It was well known he had never lightly advocated a disbursement of public money; on this occasion, it would be a saving of public money. It will cost much less to conciliate the good opinion of the Indians than to pay men for destroying them.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was in favor of an experiment. Much had been anticipated from the plan; a beginning had been made, and he thought it best to try it for such a length of time as would afford a fair experiment of what could be done.

Mr. SWANWICK said he was in favor of the principles of the bill, were it merely as a change from our usual system of Indian affairs. We have hitherto pursued war at an expense of a million and a half of dollars nearly annually; let us now try the fruits of commerce, that beneficent power which cements and civilizes so many nations; barbarous till they became acquainted with its influence. To encourage us, indeed, a fact hath come to our knowledge on the investigation of the case of Randall. Gentlemen will remember his assertions to them, and the deed read in the House, in which so much was stated of the influence of the Canada traders over the Indians: well, let us try to balance or countervail this influence; but it has been observed, our private citizens will do this sufficiently in the way of their private trade. In general I am friendly to let commerce take its own level, without Governmental interference; but the little influence our traders have yet obtained, shows plainly enough defective capital or a defective extent of trade; both are to be apprehended. So many objects of speculation offer in this country, that individuals may not pay sufficient attention to this branch, in which they have so powerful a British interest to contend with. Government, alone, can do this in the infancy of the commerce. Let the experiment be made; we can lose little by it; we may gain a great deal. It has been observed, that this act hath been rejected in three different sessions of Congress already; and this is argued as a proof of its want of merit; but this hath been the fate in England of the navigation act; it was hundreds of years struggling to get into existence, but was not the less acceptable when at last it succeeded. Perhaps we may find this bill, on experience, none the worse for the difficulties, which, as an untried step, it hath hitherto had to encounter: it is recommended by general reasoning; let us try it; we can only repeal it if we find it does not answer the sanguine expectations entertained of it.

Mr. MACON was opposed to the bill. He thought the circumstance of the business having been so long in agitation, was a reason why it should be longer considered. The reason for delay was certainly not weakened by that. The business was highly improper for Government to embark in.

Mr. MURRAY had but one idea to suggest, as it was unnecessary to go over the general policy, which had been amply stated by other gentlemen. There appeared to him two objects; first, the securing the Indian friendship by a supply of their wants; second, the supplanting the British traders in their influence over the tribes whose hostilities might embarrass us. To the last object, therefore, the meditated mode of supply by public agency was peculiarly well adapted. The Indians are now supplied by a great company long established, very wealthy, and possessing this influence, in which we must supplant them. We are to consider whether, if private individuals are left to be the only competitors with the Canada company, this influence and this trade will be transferred agreeably to sound policy. He thought they would not. Small capitalists, and adventurers young in this trade, would certainly prove unequal to a competition with so well established and rich a company as the Canada company. It was no uncommon thing for great companies, when they were apprehensive of what they would call interlopers, to crush all competition by making a voluntary sacrifice of a few thousand pounds sterling. By underselling, on a large scale, for a time, and even a certain loss, they secured themselves in future from competition. This great company can afford to pay this price for the perpetuity of this trade and influence. In order to meet the capital of this company, we must not trust to individual small capitalists. By a sum appropriated by Government to the object, however large the capital in competition in Canada, the Government will be able to beat down the trade of this company and place it in American hands; and in a few years after the competition has ceased, the Government may then withdraw its agency, and leave it to private capitals, to which the field will then have been rendered easy.

The motion of Mr. SWIFT was negatived; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PERMANENT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I transmit to you a memorial of the Commissioners appointed by virtue of an act, entitled "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent Seat of the Government of the United States," on the subject of the public buildings under their direction.

Since locating a district for the permanent Seat of the Government of the United States, as heretofore announced to both Houses of Congress, I have accepted the grants of money and of land stated in the memorial of the Commissioners. I have directed the buildings therein mentioned to be commenced, on plans which I deemed consistent with the liberality of the grants and proper for the purposes intended.

I have not been inattentive to this important business intrusted by the Legislature to my care. I have viewed the resources placed in my hands, and observed the manner in which they have been applied: the progress is pretty fully detailed in the memorial from the Commissioners; and one of them attends to give further information if required. In a case new and arduous, like the present, difficulties might naturally be expected: some have occurred; but they are in a great degree surmounted; and I have no doubt, if the remaining resources are properly cherished, so as to prevent the loss of property by hasty and numerous sales, that all the buildings required for the accommodation of the Government of the United States may be completed in season, without aid from the Federal Treasury. The subject is therefore recommended to the consideration of Congress, and the result will determine the measures which I shall cause to be pursued with respect to the property remaining unsold.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 8, 1796.

The Message and memorial were read, and referred to a select committee.

CHARLES WHITNEY.

A letter was read from Charles Whitney, enclosing a petition. Mr. Whitney requested the House to hear the evidence of Colonel Silas Pe-pune, who is now in town, in his vindication. The letter was dated in prison. His creditors, alarmed by the proceedings of the House, have arrested him in jail, so that this affair has virtually ruined him.

The letter and petition were ordered to lie on the table, and then the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, January 11.

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

The bill for establishing trading houses with the Indians was read.

Mr. S. SMITH moved, as an amendment, to strike out the words "jurisdiction thereof." The motion was withdrawn to make room for another, suggested by Mr. BLOUNT. This was, that the engrossed bill should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House. It was accordingly made the order of the day for to-morrow.

EXCISE DUTY UPON SNUFF.

Mr. GOODHUE presented a petition from certain snuff-makers, in the State of Massachusetts. They complain of the hardship of laying on the excise upon the mortar. If an excise is necessary, they recommend that it should be transferred back again to the weight. The petition was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

ARREARS FOR MILITARY SERVICES.

Mr. GILES called up his motion, laid on the table a few days ago, relative to procuring from the proper officers an account of arrears, due by the United States for military services to individuals. It was referred to the Committee of Claims, to report on the practicability and expediency of the resolution.

NAVAL ARMAMENT.

Mr. W. SMITH observed to the House, that, in the law regarding the equipment of the six frigates, there was a clause directing that the building should be suspended, in case of a peace being concluded between this country and the Algerines. Mr. S. read the clause in the act. He had not yet formed his own opinion. He wished the sense of the House to be known. If it was thought better to sell the materials, there had been so great a rise in the price, that they could be disposed of at such a rate as to avoid any loss to the United States. If it was thought proper to lay the money aside, as a naval fund, Mr. S. read a number of resolutions, which he would probably submit to the House; in the present stage of the business they were premature. He now submitted to the House the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to repeal the last section of the act, entitled 'An act to provide a Naval Armament.'"

Mr. PARKER said, that the committee appointed on the state of the Naval Armament were in the daily expectation of getting information on the subject from the proper officers. He advised that any proceeding on it should not be had till after that was obtained. Ordered to lie on the table.

SURVEY OF THE SOUTHERN COAST.

On motion of Mr. MILLEDGE, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the select committee on the memorial of Parker, Hopkins, and Meers. The report was dated the 29th of December last, and being on a subject of the highest consequence to the commercial interest of this country, the following abstract of the report is presented:

"The coast not only of Georgia, but also of South Carolina, North Carolina and Virginia, has never been surveyed with the degree of accuracy which their importance to the commerce and navigation of the United States demand. As to Georgia, in particular, whose harbors are numerous, and as yet very little known, few observations have been made upon its coast, and those few have now become uncertain, from the shifting of bars, banks, and channels. The committee are of opinion, that, to obtain accurate surveys and charts of those coasts and inland navigation, would be an object of national importance and general advantage. They find that the memorialists have undertaken, and made considerable progress in this useful work. The whole coast of Georgia, from St. Mary's to Savannah, inclusive, with its harbors, rivers, and inland navigation, has been completed by them with a degree of accuracy and skill, as it appears to the committee, which will entitle their work to public patronage; and, although it is now ready for engraving, they, having exhausted their resources, declare themselves unable to proceed without assistance. The sum which they require is three thousand dollars, which, together with the copy-right, would be a reasonable compensation for what they have done, and would enable them to prosecute their enterprise with prospects of bringing it to an early completion. The copy-right, as the committee think, ought to be a part of the compensation, because it would lessen the actual expense to the public, and operate as an inducement to the undertakers to make the work as perfect as possible. Though the committee conceive a high opinion of the capacity of the memorialists, and accuracy of their work, they will not pronounce them the most proper persons to be employed in an undertaking so useful and important, nor say what sum may be necessary to carry it into effect; they think it would be more advisable to leave those points, under proper limitation, to the direction of the Executive, which will be disposed, no doubt, to give the memorialists preference, which the committee are inclined to believe they merit, and which, after making the proper inquiries, will be enabled to estimate the sums requisite, and adopt such expedients as may tend to lessen the expense. The employment of the revenue cutters in that service, when not more usefully occupied, is one measure which the committee consider as highly proper: they therefore recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to obtain, as soon as possible, complete and accurate charts, made out from actual survey and observation, of the seacoast, from the river St. Mary's, in Georgia, to Chesapeake Bay, inclusive, and that—dollars be appropriated for that purpose."

The SPEAKER and Mr. SWANWICK read each of them a motion for referring the subject generally to a committee. They wished to have the object of the motion extended.

Mr. MILLEDGE thought that if the matter took this turn, it would clog the business. The committee report that the surveys have been made with accuracy, and he therefore recommended such measures as would lead to an early publication. He represented the dangerous state of navigation on the coast of Georgia, where were many harbors totally undescribed.

Mr. SWANWICK hoped that there would not be an opposition to a general reference. He would vote for a recommitment on that principle.

Another member stated, that, from Charleston to St. Mary's river, there are few or no charts; many ships are lost for want of them. He hoped that the motion for recommitment would not prevail. This motion passed.

The Committee rose, and the Chairman reported. Mr. SWANWICK thought that the motion should be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, which has some analogous subjects before it. This was agreed to.

REMISSION OF DUTIES, &c.

A report from the Committee of Claims, on the petitions of Wright White, John Devereaux, and William and Archibald McNeills, was taken up and considered. They severally requested remission of duties on certain articles which had paid them. One of these was for a cargo of salt destroyed, on the second of August last, in a storm. The committee were of opinion that there seems no reason for remissions of this kind, any more than of the price itself, with which the duties paid must be understood to be incorporated. The petitions of William Smith and Joshua Carter were of the same nature. The whole of these petitioners had leave granted to withdraw their petitions.

In the case of Smith and Carter, the petitioners claim compensation for a vessel lost in consequence of having been misled by lights under the care of Government officers. It appeared that accident had destroyed one of the lights, and the principle established by this decision of the committee against the petition, determines that Government cannot be responsible in this way for even the negligence of the persons employed in the service of the light-houses.

The committee, also, on the petition of Moses Myers, recommended that he should have leave to withdraw it. Mr. GOODHUE said that it involved certain important points. He therefore moved that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole. Wednesday is appointed.

WILLIAM TOMKINS.

The report in the case of William Tomkins, of the county of Louisa, Virginia, was taken up. There had been a negative on this petition, during the last session, by a report from the Committee of Claims. Lieut. Robert Tomkins, brother to the petitioner, returned from the American Army with the small-pox. He infected the family. Henry Tomkins, the father, died, and his wife and children were reduced to distress.

Mr. TRACY remarked that Robert Tomkins died in 1777, before any commutation was promised, and therefore he thought the claim incompetent.

Mr. PARKER had known Mr. Tomkins, who was an officer in the regiment that he commanded. He likewise thought the prayer of the petition was inadmissible. Negatived.

CALEB NEWBOLD.

The report on the petition of Caleb Newbold, and others, was next read. The petition was for the price of a quantity of pork, taken in the late war, for the use of the American Army. The father of the petitioner had sued the State of Pennsylvania, and had been refused payment by a jury. The limitation act passed while this was first depending, so that time had been lost by an application in the wrong quarter, but not by negligence.

On motion, by Mr. MASON, the petition was referred back to the present Committee of Claims.

Mr. TRACY moved that such parts of the reports of the Committee of Claims, of this Congress, as have not been acted on, with the petitions and vouchers whereon they are founded, be referred back to the new committee. This was agreed to.

JABEZ JOHNSON.

A report on the petition of Jabez Johnson was taken up. He claimed payment for sixteen new four-pounder pieces. They had been, in 1775, removed from New York to King's Bridge, to prevent their falling into the hands of the British. The petitioner knew not what became of them afterwards. The report was unfavorable; but, on a motion by Mr. KITCHELL, the petition was referred back to the committee, because some new documents have appeared since the report was made.

SAMUEL HENRY.

The report on the petition of Samuel Henry was unfavorable, and the committee made such a report with the utmost reluctance and regret. He had been possessed of large property in Charlestown, when it was burnt by the British, at the battle of Bunker's Hill. He was reduced from affluence almost to want, and had, not long after, lost four sons in the war. The committee could not grant redress for property destroyed in this way, and the refusal of Mr. Henry's petition arose from the absolute necessity of adhering to some fixed rule. Multitudes of other persons were in the same situation; and it was, as Mr. SEDGWICK observed, beyond the power of this Government to satisfy such claims. Negatived.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 12.

A bill from the Senate to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry was read a first time. By a special order of the House, it was read a second time—there being for a second reading 41 against 26. This was done, and the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a report of appropriations and expenditures for the year 1796. The report was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday.

Indian Trading Houses—Robert Randall—J. B. Dumon.

[H. OF R.]

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

After receiving a number of petitions, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for establishing trading houses with the Indians. The Chairman read the bill.

A motion was made to strike out of the seventh section the words "having jurisdiction thereof."

Mr. PARKER wished the amendment to be withdrawn, lest the bill itself might be lost by the delay. The amendment might, if thought necessary, be made in the Senate.

The amendment produced a long conversation. At last, the Committee rose, and the Chairman reported the bill with two amendments, which were agreed to. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

CASE OF ROBERT RANDALL.

A petition was presented and read from Robert Randall. It represented that he was under close confinement by the orders, and during the pleasure, of the House. He hoped that his confinement, and the reprimand which he had received, would be judged a sufficient atonement for any offence or contempt which he might have committed against the honorable House. He solicited his release, and should, as in duty bound, ever pray, &c.

Mr. W. SMITH moved that this petition should be made the order of the day for to-morrow. Mr. SEDGWICK reminded the House of the petition presented some days ago for Whitney, soliciting that the House would consent to examine Colonel Pepune in his exculpation. Both petitions are to be taken up to-morrow.

CASE OF JOHN SEARS.

A report was made on the petition of John Sears. He solicited payment of arrears of pay due to John Fitzgerald, a soldier in the Maryland line. Sears had given him his own certificates, and was in lieu of them to receive the arrears expected to be due to Fitzgerald. On coming on to Philadelphia, Sears found that Fitzgerald had been returned as a deserter, and that his pay was of consequence forfeited. The committee, however, entertained suspicions that Fitzgerald might have been improperly entered as a deserter, which the man himself asserted. They found that General Greene, under whom Fitzgerald served in the Southern States, had once, from some circumstance of military necessity, advertised that soldiers who did not, by a certain day, appear at headquarters, should be ranked as deserters. In the end, several men whose furloughs were not expired, and others who were upon duty in different quarters, were returned as deserters; and as Fitzgerald had been in the service under Greene, it occurred that he might come under this description. They recommended that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury should be instructed to inquire, first, whether Fitzgerald was really a deserter or not; and, if he was not, whether the certificates had actually been delivered by him to Sears; and, if they were genuine, to pay them, notwithstanding the limitation act, within which, under the circumstances above stated, they did not consider the case to come. There did not appear, on the face of the transaction, that there had been any jobbing in the matter, but merely that Sears had wanted to accommodate Fitzgerald. This is a summary of the case, as related by Mr. TRACY, Chairman of the Committee of Claims.

Mr. GILES wished to strike out of the resolution recommended in the report the words following: "In the same manner as though no statute of limitation had barred his claim." The fact, as explained, seemed to be that the case was not within that statute.

Mr. TRACY was not anxious about the words. The committee had thought that the resolution read better with them. He gave some reasons for this opinion. The words were struck out; the resolution passed, and the Committee of Claims were directed to bring in a bill to that effect.

WILLIAM FINDLEY.

A report was read on the petition of William Findley, a soldier in the late Continental Army. He had received, by his own account, nineteen stabs of a bayonet, and no compensation. The Committee of Claims remark, that if only the nineteenth part of the story were true, he might have had a pension long ago: there was nothing to hinder it. He brought no evidence of his assertion. The House, on recommendation from the committee, granted him leave to withdraw the petition.

JOHN BAPTISTE DUMON.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and took up the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of John Baptiste Dumon. As this report produced some debate, and as the circumstances which it relates are interesting, it is here inserted at length.

"John Baptiste Dumon, of the Province of Canada, prays consideration and payment of the amount of four thousand three hundred and thirty-six dollars, which he thinks in equity the United States owe him, on the following statement, viz: His father was a warm friend to the American cause and Revolution; he lived in Quebec, and in 1775 and 1776, being a merchant, supplied the troops under General Wooster's command with many articles of clothing, and received paper money; that on the 6th May, 1776, he lent Colonel John Winslow, Paymaster, 892½ dollars, for which he took his bond for that sum in Continental bills of credit, not on interest, and was to have his money out of the first which arrived; that, when Colonel Winslow was on the road to Quebec soon after, the British landed, and prevented his making the payment. His father's house, on the Heights of Abraham, was used as a hospital by the Americans, for which reason the British troops burnt it; and for his attachment to the American cause his father was imprisoned, and suffered to a large amount. The petitioner, after the death of his father, and peace between Great Britain and the United States, found this bond of Colonel Winslow and 735 paper dollars in his father's desk; and on the 18th September, 1791, he received of Colonel Winslow the principal of the bond, without interest, and the bond was cancelled. He now requests a consideration for the interest of the sum contained in the bond; for the 735 dollars depreciated paper for the house burnt; and for his sufferings in prison—amounting to the sum of four thousand three hundred and thirty-six dollars, as stated above. His father died in 1783; was an aged and infirm man, and the petitioner a foreigner. These seem to be the reasons why an application was not made earlier than December, 1791, at which time this petition was preferred, and then referred to the Secretary of the Treasury; returned without any report, and, on the 5th January, 1795, referred to the Committee of Claims. By some documents with this petition, the committee are led to believe the actual bills were originally lodged with the petitioner: they were not delivered to this committee. The committee are of opinion the prayer of this petition cannot be granted, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw it."

Mr. LIVINGSTON argued for paying the interest of the bond granted by Captain Winslow. He confined himself to this point.

Mr. TRACY said, that he and the other gentlemen of the Committee of Claims would have been glad to gratify their feelings by complying with the prayer of the petition, if it could be done on any general principle by which business could be got along. They thought it impossible to comply with the request.

It was said by some member that there might have been an interested motive for letting the bond lie over, in order to get the principal, interest, and all together. To this it was replied, that there never could be any rational motive for such conduct. The compound interest of the money that would be sunk must very nearly have equalled the principal sum itself. The matter had lain over fifteen years. It was unjust to ascribe any such design to the petitioner.

Mr. DAXTON said, that before gentlemen opposed the report, they would do well to reflect. "The bond was to have been paid in Continental paper money: this had depreciated so much that Mr. Dumon was in reality better off with a late payment in specie.

In answer, a gentleman observed, that when he had money in his pocket, he was entitled to consider it worth as much as its value at that time in currency. Continental paper, in 1776, was not at all depreciated, and Mr. Dumon, he had no doubt, could have got it off his hands at full value.

The Committee agreed to the report. They rose; the Chairman reported progress, and the House agreed, and leave was granted to withdraw the petition.

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you an official statement of the expenditure to the end of the year 1795, from the sums heretofore granted to defray the contingent charges of the Government.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 13, 1796.

Ordered, That the said Message and statement do lie on the table.

A report from the Committee on Elections was presented by the Chairman, Mr. VENABLE. The Committee reported that Mr. John Richards, a member from the State of Pennsylvania, was duly elected, and recommended that he be permitted to take his seat. The report was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GILES, from the committee for reporting on an universal system of bankruptcy, introduced a bill, which was made the order of the day for Monday week, in Committee of the Whole.

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

The bill for establishing trading houses with the Indians was read a third time by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER proceeded to read it over again, in order to fill up the blanks.

The first blank in the bill was filled up with the words "one thousand" before "dollars."

The second blank was for the penalty for carrying on any other trade with the Indians, by the agents, than that warranted by the statute. It was filled up with "one thousand" dollars.

Another blank was for the sum to be allowed to Agents and Clerks. Six thousand dollars allowed.

The blank for the sum to be expended on goods was proposed to be filled up with one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. PARKER argued for this sum. Two hundred thousand had been recommended by the Secretary of State. Mr. P. told him that the fifty thousand granted formerly would be added to the appropriation of this year, and make up what was wanted. He said, that, having been lately at war with the Indians, and having happily closed it by a desirable peace, he hoped that measures would be taken to preserve a perpetual tranquility on the frontiers. He felt very sensibly for the distressed situation which these poor people had been in ever since the Europeans first landed in America. He hoped that steps would be pursued similar to those which France pursued before she lost her Colonies on this Continent, and which have been adopted by Britain ever since the United States became independent. It was well known, that though Carolina and Virginia had, while Colonies, been in constant war with the Indians, Pennsylvania supported a perpetual peace. No instance had occurred in history of a war between them till the war of the Revolution. The reason was, that the former Colonies carried the sword among the Indians—the latter, wagons loaded with goods. He considered this measure not only as beneficent, but he felt for the honor, the dignity, and the interest of the country, that the sum should be liberal. He wished that there should be at least a fair experiment for two years. All inquiries had tended to prove to the Committee that the sum proposed was not too much.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought an hundred thousand dollars were enough.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was for the larger sum. Economy, in this case, required the allowance to be liberal. He did not conceive, by voting this money, that it was to be sunk or lost, but if employed in the military service against them, the whole was gone for ever. If the sum proved larger than was necessary for the use intended, part of it would be saved.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH and Mr. KITCHELL concurred in opinion with the preceding speaker. They did not think the sum too large.

Mr. WILLIAMS, if in order, would move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next. The resolution was accordingly moved and seconded.

Mr. GILES wished, that after the blanks in the bill had been filled up with an hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the bill should lie over for some time, till the House have learned from the report of the Committee of Ways and Means what funds are unappropriated, or what new taxes may be wanted. The House had often been embarrassed by voting money without having provided to supply it.

Mr. MACON thought it would be better not to fill up the sum in the blank of the bill, but rather to let the whole blanks be open till the bill should be taken up again; for, if they are filled up now, and the sums appropriated shall hereafter be found too large, there will be no way of touching that part of the bill, but by referring it back to a Committee of the Whole House. This trouble would be saved by leaving it blank.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that Mr. MACON had anticipated the chief thing which he meant to say. He wished, however, to learn more of the subject before he gave his vote for the sum. It may be too much, or it may be too little. He had not yet information to determine him on that head. There were large anticipations on the revenue. He disapproved of hurrying this affair, till the House were better informed about it.

Mr. VENABLE moved that the first Monday of February should be named for taking up the bill.

Mr. S. SMITH observed, that if the bill did not go through immediately, the season for sending to Europe for goods would be lost. The bill would thus be thrown back for a whole year.

Mr. GALLATIN wished for a delay of three or four weeks. He would not appropriate any part of the war funds for this scheme. There is no excess in the receipts over the expenditures. On the other hand, from his view of the funds, two millions of dollars of additional permanent funds would be wanted, if any progress was to be made in discharging the Public Debt. He would not vote for the bill, unless there was to be a reduction in the expense of the Military Establishment.

Mr. MADISON said that the object of the bill was so extremely benevolent, that he must agree to the principle. He recommended a delay.

Mr. S. SMITH, who had spoken before Mr. GALLATIN, observed, that if there was a delay of the bill it would afterwards take a month to get through both Houses. The goods, if wrote for on the 1st of April, could not be here till October. They would then be too late to answer the purpose for the year. He would ask Mr. GALLATIN, who knew the back country better than he did, how it would be possible to transport goods through it in that season of the year. This was a way of destroying the bill. After making it impracticable to do anything, gentlemen would say, see your bill!

Mr. SWANWICK recommended the present moment as the most favorable to be expected for making investments from Europe. Ten per centum would be saved by making the investments at so favorable a time. There was also another reason against delay: the loss of the season. He did not approve of procrastination. We debate, and adjourn, at a very great expense to the public, and finally go through much less business than we might have done.

Mr. ILLHOUSE considered this an indispensable object. He would not, perhaps, oppose a delay till Tuesday next, but he would not agree to a delay till the first Monday of February.

Mr. VENABLE said, that hurrying the bill forward would not answer any end, till the House know the funds from which the sums thus voted are to be defrayed. The ten per centum upon investments could not be saved at present, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for though the act were passed, the money cannot be had for a considerable time to come. It is impossible, by any degree of haste, to bring over the goods from England before next Fall. Every gentleman in this House may know that it is impossible to have them here before next Fall.

Mr. GILES was exceedingly disposed to doubt whether the bill, if passed, would produce any of the good consequences expected from it, notwithstanding that he was in the habit of trusting much to the judgment of those from whom it came. There is, at this time, no money in the Treasury but what has been already appropriated. The delay till February is nominal, but not real, since, from the want of cash, we cannot take advantage of the present rate of exchange. It was said that this rise in favor of America was owing to the intended British expedition against the French islands in the West Indies. If the supposition were true, Mr. G. apprehended little danger that the rate of exchange in favor of the United States would lessen for several months to come. He would rather imagine that it had not yet arrived at its height. This kind of conjecture was, however, too vague to build any public measures upon. He would vote for the delay till he saw what funds could be ascertained for discharging the sums appropriated by the bill.

The question was then to be taken on the two resolutions before the House, the one for postponing till Tuesday, and the other till the first Monday of February.

By the rules of the House, the latter resolution, as including the greatest length of time, was taken first. It was carried—yeas 45, nays 40. So the bill stands over till the first Monday of February.

Mr. CLAIBORNE read a resolution for requesting the PRESIDENT to lay before Congress a statement of the number of trading houses which would be necessary, of the different species of goods, and of the sums of money which will be requisite to carry on intercourse with the Indian tribes.

Mr. GILES said that the House knew as much on this subject as the PRESIDENT. He hoped that the motion would be withdrawn. It was in fact telling the PRESIDENT to pass the bill. Last year a requisition of this nature was made to the PRESIDENT, who, in the opinion of Mr. G., acted with much propriety. He sent it at once to the Secretary of War, and thus took away all responsibility from himself.

Mr. PARKER thought some resolution of this nature to be proper. He did not know whether the present one was strictly proper or not. It had been hinted by some former speaker, that the select committee might be expected to give particular information. They had performed the duty assigned to them, and had now no more concern with the subject than any other members of the House.

Mr. VENABLE expected that the committee, though not strictly bound to do so, would give all the information in their power. This they might do, and it would be of use: They could state their reasons for recommending particular clauses in the bill.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, that his reason for proposing the resolution was in order to obtain better information than what he at present had. He wished to be guided by the PRESIDENT. He desired to have his mind more satisfied than it is now on this subject.

Mr. PARKER wished to strike out the word "President," and insert "the Secretary of the Treasury." He would then vote for it.

Mr. GOODHUE was against the resolution. He observed that the official duty of the Secretary did not lead him to such a knowledge any more than that of any member of the House.

The SPEAKER then reminded the House, that there was a communication from the Secretary of War upon this subject which had not yet been read to the House. This was No. 4, which was accordingly read.

The resolution offered by Mr. CLAIBORNE was negatived without a division.

RANDALL AND WHITNEY.

On motion of Mr. CHRISTIE, the House took up the petition of Robert Randall, and on motion of Mr. SEDGWICK, that of Charles Whitney.

Mr. W. SMITH moved that Randall should be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, on payment of the fees. He said that the petitioner had been guilty of a great offence; but he was willing to dismiss him. He had suffered some imprisonment, and been put to expenses with lawyers. The House could not however discharge him from the custody of the City Marshal. They might apply to the PRESIDENT, that there should be granted a nolle prosequi.

Mr. SWANWICK objected to the style of the petition as not sufficiently submissive. The passage he disapproved was in these words: "any offence or contempt which, in the opinion of the honorable House, he may have committed." The prisoner ought to have acknowledged his guilt. Mr. S. was sorry to be obliged, from a sense of duty, to oppose the prayer of the petition. This paper looked like an insult upon the House. The petition was, at the desire of a member, read a second time.

Mr. MURRAY did not think that the petition could have been more delicately worded. The prisoner was still liable to prosecution from the Attorney General. A confession in this House might operate against him. Mr. M. had felt much pain in being obliged to lodge a complaint against Randall. He would vote with pleasure to discharge him.

Mr. SWANWICK, in answer, said, that the remarks of the member from Maryland had brought new ideas into his mind. He withdrew his objection; but saw no reason for the House to go further, or to interfere against a prosecution by the Attorney General.

Mr. REED, from Massachusetts, spoke in favor of the discharge.

Another member hoped that the House would not interfere to stop the proceedings by the Attorney General. He would suffer too little if discharged now. He was proceeding at length against the House interfering for a nolle prosequi, when

The SPEAKER rose: He observed that arguments as to the prosecution before the Attorney General were irregular. The only resolution before the House was as to dismissing Randall from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. He made these observations with pain, but they were requisite. The House agreed to the request of Randall.

The petition of Charles Whitney was then read. Mr. SEDGWICK moved that the prayer of the petition should be granted; and that Whitney should be allowed to exhibit the evidence of Colonel Silas Pepune, and enter it on the Journals of the House.

It was objected as not in order to move to bring up a paper, not yet, as it appeared, in existence.

Mr. MACON moved to insert the word "not;" that Whitney should not be allowed, &c.

Mr. W. SMITH thought Whitney was entitled to enter this evidence. He had never been heard in his defence. He had, no doubt, behaved very ill in the business. Mr. S. made no question of his being an associate with Randall, but still his vindication had not been admitted. He had been discharged without an acquittal. Randall was allowed the use of counsel. They had been permitted to examine members at the bar. Randall had been asked if he could produce any witnesses in his defence; and if he had offered twenty witnesses they would have been examined. To enter this evidence of Colonel Pepune, Mr. S. considered as a point of right and justice.

Mr. MURRAY was satisfied that the deposition of the member from Vermont [Mr. BUCK] was strictly true. He could entertain no scruple about the truth of the charge; but let that and the evidence go to the world together.

Another member considered the petition of Whitney as an insult. He hoped that the House would not pay as much respect to it as to take a question upon it. He had said at the bar of this

House that Mr. Pepune was his partner, and now we are desired to let his partner come and give evidence in his favor. He would as soon permit Randall himself to come to the bar in defence of Whitney. He believed Whitney to be just as guilty as the other, and thought that his confinement should have lasted, in point of justice, as long; though he was willing to get rid of both as early as possible.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that he had only one idea to state. He considered Colonel Pepune as a competent evidence. The House had seen the original bond, which contained nothing unjustifiable in it. Whitney did not, in his examination at the bar, say, that Mr. Pepune had been concerned in any thing criminal, nor was there any reason to think so. If an agreement is made on honest principles, and afterwards one of the partners starts off from the original idea into any thing bad, no blame can rest on his original associates. An honest partner may be properly called in to exculpate him, if it can be done. Mr. S. cared very little whether the question was carried or not; and saw no reason for that holy indignation which had been expressed about it.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought that to enter this deposition on the Journals would be the height of absurdity.

Mr. FREEMAN began to speak, when Mr. SEDGWICK rose and declared that he withdrew his motion. He never would have proposed it, had he expected so strong an opposition.

It was then moved to adjourn. The SPEAKER addressed the House. He said that as decorum was highly necessary in the House, he was sorry at being obliged to observe that the business of the House had this day been very considerably interrupted by strangers on the right hand side of the SPEAKER's Chair. He was therefore obliged to request of members, that no strangers whom they might introduce should go upon the right hand side of the Chair, but to turn to the left hand side, (that is, towards the gallery,) till some new order of the House was made on the subject. Members of the Senate will always have chairs placed for them on the right hand side of the SPEAKER's Chair, as long as they continued to give a permission of the same kind in their Chamber to the members of this House.

After these remarks, the SPEAKER, at half-past two o'clock, adjourned the House.

THURSDAY, January 14.

This day the House met at the usual time. After reading the Journals of yesterday by the Clerk, the SPEAKER informed the House, that it would be necessary for them to elect a gentleman to the Chair for this day in his place, as, from want of health, he was incapable of giving longer attendance. The House immediately adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 15.

COMMERCIAL RESTRICTIONS.

Mr. S. SMITH called up the resolution, which he laid on the Clerk's table some days ago, for restricting foreign vessels, that they shall only bring into the harbors of the United States, the growth, product, and manufactures of the respective countries to which they belong. He moved that this resolution should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HILLHOUSE recommended referring this resolution to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, as the subject was rather new.

It was objected by a member, that this reference could only tend to procrastinate the decision. He had no doubt that this Committee would report the resolution as it stood. There are no documents in the hands of the committee which are not before the House.

Mr. SWANWICK.—The principle is not a new one; but a very old one. It has been adopted, in a greater or less degree, by the most distinguished maritime nations. France has, at present, permitted a partial suspension of it, on account of the exigencies of the war. In Britain, the principle is above an hundred years old. It was the foundation of all her greatness by sea. He did not wish to object to this reference, if necessary, for digesting the principle. Of its propriety, he had no doubt.

Mr. HILLHOUSE replied that many British writers regarded the act of navigation as having been injurious to the commerce of England. The propriety of adopting that resolution rested not on the principle abstractedly; but whether the circumstances of the United States rendered such a step eligible. He thought that a few members would be better for digesting the resolution, in the first instance.

Mr. MADISON was of opinion, that all important propositions, and especially all those of an abstract nature, should be referred, in the first place, to a Committee of the Whole House. There could only be two reasons for referring, upon any occasion, to a select committee; either when there was an absolute want of time for the House to digest the subject themselves; or when any particular papers or documents were to be examined. This case was clearly not one of those. He recommended a Committee of the Whole in the first place. The general rule of propriety required it.

Mr. GOODHUE was in favor of a reference to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. He had not yet fixed in his own mind whether the resolution was right or otherwise.

Mr. MURRAY was for a select committee. The question would be more accurately investigated, and information more readily collected there than in a Committee of the Whole House. It was not so much to be discussed as a general abstract principle; but, as whether, from a consideration of the present circumstances, it was an advisable measure. This could only be learned from a particular detail of facts.

Mr. GILBERT.—The present question is not perhaps of the greatest importance, for it relates only to the mode of bringing the proposition with the most advantage before the view and consideration of the House. This House has lately appointed standing committees for considering certain particular subjects. The question now is, whether the proposition before the House does or does not relate to the general ground or branch of the subject of any one of those select committees. If it falls within the general view or department of any of these committees, it clearly ought to go to such committee, in pursuance of the system adopted here for doing business. Mr. G. believed that the resolution obviously related to the business of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. The resolution comprises a subject of moment; it ought to be well considered from a minute investigation of the facts. If it were a proposition respecting revenue, it would, without hesitation, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and if we would uniformly pursue the course of transacting the business lately settled by the House, there would be no hesitation in referring the proposition, in the first instance, to the Committee of Commerce. He wished to see the proposition presented to the House, accompanied with all the facts necessary to be considered in deciding on its merits. This, he thought, could only be expected by the special inquiry and investigation of that standing committee, to which he hoped that the resolution would, in the first instance, be referred.

Mr. S. SMITH observed, that he saw no use in a reference to a select committee, but to procrastinate the business. He alluded to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures; a Committee of Navigation has been mentioned—there is no such committee—and he insisted that there was no propriety in a reference to the above standing committee. Mr. S. alluded to the late Treaty said to have been concluded with Great Britain, and remarked that the proposition he had brought forward, contained the only provision which was left us by that Treaty to save our commerce from prostration. Mr. S. said the public business was greatly delayed by postponements; six weeks have already elapsed, and scarcely anything was done.

Mr. BOURNE was in favor of a select committee; and he urged the competency of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to take the subject into consideration; subjects of commerce are connected with those of navigation, and so vice versa. Mr. B. did not see the propriety of introducing the Treaty on the carpet. The question is simply, whether the resolution shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole or to a select committee. Mr. B. urged a variety of reasons in favor of a select committee in the first instance.

Mr. GILES could not frame an idea of anything that was to be learned from such a select committee, unless they were to report a commercial history of the size of an ordinary volume. The report of a late Secretary of State [Mr. JEFFERSON] had condensed the whole information, which, at its date, could be obtained; and this paper is now before the House. All that possibly remained to be done, was to add the history of commerce from the time of that report to the present. No specific report could arise from them, but only the other over again. The resolutions above alluded to had been referred to a Committee of the Whole, because the subject was general. The same reason would apply now, as this was an important principle. More information will be had on the floor of this House than can be had from any select committee. He was against any delay that could be avoided.

Mr. GOODHUE admitted the right of the United States to lay such restrictions. The expediency alone was doubtful; and this was his only reason for wishing that the subject should be referred to a select committee; that facts and circumstances might direct the House. He had not yet formed his opinion on this resolution.

Mr. SEDGWICK had not yet made up his opinion. He asked where gentlemen learned that there was a disposition in any part of the House to protract the discussion. He thought the reference to Mr. MADISON's resolutions rather unfortunate, for, after a very long discussion, the House came only to a preliminary resolution, which was doubtful in its meaning. Mercantile people might easily complete their ideas; but farmers might not be so prompt on a subject new to them. Mr. S. recommended a select committee, because in one of the Whole House, the debate would be desultory. The former would enter more minutely into the subject, and feel a degree of anxiety and responsibility. They would be more deliberate. Gentlemen were wrong in supposing this a subject of party. No gentleman here could have any interest separate from that of the United States.

Mr. BALDWIN was in favor of a reference to a Committee of the Whole, in the first place; this was agreeable to the practice of the House, from which the happiest effects had resulted. After the Committee of the Whole had discussed the proposition, the subject may then be referred to a select committee.

Mr. PAGE was in favor of a reference to a Committee of the Whole. He thought every subject should come before the members of this House, unaccompanied with the opinions of the select committee or of any individual whatever; this was consonant to the general practice of the House; this would divide the responsibility of public measures. He had no opinion of having public measures smuggled into the House, no one could tell how. Let every proposition be submitted fairly to the Committee of the Whole; in this way a general result will be obtained, and the sentiments of the majority will be fairly drawn forth.

Mr. HILLHOUSE denied any intentional design of delay. How that had been lugged into the debate he did not know. He had no disposition for hustling business through the House. In the course of this conversation, he had somewhat changed his opinion; and was ready to go into a Committee of the Whole immediately. He was willing to take it up here. It might next be sent to a select committee, and come back to the House. All this would throw so much more light upon the question.

Mr. TRACY was not for making laws by the rod. If we get through the session without doing any mischief, it is, I think (said Mr. T.) a great point gained. He did not wish to hurry matters. He was for a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SWANWICK thought it was a proud day for the United States, when their Representatives were to meet for the discussion of so great a subject. He had not so low a hope as the member from Connecticut, that we might merely do no mischief. He hoped that we should do good, perhaps, more than any of our predecessors. He was for a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SEDGWICK was for a select committee first, for, after discussing in a Committee of the Whole, it would be putting the cart before the horse completely, to send it to a select committee for information. They will have nothing to do, but to draw a bill.

By a large majority, it was agreed to take up the resolution, in a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1796.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, containing an estimate of the appropriations for the public service for the year 1796.

The Committee proceeded through the report without alteration or debate; the Chairman made his report accordingly.

The House took the same into consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that the clause containing the items for the Mint Establishment should be postponed for further consideration; the whole subject of the Mint is now referred to a Committee of the Whole, and the sense of the Committee remains to be known. In the present situation of the business, he was not prepared to give a vote on the subject. The motion for a postponement was not seconded. The SPEAKER then put the question on the several parts of the report, which were agreed to; and the Committee of Ways and Means were directed to bring in a bill or bills accordingly.

CASE OF WILLIAM LITTLE.

Mr. GOODHUE, Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, pursuant to instructions from that committee, moved that they should be discharged from further consideration of the petition of William Little, merchant in Boston. Mr. Little had shipped for Europe seventy-one kegs of New England rum. Forty were, with difficulty, sold at Cadiz. The remainder were brought back, and, by some mistake, a custom-house officer seized them. The petitioner prayed for restitution or compensation. The motion of Mr. G. was agreed to. He then moved that the petition should be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury; which was also agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The report of the Committee on Elections, made on the 13th of January, 1796, on the memorial of John Richards, came up next in order. The former report of this committee, was dated the 18th of December last. The present report has finally determined the question in favor of Mr. Richards.

The following is an abstract of the Report:

"On the second Tuesday of October, 1794, an election was held in the counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery, in the State of Pennsylvania, for electing a member to the House of Representatives of Congress. On the same day, the militia of that district who had marched on the Western expedition, held an election for the same purpose.

"The law of the State, made for that special end, directs, that the county Judges of the elections, instead of meeting on the third Tuesday of October, as formerly, should meet on the 10th of November. The army election returns were to be sent forward by that day to the Prothonotaries of the respective counties, and the Prothonotaries were to deliver them over to the county Judges, to enable them to make their returns. The district Judges were to meet on the 15th November, five days after the county Judges, to examine the county returns to make an estimate of all the votes, and to return, as Representative for the district, the candidate who had the highest number of votes.

"The county Judges, agreeably to law, met on the 10th of November, 1794. At this time, no army returns had been received, excepting from the militia of Northampton.

"After the 10th, and before the 15th of November, the army returns of the county of Montgomery were received by the Prothonotary of the county. He delivered them to some of the county Judges. Two of these made up a return, and certified it, on the 14th of November, to be a true return of the votes that had come to their hands.

"On the 15th of November, the district Judges met, agreeably to law. There was then laid before them the last-mentioned return, made by the county Judges of Montgomery, with the respective returns of the county elections, and the original return of the election held by the militia of Northampton, on which the return above recited, dated the 14th of November, 1794, from the county Judges, was founded. The district Judges reported, that by the general return of the county elections, and that of the Northampton militia, James Morris had the highest number of votes, to wit: 1,648.

"By the Montgomery militia return, as put into the hands of the district Judges, John Richards had 156 votes, and James Morris 58. This number, together with all the other votes, on the other returns, in favor of John Richards, amounted to 1,791, and those for James Morris to 1,706. At this time, no returns had come to hand from the Bucks county militia.

"On the 18th of November, after the above report had been made to the Governor of Pennsylvania, certain papers were lodged with the Secretary of State. They purported to be a return of the votes from the Bucks county militia. They were unaccompanied by any list of the names of the voters, at the election, nor had any certificates of their having been examined by the county Judges. On this return, it is stated that James Morris had ninety-one votes.

"On these grounds the petitioner states, that he is entitled to a seat in the House.

"1st. Because, upon an estimate in the returns produced before the district Judges, on the 15th of November, including the Montgomery militia, he has 1,791 votes, and James Morris 1,706.

"2d. Let the army returns, both for Montgomery and Bucks be rejected. Take then the army returns for Northampton. Sixteen votes were given by persons unqualified, and two by proxy. Deduct these eighteen, and he has 1,635, to 1,630 for James Morris.

"3d. If you admit the whole army votes for each of the three counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery, and strike out the eighteen bad votes, on the Northampton return, Mr. Richards would still have 1,791 votes, against 1,779 for the late Mr. Morris."

The committee were of opinion, first, that the Montgomery return ought to have been received by the District Judges, as it came to the County Judges before the 15th of November, the time prescribed by law for the District Judges to meet.

Second. That the Bucks county return ought to have been rejected, as never having been examined by the County Judges, and being unaccompanied by a list of the voters.

Third. That sixteen votes in the Northampton militia were given by persons not on the tax lists of the county, and otherwise not in the description of freeholders. Two other votes were by proxy.

The committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Richards is duly elected as one of the Representatives for the district composed of the counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery, in the State of Pennsylvania, and that the said John Richards be permitted to take his seat.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved that the further consideration of this business should be postponed till to-morrow. His reason for this was the absence of Mr. SITGREAVES, the only member, as it appears, in the House who was possessed of full information as to the facts and circumstances relative to the business before the House.

Mr. VENABLE, Mr. GALLATIN, Mr. SWIFT, and Mr. FINDLEY severally objected to any delay. Mr. BOURNE argued in favor of it.

Mr. PARKER supposed that nothing had been said on the side of Mr. MORRIS, because the gentleman himself was dead, and his family did not concern themselves about the matter. There might have been evidence.

Mr. SWANWICK said that the Journals were covered with motions of adjournment. He saw no good purpose that could possibly be answered by it. One member of the State Legislature is absent, and because his leave of absence expires this day, we are to have the additional loss of another member. He saw no occasion for such a waste of time.

Mr. GILES opposed further delay. He was generally against motions of adjournment; nor could he discover any use for it in the present instance.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought that if Mr. SITGREAVES possessed any material information, he might have laid it before the House in an early part of the business.

Mr. HARTLEY recommended a delay of one day, which could do no harm, and would be more satisfactory to the mind of the public.

Mr. MURRAY argued for a delay. The first report had been against RICHARDS; and if any gentleman had since wanted to oppose him, his vigilance might be slackened by hearing that the former report was against Mr. RICHARDS. Mr.

MURRAY did not know that he would object to the second report, but he wished it not to be too much hurried.

Mr. GALLATIN. The whole ground of opposition to the report is on this idea: that some facts may come out which are not yet proved. Now, every fact and circumstance concerning the transaction, was published six months ago by the Governor.

Mr. HARTLEY could conceive no inconvenience resulting from a postponement of one day. The badness of the weather had probably prevented Mr. SITGREAVES from coming forward. He thought it highly probable that Mr. RICHARDS was entitled to the seat.

Mr. SWANWICK said that the case was of less importance than the principle on which it went. Why should a gentleman be kept out of his seat even one day for a surmise? He thought it highly unjust to postpone the matter, even for one day. It is an old saying, that sufficient for the day is the evil thereof; but we are going further, by anticipating the evil of future days. It would be a very extraordinary mode of reasoning to keep one member out of his seat because another member was absent.

Mr. PARKER said that, if we take up this report to-day, we shall perhaps be sorry for it to-morrow. Of Mr. RICHARDS or his constituents he knew nothing, but he thought it likely that, before the gentleman was warm in his seat, there would be a petition against him. Mr. PARKER had no other motive for wishing a delay for one day.

Mr. VENABLE said there was a mistake in asserting that the first report had been against Mr. RICHARDS. This was not the case. Mr. SITGREAVES had not mentioned to the House any information that could be expected to reverse the report; nor had any other person come forward with any such. If any gentleman will say that new evidence has come out, let the report be re-committed. If there is none, let us proceed to decide upon it. This report has been six weeks in the hands of the committee.

On motion of Mr. MACON, it was ordered that Mr. RICHARDS should in the mean time have a chair placed for him within the bar of the House. This was accordingly done.

The report was amended to read thus:

"Resolved, That John Richards is entitled to take his seat in this House as one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania."

The resolution was then agreed to unanimously. Mr. RICHARDS was immediately qualified, and took his seat.

TONNAGE AND IMPORTS.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury do report a comparative view of the tonnage employed in the trade between the United States and foreign countries, for the years 1790, 1791, 1792, 1793, and 1794; and that he report the actual tonnage of vessels of the United States employed in the years 1790 and 1794, between the United States and foreign countries, beginning for each year, agreeably to the practice of the Treasury.

And, on motion, it was further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before this House a statement of the goods, wares, and merchandise imported annually into the United States, with their value, since the thirtieth of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, discriminating the amount of the articles imported in ships or vessels of the United States from the articles imported in foreign ships or vessels.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Burwell Bassett, of the State of Virginia, complaining of an undue election and return of John Clopton, to serve as a member of this House for the said State, made a report, which was read; whereupon,

Ordered, That Wednesday next be assigned to take the said report into consideration.

Mr. W. SMITH reported a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, making appropriations for the year 1796; which was read a first time.

After the reception and reference of several petitions, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1796.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government in the year 1796.

Mr. WILLIAMS, agreeably to notice given on a former day, moved to strike out all that gross sum appropriated for the officers of the Mint.

Mr. W. SMITH said that a great proportion of the sum was for salaries established by law. They must be paid, till the law is repealed. It the gentleman means to suspend the whole appropriation bill till an inquiry is gone through with respect to the Mint, the bill may be delayed for two months, and the consequence be the greatest embarrassment in Government.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH had never been much in favor of the Mint, nor had experience increased his good opinion of it. But passing this appropriation bill would not prevent a full investigation of this subject hereafter. He was for deferring any proceeding about the Mint till the select committee made their report. He opposed the motion.

Mr. SEDGWICK thought that the course which the gentleman is pursuing had never been adopted before. It is incorrect to discuss the merits of the Mint in passing this bill. We might as well take up the salary of the Chief Justice, or any other article in the bill, as the Mint. We never should have done, at this rate. We are now only to vote for the bill, as agreeably to the laws already made. Mr. SEDGWICK said that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS] would bring forward any proposition for the regulation, or even the abolition of the establishment of the Mint, if it could be proved productive of public benefit, he, with every other gentleman, would give him their aid to effect the object; but that now, he conceived, it could not regularly be brought forward. He thought an appropriation bill should be conformed exactly to the state of the public engagements, and that where establishments had been formed and salaries provided, the amount of them should be the principle of calculating the amount of appropriations; and that the House ought not, by withholding appropriations, to break in upon and destroy establishments formed by the whole Legislature. That these observations had hitherto been sanctioned by the practice on this subject. He observed, that if the House was to investigate, in the discussion of an appropriation bill, the amount of salaries, and the legal establishments of Government, the public service would be dangerously destroyed. He remarked, that it was to be observed, that no appropriation was made, for any purpose, since the commencement of the year.

Mr. GALLATIN felt alarmed at the principle advanced by Mr. SEDGWICK, for, if admitted, it might be applied in future on some other and important occasion. The motion made by the member from New York ought not, perhaps, to be adopted; but there was certainly a discretionary power in the House to appropriate or not to appropriate for any object whatever, whether that object was authorized by law or not. It was a power which, however inexpedient on the present occasion, was vested in this House for the purpose of checking the other branches of Government whenever necessary. That such a right was reserved by this body, appeared from their making only yearly appropriations both for the support of the Civil List and of the Military Establishment. Had they meant to give up the right, they would have such appropriations permanent. There was one instance in which this House had thought it proper to abandon the right. In order to strengthen Public Credit, they had consented that the payment of interest on the debt should not depend on their sole will, and they had rendered the appropriation for that object not a yearly, but a permanent one. Whenever that was not the case, and the right had been reserved, it was contradictory to suppose that the House were bound to do a certain act, at the same time that they were exercising the discretionary power of voting upon it.

Mr. SEDGWICK said that he certainly had no intention to have given occasion to the observations which had been made; but, as the general principle which he had laid down had been denied, and as it had some relation, either intimate or remote, to the subject before the committee, he would take the liberty to repeat the principle, and say a few words in support of it.

The principle, then, which he had assumed, was, that when legal establishments were made, it was the duty of the Legislature to make appropriations conformably to the public engagements; and that neither branch had a right to withhold its assent. He observed that the whole Legislature, and not a part, were competent to form contracts, and to establish and alter compensations and salaries. The Legislature, and not either branch of it, had the power of expressing the public will, and pledging the public faith; that when a salary is ascertained, the public faith is pledged that it shall be paid, according to the stipulation; and that, therefore, the Public Credit is involved in making the necessary appropriations, without which it could not be paid. He asked, if, in such a case, it was competent to the House rightfully to withhold the means necessary for the performance of the public engagement?

He said he had always supposed that the power of the House, in the case of appropriations, did not give a power to yield or withhold assent on such a subject. He believed, in every such instance, the exercise of discretion was restrained. To illustrate his ideas, he could mention a similar instance. The Constitution had declared that the PRESIDENT should receive a stated compensation for his services, to be ascertained by law, which could neither be diminished nor enlarged during the term for which he should have been elected. Here was a duty imposed on the Legislature, with the performance of which they could not, they had no power to dispense. Yet, after the compensation was stated, no payment could be made in consequence of appropriating. He asked, if, in this case, when the public will was expressed, the engagement and the national faith pledged, the Legislature could of right withhold the necessary appropriation? The same observations might, he said, be applied to every instance where public contracts were formed. The public faith was pledged, the necessary appropriation must be made to prevent a violation of it; and if withheld, such violation might justly be charged on the Legislature.

Mr. WILLIAMS was willing to confine the resolution to one clause—that for purchasing copper for the use of the Mint.

Mr. DAYTON (the SPEAKER) took up the resolution of amendment on the ground of expediency. He thought it was too extensive. It was like bringing a side wind against an institution established by law. I am free, said Mr. D., to declare that the Mint has not answered the expectations of the Legislature that founded it. An impression is made on the public mind that it has been conducted with negligence. He would have agreed to the resolution, if it was only to strike out the new purchase of copper. He wished to wait for further information, till the report of the select committee was given in.

Mr. WILLIAMS agreed to restrict his motion as pointed out by the SPEAKER. He stated the enormous expense of the Mint—out of all proportion to any possible utility. He wished to have the subject fairly before the House. His resolution, as amended, was to strike out the following words: "For the purchase of copper for the use of the Mint, ten thousand dollars."

Mr. NICHOLAS was for the resolution. It had been urged that the House were to pass the appropriation bill as a matter of course. He thought otherwise. The House, in enacting a law, were entitled to consider all its consequences.

Mr. GILES adverted to a fact stated by Mr. WILLIAMS, viz.: that the cents are issued from the Mint at a cheaper rate than the price of the copper itself; so that, if a person chooses to melt down a pound weight of cents into a lump of copper, and takes this lump back again to the Mint, he will receive more money for it than what it was worth in cents. Thus the whole expense of workmanship is cast away. Mr. GILES described the ridiculous and wasteful effects to be looked for from such a way of coining money.

The amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS was agreed to by a very large majority.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out some of the subsequent clauses, for payments to mechanics, for stationery, &c.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH wanted to know if it was meant to stop the whole operations of the Mint.

Mr. PAGE objected to dispersing the workmen, who could not easily be collected again; at least it would require an immense expense to re-assemble them. It has been stated, in the course of this discussion, that every cent coined in the Mint has cost the public TEN; but if the workmen are to be dispersed, and if at any future time assembled again, the cents may come to cost an hundred cents a piece. Mr. P. recited various reasons for hoping that the business of the Mint will in future be conducted with more expedition, economy, and success. He stated the immense benefit arising to the country from the plenty of copper money, and especially to the poorer classes of people. A Mint was of more consequence than gentlemen seemed to think it was. He said that private Mints were reported to be setting up. He wished to refer the amendment of his colleague from Virginia to the third reading of the bill. By that time, the House would be better informed.

Mr. NICHOLAS did not wish to abolish but merely to suspend the operations of the Mint till nearer the end of the session. This amendment was negatived.

The deficiencies of the Mint, for the last year, form an article of eighteen thousand three hundred dollars. Mr. WILLIAMS said that it was an amazing sum. He wished to know the meaning of it.

Mr. W. SMITH, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, replied that this article had not passed without due examination. The committee, consisting of fifteen members, were too numerous to enter into a detail of every article. They appointed a sub-committee to inquire about them, and in particular about the Mint. The original allowance of copper to be purchased was twenty thousand dollars. They had reduced it to ten thousand.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to strike out these eighteen thousand three hundred dollars.

Mr. DAYTON complained that the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means seemed reluctant to give information.

Mr. W. SMITH stated that the gentleman had entirely mistaken him. His censure had been rather premature. He felt no reluctance to give every light possible. He then explained the steps taken by the Committee to convince themselves that there was nothing wrong in the Mint statement.

Mr. DAYTON apologized for his former observations on the Chairman of the Committee.

Mr. BOURNE objected to striking out these eighteen thousand three hundred dollars. The House cannot do it. The accounts are either settling, or already settled at the Treasury. Debts are actually contracted that must be paid. No gentleman points out an overcharge on any of the articles. It is not competent for the House to go through each one separately. It never was the design of the law.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH considered this as one of the plainest cases imaginable. Debts have been contracted and must be paid. If the gentleman, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who seems to have so many suspicions, will be at the trouble of going to the Treasury office, he may look at the accounts, and if they are wrong, let him impeach the officers of the Treasury.

The amendment was negatived.

The Committee rose, the Chairman reported, and the House took up the bill as reported.

The amendment for striking out the ten thousand dollars to purchase copper, was objected to by Mr. BOURNE, who hoped that the House would disagree to it.

Mr. MADISON stated the fact already mentioned by Mr. WILLIAMS, that it would be profitable to melt down the cents, and carry the bullion back to the Mint for sale! He had it from the Chairman, and one of the members of the Mint Committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON was for keeping in the amendment. Many people had strong doubts as to the utility of the Mint. He wished the whole appropriation for it to be struck out. The Mint he regarded as altogether an expensive and extravagant project, in the way wherein it had hitherto been conducted.

The House adhered to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LIVINGSTON next moved that the whole appropriation for the Mint should be struck out.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH regarded this motion as too precipitate. He would recommend waiting for the report of the Select Committee on the Mint. He might then think that the Mint was an extravagant, wasteful, and useless institution; or he might think that it could be modified in a way to do much good. He was against the motion as being too early. The gentleman has perhaps ripened his opinion, while others may not have matured theirs.

Mr. LIVINGSTON replied that he wanted time to deliberate, before voting any thing about the matter. He had asked and the question had not yet been answered, whether any bad effect would arise from delaying to pass this appropriation at the present moment. His object in the motion was not precipitation, but deliberation.

Mr. HARTLEY thought it would not be fair, when we feel ourselves very comfortable here, to be striking off the salaries of other people, at this hard season of the year. He was against the motion, and hoped that the amendment of the Committee, as to the purchase of copper, would also be expunged.

A member observed that there need be no apprehension of people starving. The parties were provided for by law, up to the thirty-first of December; and it had been the custom to advance salaries beforehand. The motion of the member from New York had nothing of defrauding in it, otherwise he himself would not have risen to second it. He hoped the resolution would prevail. He had occasion to go to this Mint, on business for a country bank which he named, and had seen the way in which the business was conducted. The institution is a bad one, and badly conducted. It has been most scandalously carried on, and with very little advantage to the public. If the institution is not to be better carried on than it has been, it ought to be thrown aside. The principal artist in the Mint is dead, and it will not be easy, at present, to get another in his place.

Mr. MURRAY said, that had the gentleman from New York moved for delay, for the purpose of introducing a motion to repeal the law which rendered this appropriation necessary, he would not have troubled the House with a single remark; but his motion to strike out an appropriation for the purpose of bringing the policy of the law itself into discussion, contained a principle in his mind so repugnant to the great Legislative duties of the House that he would oppose it. The object of the appropriation is not a temporary one, but a part of the machinery of our Government, under the express authority of the Constitution by law. The doctrine now contended for by the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania [Mr. LIVINGSTON and Mr. GALLATIN] was that this House have a discretionary power of appropriating or not. To this doctrine, taken in the extent which he conceived they contended for, he could not give his support. On the contrary, he thought that in all cases where an appropriation flowed from a law to make good a contract, or to erect a permanent organ in the Government, and from any law whose object was permanent, the true doctrine was, that it was the duty of the House to vote an appropriation. A law is the will of a nation. The same powers only that formed it can repeal it. If it be a Constitutional act, no power can lawfully obstruct its operation or its existence. But attending to the doctrine maintained to-day it would follow, that though this House had not the power of repealing a law made by all the branches of Government, it may obstruct its operations and render it a dead letter; though it cannot repeal, it may do what shall amount to a repeal, which is the assumption of a power almost equal to that of exclusive legislation. He thought he saw in this an evil of great extent, and an anarchy of theoretic principles. It appeared to him that though we originate money bills, we had no right to refuse an appropriation to existing laws that either secured a debt or any contract, or that related to objects permanent by the law that created or acknowledged them as long as the law itself remained unrepealed. We had but a share of Legislative power. Where a law relative to such objects as he had alluded to existed, from which an appropriation followed, till the law ceased by repeal or by other Constitutional means, it was obligatory upon us as well as upon our constituents, and the only powers we could exercise of a discretionary sort resolved themselves either into this mode of making good the appropriation, or of voting for its repeal. The other branches would then judge of the propriety of our proceeding; but till they who assisted in its enacting, judged with us the necessity of doing it away, a duty resulted that we should give it the energy intended by its enactment.

Appropriations.

Mr. DAYTON conceived the question brought under discussion of too delicate a nature to be decided at the present time. He however expressed it as his opinion that the power of making appropriations was intended and ought to be a check on establishments.

Mr. NICHOLAS conceived the House bound to weigh the merits of every law when an appropriation was to be passed to carry it into effect, and no appropriations should obtain the sanction of the House, unless they were convinced of the propriety of the law.

Mr. GILES said he did not expect to hear a doctrine so novel broached in the House as that advanced by the member from Massachusetts [Mr. SEDGWICK.] He had declared that he conceived the House could exercise no discretionary power when about to pass an appropriation bill.

Mr. SEDGWICK rose to explain. The principle he advocated was, that when a law was made pledging the public faith, the House had no discretion to withhold, or not, an appropriation; at least as long as common honesty was more than a name.

Mr. GILES said that if this doctrine was admitted in its full latitude, the House would become a mere office for the registering of edicts. He contended that the House had a right, by withholding appropriations, to put an end to an institution without the concurrence of the Senate. He would not say that the present was a case that called for the exercise of that right, but they had in all cases of this nature a right to exercise their discretion.

Mr. MURRAY considered the laws of the land as depending upon two other branches of the Government besides this House, and conceived it highly improper in the House to attempt to obstruct them by withholding necessary appropriations. What would be the effect of a contrary doctrine? It must contain the seeds of governmental anarchy. While a law remained in force it was the duty of the House to do what was needful to carry it into operation. He made some allusion to the British House of Commons, who, by privilege, contend for the right of withholding supplies to be a check on the patronage of the Crown. But such a principle, he contended, could not apply here; our Government could not proceed if it were admitted. As long as a law exists, it is the duty of the House to make the needful appropriations. The whole wisdom of the Government is not in this House. The same power is required to repeal laws as to make them. It is true the Constitution has given to the House the more immediate command of the purse-strings; but they were under an obligation to open them when necessity required. There is a Constitutional way of repealing laws; but the House has no right to obstruct their operation while in force. A member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALLATIN,] he observed, appeared on a former occasion to coincide with his opinions on this subject; for he argued that the House was bound to pass such an appropriation, as a law existed giving the salary to the officer which it was meant to provide for.

Mr. GALLATIN said, in answer, that his observation had simply been, that the Committee of Ways and Means, and not the House, conceived itself bound to report an appropriation for an item established by law; but he never doubted the power of the House to pass, or not, an appropriation. In such cases the line of duty must remain to be drawn by opinion. With what degree of consistency can the House be called on for a vote if, as some members contend, they cannot have an opinion? Why are they called upon to say, yea or nay, if they are obliged to say yea?

Mr. MURRAY conceded that a member might say yea or nay, but his duty must in cases of this nature clearly point to one of the two; for he could not mistake the black and white marks in the court of conscience. He has the physical power to say yea or nea; but if he does his duty he must say yea. The contrary principle would go to this, that the House had a right to refuse an appropriation to pay a just debt.

Mr. GALLATIN observed, in reply, that each member will be the sole judge whether it was or was not his duty to say yea, or the contrary. The Constitution, he said, declared that no money should be drawn from the Treasury but by appropriations made by law: this did not look as if the voting of appropriations was intended to be merely a matter of form. In the second place, the Constitution declares, that no appropriation for the support of an armed force shall be made for more than two years. Thus, though a Military Establishment may be formed by enlistments for three or more years, yet the Constitution provides that the question shall be submitted to the House every two years; and this surely is not as a matter of form; but in order, at such short periods, by voting on an appropriation bill, to determine whether such an establishment should exist longer or not. He conceived the power which he advocated as residing in the House of great consequence, and to be used in important occasions only.

Mr. NICHOLAS, who had risen at the same time with Mr. GALLATIN, and had given way to him, observed, that when he first rose, he was going to read the clause of the Constitution which the Appropriations.

member last up had referred to. As to the black and white marks the member from Maryland spoke of, they were differently placed in different persons; in matters of opinion men will differ; but the Constitution is a guide not to be departed from. The power of appropriation was vested by that instrument chiefly in the House, and no power on earth would prevent his exercising his discretion when that power was to be put in activity.

Mr. GILES observed, that the member from Maryland had got into the doctrine of checks, and seemed to think that if the House exercised its Constitutional check it would produce governmental anarchy.

Mr. MURRAY explained. He had alluded to the mode of getting rid of an establishment by refusing appropriations to carry it into effect. The Constitutional mode of procuring the repeal of the law should always be had recourse to; but he insisted that the House could not, as they were bound by their duty, obstruct a law in force by refusing an appropriation.

Mr. GILES conceived that the checks provided by the Constitution might be used by each of the powers of Government to their full extent, limited in every particular case only by their own discretion. If the harmony of the branches was to be made an argument to prevent the exercise of checks, what, he asked, became of the checks provided by the Constitution? Each branch of the Government (if he understood what was meant by Constitutional checks) was to exercise its own opinions and use its discretions within Constitutional limits, without a reference to the opinions of other branches. He next adverted to the powers of appropriation, which he contended were in a greater degree vested in the immediate Representatives of the people, to be a wholesome check. In case of an Army Establishment, for example, suppose the PRESIDENT or Senate were to refuse their assent to the repeal of a law establishing it? Will it be said that the clause of the Constitution empowering the House to make a biennial appropriation for the object, does not vest in them a discretionary power in such instances of overturning the establishment by its own will? for it cannot be kept up without an appropriation. Is the House to be told that, for the sake of harmony, they must give up their own powers and opinions? He maintained that, in cases of appropriations, they had a discretionary power, to be exercised, as in all cases, discretionarily. Was one branch to be judges of discretion for another? No; each should judge for itself.

Mr. MURRAY said, it was known to every one that an appropriation for the support of a Military Establishment could not be made for a longer term than two years; but that case was widely different from the present. It was known that, by the Constitution, a military appropriation cannot exist more than two years; but the doctrine he supported was in cases of debt or obligation under a law; and, in such cases, he still contended that though the House had the physical power to refuse an appropriation to satisfy a claim thus founded, they had not the right.

Here the debate was interrupted by a motion for adjournment; which was carried, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 20.

PROMOTION OF USEFUL ARTS.

A bill from the Senate for the promotion of Useful Arts, was read the first time.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1796.

The House resumed the subject of yesterday. Mr. LIVINGSTON had restricted his resolution for striking out the appropriations for the Mint, sometime before the House rose. The pensions to the officers were an exception.

Mr. WILLIAMS observed, that he had made an estimate of the expenses of the Mint, and the sums coined, which he begged leave to state to the House, in order to aid them in their determination:

EXPENDITURES.
In the year 1792 . . .			$7,000 00
Do. 1793 . . .			18,648 28
Do. 1794 . . .			32,746 33
			$58,394 61
CREDIT.
Cents and half cents coined:
In 1793 . . .	$1,281 79
1794 . . .	9,598 21
			10,875 00
			47,519 61
Appropriations in the year 1795,	24,600 00
Deficiencies now called for	18,300 00
			42,900 00
			91,419 61
Deduct from the purchase of lands, buildings, apparatus, machines, &c. .			28,887 09
			$61,532 52

From this statement the sum of $61,532 52 hath been lost by the Establishment, excepting a small sum which hath arisen from the coining of the precious metals. The total amount of the issues of the Mint, from its first establishment, is as follows:

Eagles . . .	2,795
Half eagles . . .	8,707
Dollars . . .	202,791
Half dollars . . .	323,144
Half dimes . . .	86,416
Cents . . .	1,066,033
Half cents . . .	142,534
Total in dollars . . .	453,541 20

This has cost the United States $61,532 52, which amounts to more than 13 per cent. for coinage.

Mr. RUTHERFORD.—It is with diffidence that I ever speak in this House, because I pay the greatest respect to the opinions of gentlemen; but I will venture a few observations. First, is it necessary that the United States should have a Mint? I think it requisite, because all Governments have considered this as a necessary measure. I hope that the Mint may still operate to the advantage of the Union; for occurrences in common life teach us in the clearest manner, the wide difference between theory and practice. This is the case in the business of the Mint, as, indeed, the public expectations have been raised very high on this occasion. Specie was to rise almost spontaneously; but, I repeat it, all theory and practice differ widely, and, of course, this matter has not been so productive as was expected. But now to arrest the matter, while in actual motion, and by a kind of electrical shock, stop the whole pulsation, and totally defeat the measure, when in reality we have the agreeable port in view, appears to me unwise and imprudent. This measure would immediately impress the public mind with an opinion that Congress had abolished the Mint. This might turn the course of materials necessary for coining gold and silver to other markets, and if the measure was hereafter considered wise and necessary, the whole business must begin over again, and consequently make its outlets under many and conspicuous disadvantages. I am hence for giving it another year of trial.

Appropriations.

Mr. GILES was for the motion. It did not go to the total destruction of the Mint. The design of the resolution was mistaken. It was better to wait for the report of the select committee. We shall then appropriate with more understanding than we do now. We shall see reasons for our conduct.

Mr. MADISON wished that the articles could be separated from the Civil List, when they are of a nature to admit of dispute. The military expenses had been separated from it, because an emergency might render it necessary to vote instantly for the Civil List; and the military expenses, by being connected with the other, might be voted without due deliberation. He wished that the articles could be divided, and the vote taken on them separately. He was not against voting for pensions to the officers of the Mint. He saw no harm in doing so in the mean time.

Mr. W. SMITH insisted that the money which had been advanced should be paid, such as $18,300 of deficiencies.

Mr. GILES saw more reason for objecting to this than to any other part of the articles. It did not seem that the money had been paid.

Mr. GILES was stopped by the SPEAKER. The question was on the amendment to the amendment of yesterday. The gentleman might, after that was decided, speak to any particular clause.

Mr. GILES explained, that he had merely intended a reply to the remark of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. SEDGWICK gave credit to Mr. GILES, when he said it was the design of no member to destroy the Mint. It would be a total prostration of national character to do such a thing. It was in the power of the House to modify or repeal the appropriation, if they did not like it. If the materials and workmen were struck out of the appropriation the Director and Officers would not think themselves authorized to proceed. Mr. SEDGWICK, if one of them, would be of this opinion.

Mr. GILES rose only that he might not be misunderstood by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He had not said, nor meant to say, that he would never vote against the existence of a Mint, for it was very possible that he might give such a vote. He only said that the present amendment did not go that far. He waited to ground his opinion on the report of the select committee. He had as yet not formed a resolution. Before he sat down he could not help noticing a curious argument employed by the gentleman last up in favor of the appropriation being voted, that if it was found improper the House had it in their power to modify or repeal it. Mr. G. thought it would be much better not to make a law till they had time to learn whether it was a right one, than to pass it, under the notion of repealing it, if it proved unadvisable.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH imagined that the House had annexed much more importance to the question than it deserved. It was very little matter which way the votes went. He would vote for retaining the appropriations in the bill, and he cared very little whether other gentlemen did so or not. If anything proved wrong in the appropriation it could easily be rectified.

Mr. PAGE was against the amendment. It would be the height of extravagance to vote the continuance of pensions, and at the same time to deny materials for the workmen and their wages. This would be creating sinecures. He would rather vote double the sum of an appropriation than to strike out the articles. Every independent nation had a Mint. The present state of American coin was a kind of piracy on the Mints of other nations.

A member remarked that he had seen members vote for postponing the bill for Indian houses, because there was not a fund secured for paying the expenses. That was $150,000. He thought that he saw a gentleman who voted against that bill voting for the present appropriation, and saying that the sum was trifling. Yet it was $62,641, or very near the half of the former. He agreed with the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH,] that the difference, whether the amendment passed or not, was but a trifle, and, therefore, hoped that the gentleman would oblige him by voting for it.

Mr. SEDGWICK rose to explain. He had not voted against the Indian bill, but for postponing. There was not a gentleman, he believed, on that floor, who was an enemy to the bill.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was for the amendment, but did not, by this, mean destruction to the Mint.

The amendment was for striking out all the items except the deficiencies of last year. On a division—yeas 40, nays 45; the amendment was thus negatived.

The House then took up the clause for deficiencies. The motion for striking out was negatived.

Contested Election—Permanent Seat of Government.

[H. OF R.]

The amendment for striking out the $10,000 for the purchase of copper, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House, was next taken up.

Mr. PAGE argued strongly for supporting the Mint. Formerly, there was a very ingenious but complicated machine, which, in coining, struck the dies with so much force as to break them. He believed that another was to be employed that would do much better.

Mr. HILLHOUSE had formerly been against the Mint, as a premature establishment; but he thought it would be disgraceful to retract now. He read a passage from the report made by the last Director, when quitting his office, and, of consequence, when he had no temptation to exaggerate; and this gentleman stated that the progress in future would be very great.

Mr. WILLIAMS, in reply, observed that the report contained many particulars very discouraging to the future prospect. If the institution is to be persisted in, he thought it should be removed to the permanent Seat of Government. He alluded to the great expense which has been incurred for buildings. Mr. W. further observed, that, as the burden of the Mint extended equally over all the Union, every part of it ought to reap the benefit. This was very far from being the case. Its advantages extended to a very small part of the Union.

For striking out the $10,000, yeas 38, nays 44.

The amendments from the Committee being thus gone through, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

STATE OF THE FORTIFICATIONS.

A Letter from the Secretary of War, respecting the state of the Fortifications, was next received, and the Clerk began to read it; but there being some difficulty in obtaining the requisite attention from the House, the SPEAKER thought that it had better be referred to the select committee on that subject; which was done accordingly.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Burwell Bassett, of the State of Virginia, complaining of an undue election and return of JOHN CLOPTON, to serve as a member of this House for the said State; and the said report being twice read at the Clerk's table, was, on the question being put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"It appears that an election was held on the 16th day of March, 1795, in the district composed of the counties of Henrico, Hanover, New Kent, Charles City, and James City, in the State of Virginia, to elect a member to this House.

"That, upon an estimate of all the polls taken at the several elections, John Clopton had 432 votes, and Burwell Bassett 422.

"That, out of the number of persons who voted for John Clopton, 37 were unqualified to vote, and of those who voted for Burwell Bassett, 33 were also unqualified to vote.

"Whereupon, your committee are of opinion that John Clopton, who has the highest number of votes, after deducting the before mentioned defective votes from the respective polls, is entitled to a seat in this House."

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 21.

The Clerk informed the House that the SPEAKER was ill, and unable to attend: when the House, after some conversation, adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 22.

The SPEAKER being still indisposed, the several orders of the day were postponed, and the House adjourned till Monday next.

The bill, entitled "An act to amend the act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," passed by the Senate, was read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

The bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1796, was read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

A bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, was read and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday.

PERMANENT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

A report was made by the Committee on the Federal City, which recommends two resolutions, in substance as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to borrow such sums as, in his judgment, he shall see proper, not exceeding in the whole $500,000, nor more than $200,000 in one year, to complete the Public Buildings in the City of Washington. The loan to be secured on the public property of said city; the rate of interest to be by him agreed, and the term of payment, which is not, however, to be before the year 1800. The United States to guarantee the loan, should the property of the city prove inadequate, and that they engage to make good any eventual deficiency.

"Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners appointed under the act establishing the temporary and permanent Seat of Government to render, every six months, to the Secretary of the Treasury an account of the moneys expended, of the progress made, and of the funds remaining in their hands, and an account of their administration—all to be laid before Congress."

Referred to a Committee of the Whole for Monday next.

ORGANIZING THE MILITIA.

Mr. GILES, from the Committee for Organizing, Arming, and Disciplining the Militia of the United States, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

It was afterwards moved that it should be printed; and this motion was withdrawn. This was afterwards retracted, it having been stated by a member that only fifty copies of the old bill were preserved.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. GOODHUE said, that the Committee of Compensation to Members and other Officers of Government were, from sickness, only four—they were equally divided. Mr. CORT was added.

EXPORTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

A Letter was read from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a statement from the Commissioners of the Revenue of the exports of the United States, from October 1, 1790, to September 30, 1795.

Another communication was read from the Secretary of the Treasury. It enclosed the statement called for by two resolutions of the House of the 18th instant, so far as the Treasury documents furnish materials for the purposes therein mentioned.

These communications were referred to the committee appointed by the resolution introduced by Mr. SAMUEL SMITH.

TUESDAY, January 26.

Mr. TRACY submitted two resolutions. The first for giving the privilege of franking to the Accountant of the War Department; the second to augment his salary. The resolutions lie on the table. [These resolutions were taken up on the subsequent day and referred.]

Mr. HARPER moved that a committee be appointed to inquire what proceedings have been had on the act for the more general promulgation of the Laws of the United States. He also laid on the table a resolution that the number of copies to be printed should be augmented.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Land Office Committee, reported a bill for establishing land offices for the sale of lands in the Northwestern Territory. The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

EXECUTIVE SALARIES.

About twenty printed petitions and remonstrances from certain inhabitants of the State of New Jersey, were laid on the table by Mr. KITCHELL. They were all copies of the same tenor. They complained of the high salaries of the Executive and members of the Legislature. A militia-man, returning from service to his family, has only ten cents per day; a member of Congress has thirty cents per mile. This they regard as an aristocratical distinction.

Mr. KITCHELL said, that he had kept these papers for some time by him, as it was expected that many others of the same kind would be sent to join them. The complaint, he thought, had more foundation formerly than at present, since the great rise in the rate of living.

The petitions were referred to the committee who are to bring in a bill for ascertaining the compensation of members.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH laid the following resolution on the table:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do consider whether any, and what, alterations are necessary in the laws of the Union with respect to commerce and navigation."

Mr. SMITH then addressed the SPEAKER as follows: When the proper time shall arrive, it will be prudent, 1st, To make it the interest of all nations to meliorate their deportment towards the United States; 2d, To induce well-disposed nations to act favorably towards us, in their commercial regulations; and 3d, To correct positive evils by indirect means, where prudence restrains us from direct measures. The present time, when the nations of Europe, with whom we have the greatest relation, are on the eve of a peace, appears to me proper to consider the subjects, and I have therefore thought it my duty to lay before the House the resolution just read, that gentlemen may direct their attention to the propriety of repealing that part of the laws which lays an extra duty of 44 cents on foreign tonnage, and of one-tenth additional duty on goods imported in foreign ships. Such duties are in fact commercial war; and will be submitted to by nations in competition no longer than your commerce was insignificant. France resented it in 1791, at which time she employed but 8941 tons of shipping to the United States, and she passed a law laying seven livres per cwt. extra duty, on tobacco imported in American ships. This was equal to 46s. 6d. sterling per hog-head, when the whole freight was but 32s. 6d. per cwt. Thus she secured the carriage of 40,000 hog-heads of tobacco to her own ships. The stroke was immediately felt. Our ships were thrown out of the trade, and in 1792, there entered in our ports, 24,017 tons of French shipping, an increase of 15,076 tons in one year. Circumstances have compelled France to suspend that law, but will she not renew it, if we continue ours? Can we complain if she should? And is there not good ground to fear that she will extend her extra duties to rice, fish, lumber, and other objects of exportation, and thus secure to her ships the carrying of all the products of the United States, that she may have occasion for? It will be remarked that the French goods imported to the United States are fine, and would employ but few ships. But those from America to France are very bulky, and would employ a great number. Mr. JEFFERSON says, that in 1792, we employed 116,410 tons of shipping to France, almost the whole of which advantage will be lost in case she should countervail our protective duties.

In 1791, the merchants of Liverpool complained that our protecting duties had enabled us to monopolize the whole carrying trade between Great Britain and the United States, and prayed the King to take measures of retaliation. The subject was submitted to some merchants of London and Bristol, who acquiesced in the fact, but gave their advice against violent measures, expressing their hope that the evil might be removed by a Treaty of Commerce. In the late Treaty with Great Britain, she has reserved to herself the right of countervail, and bound us from laying any new duties on her shipping. Mr. SPEAKER, I fear this countervail. It will be made at her discretion, and may or may not be just. If unjust, it will be an endless scene of negotiation and misunderstanding. But suppose that Great Britain, in our own words, lays an extra duty of one-tenth on goods imported in foreign vessels, what will be the consequence? Why effectually to secure to herself the exclusive carrying of all our products to her markets. For instance, the duty on tobacco, in Great Britain, is about fifteen pence sterling per lb. One-tenth additional to be paid by our ships is three halfpence. The hoghead, on an average contains 952 lbs. which will make the extra duty amount to £5 18s. 9d. per hhd., when the average of freight in times of peace is but thirty-five shillings per hoghead. Rice pays a duty of seventeen shillings and four pence per cwt. in Britain. Suppose the tierce of rice to weigh 672 lbs., the duty will then be £2 7s. 8d. One-tenth added will be 4s. 9d. sterling per tierce, if the rice is imported in an American vessel; when the freight of the tierce of rice in times of peace is only from 10 to 12 shillings sterling per tierce. On every other article of our commerce, Britain having the right, will make the countervail such as to secure the carrying thereof to their own shipping. Having once tasted its sweets, they will not easily relinquish the advantages. Portugal also complains. All nations that can, will resent those protecting duties, and having it in their power, will countervail. I therefore submit to the serious consideration of the House, whether prudence does not dictate a repeal of those duties.

The motion was ordered to lie on the table.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 27.

Mr. HARPER moved that all reports which had been made by Heads of Departments to either House of Congress, and printed up to the commencement of this session, be reprinted for the use of the members, and that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for that purpose. Ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of MATTHEW LYON, of the State of Vermont, complaining of an undue election and return of ISRAEL SMITH, to serve as a member of this House for the said State, made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Ordered, That Wednesday next be assigned to take the said report into consideration.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the salary of the Accountant of the Department of War, be augmented to the sum of — dollars, and that he receive the same in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as he receives his present salary, to commence on the — day of —."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. EARLE, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. THOMAS; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the privilege of franking letters be extended to the Accountant of the Department of War; and that all letters to and from the said Accountant, be transported free of postage."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the committee appointed to inquire if any, or what, alterations are necessary to be made in the "Act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States;" that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. GREGG presented a petition from sundry inhabitants of Dauphin, Northumberland, and other counties in Pennsylvania, soliciting the making of a cross post road for two hundred and forty-three miles. Referred to the Post Road and Post Office Committee.

A petition from several merchants in Newbern, in North Carolina, praying remission of the duty on sundry goods destroyed by water, was read and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

A report was then read on the petition of Lucas Fitch. He had settled with Mr. Steele an army agent, for his claim, and got a note for £70 or £80, and gave a receipt in full. He intrusted his note to an agent, who lost it, and now the petitioner comes forward and asks the United States to pay the note. This, with the petitions of Timothy How and Margaret Lint, were negatived by the House.

REUBEN COLBURN.

The House then went into a Committee on the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Reuben Colburn. The report of the select committee being unfavorable, was read.

Mr. DEARBORN urged that the petitioner had done every thing in his power to lodge his claim within the time limited by law. He asked a farther postponement for the sake of getting information.

Mr. HARPER objected, that the delay was owing entirely to the negligence of Mr. Colburn himself. He was completely ready to decide on the question. For deferring, ayes 41, noes 38.

The Committee rose. The Chairman reported progress, and leave was granted by the House for the Committee to sit again.

The remainder of the day was spent in the consideration of reports on private claims; and then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 28.

Mr. GOODHUE presented a bill from the committee appointed for reporting on the compensation to members of Congress, and certain of their officers. The bill was made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

Mr. W. SMITH moved that the Committee of the Whole House should be discharged from farther considering the bill from the Senate to amend an act to promote the progress of the Useful Arts.

This was agreed to, and it was then referred to a select committee.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Stenographical Committee, reported that they had conferred with Mr. David Robertson, of Petersburg, in the State of Virginia. They had thought him qualified; his demand for a session was to be four thousand dollars for preparing his reports for the press, exclusive of the expense of printing; and that Andrew Brown, printer of the Philadelphia Gazette, had offered to pay eleven hundred dollars of this sum, so that there would remain two thousand nine hundred dollars to be paid by Government. The report was made the order of the day for to-morrow.

PROCEEDINGS IN OUTLAWRY.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate to regulate proceedings in cases of outlawry.

To the third section several amendments were proposed. The section itself was in these words:

"SEC. 3 And be it further enacted, That if the said person, so indicted shall not be found within thirty days after the said second writ of capias shall come to the Marshal's hands, or being found shall escape, the said Marshal shall, at least thirty days before the return thereof, read or cause to be read, the said second writ and the copy of the indictment thereto annexed, at the court house of the county within which the offence is charged by the said indictment, to have been committed, and also of the county in which the party is by the indictment supposed to dwell, if such county be within the district, or if the offence be committed on the high seas, then at the court house or one of the court houses where the said court from which the said writ issued is statedly held, and in the presence and hearing of at least twelve persons, which number, if need be, he is hereby authorized forthwith to summon and convene from the neighborhood, and then and there shall make or cause to be made a public proclamation in manner following, to wit: "A. B, [naming the person indicted] is hereby notified that an indictment is found against him, [or her, as the case may be,] and is commanded to appear at the day and place at which the writ now read is returnable and answer the said indictment and abide the judgment of the court, on pain and penalty of being outlawed, and every person so summoned by the said Marshal to attend and hear the said proclamation, shall be subject to the same penalty for non-attendance, and entitled to the same mileage for attendance, as persons summoned to attend as jurors in the Circuit Court of the same district, or in the District Court in the Districts of Maine and Kentucky."

Mr. GILES saw no propriety in giving the Marshal power to summon twelve persons, for the purpose above mentioned, and to fine them for not attending. He moved that the words "and in the presence and hearing of at least twelve persons," be struck out; so as that the proclamation should be made at the time of some court, for the purpose of greater notoriety. Courts would be sufficiently frequent to obviate any difficulties arising from the want of a reasonable collection of people to witness the transaction.

It was objected, that it might happen that no court was in session at the time when it would be necessary to make the proclamation.

Another motion was made to strike out these words following the former "which number, if need be, he is hereby authorized forthwith to summon and convene from the neighborhood." This motion was negatived—ayes 29, noes 34. A division was then taken on the motion of Mr. GILES. This was carried—ayes 42, noes 33.

Mr. GILES then moved, as a matter of course, to strike out from the words, "and every person so summoned," &c., to the end of the clause. Agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS proposed to add, in the 6th line of the third clause, after the words, "the court house," "and during the sitting of the court." The amendment was agreed to.

In the third line of section fourth, Mr. MILLEDGE moved to insert after the words, "thereto annexed," "to be posted in three or more places of public resort in the county in which the indictment was had, and in the county in which the offence was committed and." This also was agreed to.

The Committee rose. The Chairman reported the amendments, and the House took them up. After some conversation, the bill was recommitted to a select committee of three members.

And the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 29.

Mr. PARKER presented a report from the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the Naval Equipment of the Union, which was read a first and second time. They recommended that one of the forty-four gun, and one of the thirty-six gun frigates should be fitted out. As the United States are at peace with the Emperor of Morocco, and most likely so with the Dey of Algiers, a larger armament, at this time, is superfluous. They recommend that the materials of a perishable nature should be sold by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and the money appropriated for discharging the Public Debt. The other materials are to be laid up. This report was made the order of the day for a Committee of the Whole, on Wednesday next.

A petition was presented and read, from Nicholas J. Roosevelt and J. Hart, merchants in New York. They stated that they had been considerably engaged in the business of mining, and wished for encouragement and protection of the House. On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the petition was referred to a select committee.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

In pursuance of the authority vested in the President of the United States, by an act of Congress, passed the 3d of March last, to reduce the weights of the copper coin of the United States, whenever he should think it for the benefit of the United States, provided that the reduction should not exceed two pennyweights in each cent, and in the like proportion in a half cent, I have caused the same to be reduced, since the twenty-seventh of last December; to wit, one penny weight and sixteen grains

By the Letter of the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States held at Boston in June last, and the enclosed application of the under-keeper of the jail at that place—of which copies are herewith transmitted—Congress will perceive the necessity of making a suitable provision for the maintenance of prisoners committed to the jails of the several States, under the authority of the United States.

UNITED STATES, January 29, 1796.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Another Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I send herewith, for the information of Congress—

1. An Act of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, ratifying an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to prevent suits in certain cases against a State.

2. An Act of the State of North Carolina, making the like ratification.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 29, 1796.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

JEAN MARIE DE BORDIE.

The petition of Jean Marie de Bordie was next read. He was a native of St. Domingo, and had served in the fourth Georgia battalion during the war. He had been a man of property, and did not receive all his pay. He went to St. Domingo and staid there until the massacre. He has since found that his claim for pay is barred. The fact of his not being fully paid does not appear to be certified. A certificate signed Abraham Jones was read from the Treasury Office of the State of Georgia. This attested that no trace was there to be found of any payment made to the petitioner.

Mr. HARRISON moved that the report on the petition should be postponed until Monday se'nnight.

Mr. SWANWICK hoped that this gentleman would be relieved. He had come forward to support America in the hour of her distress; and on every principle of justice, of generosity, and of gratitude, he hoped that America would now assist him. Mr. S. was even now ready to vote him some relief. If any gentleman had doubts on this subject, Mr. S. would be glad to vote for recommitment, in order that he might have time to satisfy himself. Mr. S. seconded the motion of Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. GALLATIN thought it better to refer this matter to the Committee of Claims; Mr. HARRISON accordingly withdrew his motion, and the former passed, for referring to the Committee of Claims.

STENOGRAPHER TO THE HOUSE.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the report from the Stenographical Committee. The report was read:

Mr. SWANWICK then rose for the sake of asking information. He inquired whether the House were to sanction and authorize the reports of the proposed stenographer? He had very considerable apprehensions about the propriety of entering into the subject in any mode.

Mr. W. SMITH replied, that the gentleman engaged by the committee had undertaken to have his reports ready for Mr. Brown, printer of the Philadelphia Gazette, in the morning of the succeeding day.

Mr. SWANWICK rose again. He observed, that to give universal satisfaction was impracticable. So many gentlemen were to be satisfied, that it never could be accomplished. He observed that one of the principal causes of complaint against reporters was of a nature that did not admit a remedy. Gentlemen rose, in the ardor of discussion, and suffered many remarks to escape from them, which neither in thought nor expression, were perfectly correct. If the reporter, as was his duty, took them down, and stated them exactly, gentlemen were irritated by seeing themselves exhibited in this shape, and then blame was cast on the reporter. Every degree of praise was due to the editor of a Philadelphia daily newspaper, whom Mr. S. named, and who had not only done everything in his power to obtain the debates of the House at full length, but had frequently advertised, that if errors were committed by his reporter, they should, on application, be instantly rectified. More than this, it was impossible to desire, for no mode of conduct could be more liberal or candid. But Mr. S. did not see the propriety of blending the House of Representatives and the editor of a newspaper in this business. The stenographer is to be called an officer of the House, while he receives eleven hundred dollars from the printer of a Philadelphia newspaper. He is thus also the officer of the printer, as well as ours. If we give the gentleman the proposed salary, we are to depend on him alone, whereas at present we have different reporters, and two or three of them frequently and mutually both corroborate and correct each other. What has escaped one reporter, or what he has misunderstood, is often observed by his competitor. The error is amended, or the defect supplied. Mr. S. farther observed, that as far as he had read or heard of, such an institution as the one now proposed, was never known under any Government, or in any country, that had hitherto existed. [It was observed, in some part of the debate, that an attempt of this kind was once made by the National Assembly of France.] Mr. S. expressed himself warmly against Government making any composition of the nature now proposed with a printer, and against any attempt for giving one newspaper an advantage over another, by any preference as to the copy. If Mr. S. wanted any person to be sure of dismission and disgrace, he could not name any other situation where that dismission and disgrace were so absolutely certain, as to a person accepting the proposed office of stenographer. If he did his duty, gentlemen would frequently not like to see their speeches exactly as delivered. If he altered them, his utility was at an end. It would therefore be much better to let the gentleman stay at his own business.

Mr. GILES objected particularly to the opposition made in this late stage of the business. He admitted that it was a delicate step, but he complained in strong terms of the inaccuracy of the reports now given. He observed that the object was not merely to find a stenographer who would satisfy the members of that House, but who would also give satisfactory information to the public at large.

Mr. SHERBURNE agreed with the gentleman last up, that the object of the resolution could not be merely to give satisfaction to members, but information to the public; though, if it was important that the public should be informed of what was said in that House, the proposed resolution would be inadequate to its objects. But he conceived it more important for the public to be informed of what was done, and that, he observed, was not always to be inferred from what was said; as (the mind being always open to conviction) it had not been unusual in a former—he would not say the present—House, for gentlemen to argue one way, and vote another. As, therefore, no certain inferences of the conduct of members would be drawn from their speeches, and as the public were more interested in their actions than their sayings, (a knowledge of which the present resolution was not, in his opinion, calculated to promote,) it would not meet his concurrence. But, Mr. S. further observed, that if the speech was to be considered as the infallible inditium of the subsequent conduct, as the avowed object of the resolution was to diffuse, through the various parts of the States a knowledge of that conduct, he should oppose it from a conviction that the means were not competent to the end. The resolution proposed a publication of the debates in a daily Philadelphia paper. These debates would necessarily be so voluminous as to engross the greater part of such a publication. Except in Philadelphia, New York, and one or two other large cities, there were no daily papers; in all other places they were not published oftener than once, or, at most, twice a week. The daily papers, in comparison with others, were few. If, therefore, a daily paper was engrossed by a detail of the debates, when would the public arrive at a knowledge of them through the more common medium of a weekly paper? The inhabitants of this, and a few other large towns, might be gratified, perhaps benefitted, by a speedy perusal of them; but when would the citizens of more distant parts of the Union, through their usual weekly channels, be indulged with the like opportunities? The difference would be as one to six; and what the inhabitants of Philadelphia might become acquainted with in one year, the people of New England and Georgia would not be informed of in six years, unless they relinquished their own weekly publications for a Philadelphia paper.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that he would candidly confess that the House had put itself in a delicate situation on this subject; yet, if, on the whole, gentlemen be of opinion that the measure was improper, it ought not, by reason of any antecedent conduct, to be now further pursued, to the public detriment. It was also but just to say that if the measure was proper, a more competent and more impartial agent than the one proposed could not be obtained. He said that the printers had much merit from their endeavors to communicate to the public the debates of the House, yet it must be allowed that their endeavors had been too unsuccessful; that in consequence, much injury had been done, not only to the characters of gentlemen as men of talent, but also, in some instances, to the motives which had produced public measures. These were evils to which a remedy should be applied, if it did not involve those which would be more injurious. It ought to be remembered that the man appointed would be an officer of the House, responsible to it for his fidelity and accuracy. The debates would then be published under authority of the House, and it of consequence was responsible for his precise execution of the trust. It was impossible to conceive that at some times, with the best intention, he should not mistake, and of course misrepresent. The member in such a situation would feel the injury, but redress would be obtained only by the interposition of the House. This would afford ground for numerous appeals, and endless litigation; and, in the end, might be ruinous to many valuable and respectable characters. It was of importance that no constraint should exist which would prevent gentlemen from expressing freely and without fear their own feelings and opinions and those of their constituents. How far the fear of misrepresentation, and the difficulty of correcting it, under such a system, would produce such an effect, gentlemen he hoped would consider before they assented to this proposition.

There was one other consideration, which had great weight on the mind. Whatever opinion we might entertain on the subject at present, all would remember the powerful influence of party and faction, and their intimate connexion with free Governments. From hence it might be easy to conceive, that hereafter this might be rendered the most powerful engine of an unprincipled majority, to overawe and to prostrate and destroy a virtuous minority. For no character was so established as to withstand for any length of time constant misrepresentation supported by the authority of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARPER rose in reply to Mr. SEDGWICK, who, immediately after he began speaking, observed that the gentleman had mistaken his meaning. Mr. H. said that he perfectly understood the member, and proceeded to recommend the object of the report. He gave credit to the present reporters for diligence and good intention, but thought them far inferior to what might be done. Great attainments had been made, he admitted, but more might be done. He thought it of the highest consequence that the speeches of members should be correctly published and disseminated among the people. As to the sum now proposed, a London newspaper would give, he had no doubt, five thousand dollars a year for such a reporter. He questioned not that Woodfall would receive ten thousand pounds a year from the printer for his reports. It had been objected that daily papers alone could hold such debates; but weekly and semi-weekly papers could select the most interesting passages of them from the daily papers. Mr. H. recommended that either this report or a similar one should be adopted, or that the business of reporting should at once be put to an end. He spoke of atrocious mistakes. The debates, as now published, held up the House to the scorn of the world. He would rather have the doors shut up altogether. He would, if the present resolution was rejected, make a motion to that effect. He was sorry to learn that the debates had been collected into a book, entitled "The Political Register," of which he doubted not that immense numbers would be sent to Europe, and this book he reprobated in the strongest terms.

Mr. SEDGWICK observed, if gentlemen were misrepresented, in one of the newspapers, where debates were reported, the editor of that paper had advertised that he was ready to publish any corrections which might be offered. This notice had been long and frequently given, and gentlemen had it in their power to do themselves justice.

The first resolution in the report was then read, and the question going to be put, when

Mr. BALDWIN said, that the more the House advanced into this affair, the greater was the number of difficulties which occurred. The resolutions had the less weight with him because they were hurried through at the close of last session. The institution was unprecedented in any other Government. He knew that members might be misrepresented, but this scheme would not cure the evil. He repeatedly declared, that on all great questions, where talents found an object worth exertion, the debates in that House were very well represented. He had seen many speeches, sketched by printers in this city, that he would not wish to see better done. He did not know of any recent or particular complaints about inaccuracy. We have now been in session for seven or eight weeks, and there has not occurred much interesting matter, to make any remarkable debate out of. He said that the debates, if taken at full length, would far exceed the limits of any newspaper. As to the expense of printing, that of the laws of this session would cost twenty thousand dollars, and he conjectured that to print the speeches would require an hundred thousand dollars; and even after they were printed, it would be necessary to pay people for being at the trouble to read them, for otherwise nobody would go through a perusal of every word spoken in the House.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that the reports at present published were full of notorious falsehoods, and the characters of members with their constituents would have been sunk, if it had not been known that this kind of things deserved no credit. He was in favor of the report. He complained that even when pieces were sent to the printers, they were embodied in the sketch, by which means the reporter got the full credit of them, which had pernicious consequences. One of his objections to the present mode of reporting was, that the speeches of members were often much improved. He mentioned an instance from his own experience. A speech was once made for him by a person who reports in this House, and who has a very good style of writing. The style, said Mr. N., was above mine. There was not a sentiment in it which I would have disavowed. It was a better speech than mine; but, in an entire column, there was nothing that I said. As for sending corrections to the printers, Mr. N. was above it.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was against the report. The loss of four thousand dollars would be a much greater harm to the public than any injury arising from inaccurate reports. He did not see that the characters of members with their constituents depended on these publications.

Mr. SWANWICK.—The gentleman from Virginia last up has suggested that the House have somehow committed themselves to appoint a stenographer, by their previous resolution on this subject; but that resolution goes only to the committee receiving proposals. It therefore remains with this House whether to accept them or not when made. As to the gentleman who is the subject of the resolution, if I have more strenuously than usual opposed the motion, it is from a desire to keep him from quitting the lucrative situation he is said to find himself in, to embark on the stormy sea he is contemplating. To be the organ of the members of this House to their constituents, is indeed a very delicate task; one for which, considering the danger he might be in of an Orpheus's fate—that of being torn to pieces—the salary is but a poor compensation. He is to do justice to the eloquence of some members; he is to clothe in an elegant dress the uncouth, yet well-meaning expressions of others; but what will he do with the silent members, who never speak at all? What will their constituents think of them? Indeed, sir, if he has the idea I have formed of his danger, he will not undertake it at all. Faction and party have been mentioned; happy stenographer, if he can keep clear of these! If he fall into their power, insensibly he will represent one side in clouds and darkness, the other as ornamented with the brightest beams of light. How will he please both? Misrepresentation is complained of: alas, sir, how quick is error—how slow is the progress of truth in almost all things. Our stenographer must indeed be a wonder-working man, if he can revert this tide, and make every where light and correct reasoning prevail. The best mode of informing our constituents is, by the yeas and nays on our acts; this truly shows, as a gentleman from New Hampshire has observed, our doings, which are much more interesting to them than our abstract reasoning; these our constituents will easily form to themselves ideas of, when they know our votes; as the celebrated Dr. Johnson is said to have written speeches for members of Parliament whose general political sentiments he knew, by knowing these he applied arguments pretty accurately, as he supposed them to bear on every question offered. But, it has been observed, if we do not agree to have an official stenographer, a motion will be made to clear the House of those who now take down debates. These persons are tolerated only on the principle that our galleries are open. Woodfall, a celebrated printer, took down debates from memory; could we prevent this being done here? Or should we drive all printers from us who take notes, for the inaccuracies of some? I hope not. The liberty of the press has great title to respect. How can we agree by a miscellaneous union, the most strange, to commute with Mr. Brown, the printer, the salary of four thousand dollars, so as to possess him first of the proof-sheets, without supposing other printers will become rivals of this business, and complain if they are thwarted in an equal pursuit of their own livelihood? The best way is to leave this business, like others, to regulate itself. Mr. Brown, by his labor in this way, has already widely extended the circulation of his paper—evident in his present overture—and, by the by, this is no mean proof of correctness on the whole in his success; he or others will still go on to improve the business, if left to themselves. If he or they fall into errors, they are their own. Members may correct them, or write their own speeches out, if they please. But what has the House to do with this; or why should it become the censor and promulgator of the speeches of its own members? Our time is wasted often, already, by too many long discussions on unimportant objects; but what would it be if we were to be every morning saluted with motions to correct the performances of the stenographer of the preceding day? All the advantage of the motion is to obtain more accuracy; but, it is said, the House means not to pledge itself for this accuracy: if so, why employ an officer under its authority for this purpose? On the whole, sir, we shall in vain seek to escape abuse and misrepresentation; these are by far too much in vogue. All the consolation left is, what I usually apply in such cases—that is, the consciousness of not deserving them.

Mr. GILBERT was against the report. He thought the publication of the laws and the yeas and nays, a sufficient means to communicate the proceedings of the House.

Mr. WM. LYMAN said that the debates in one of the newspapers (he either named or plainly alluded to the Philadelphia Gazette) had, for the two last sessions, been altogether exceptionable. He was sorry to learn that these debates had been collected by a person who comes here, so that they would now, perhaps, descend to posterity. If they were as incorrect in the volume (The Political Register) as they were in the newspaper, they were a libel on that House, and would disgrace it with the world. If this resolution was rejected, it would be advisable to send all the printers to the gallery.

Mr. KITCHELL was entirely against the object of the report.

Mr. GILES said, that he might have taken up wrong impressions, but he thought the matter worth trying. It was a thing of experiment, by which he believed that the printer would make money. He acknowledged that, for some time past, several of the reports had been pretty correct. It is better to let them go out as they are, than to stop them altogether. He would not wish to press the motion, if it was to meet with opposition from several gentlemen who had this day spoken against it. He moved that the Committee should rise, and the further consideration of the report be deferred till Monday.

Mr. W. SMITH said, it was admitted on all sides, that it was highly important for the people to receive the most accurate information of the proceedings of the House, and that the debates were, in general, extremely misrepresented. Was it not, then, the duty of the House to remedy this evil, and to adopt such measures as would transmit to the people in every part of the United States the most accurate information of the conduct of their Representatives? The House had now an opportunity of obtaining the services of a gentleman peculiarly distinguished for the rare talent of reporting with accuracy public debates; the compensation which would be adequate to such useful and laborious service, was beyond the ability of any printer; the House ought therefore to contribute towards it; the sum required was a trifle, when compared with the advantages; it was no object. The only question, then, was, whether the stenographer ought to be an officer of the House; in that capacity he certainly would be more easily restrained from the commission of any wilful misrepresentation. Mr. S. did not feel the force of the objections against the report. It had been said that, although the members were now misrepresented, yet, they had it in their power to publish corrections; but these corrections were often overlooked, while the misrepresentation was operating very injuriously to the character of the member; this was generally the case in places remote from the seat of Government; the mangled account of a debate was republished in a distant paper, and the correction, if it reached the distant printer, was generally disregarded. Among the opponents to this report, Mr. S. said he was surprised to find the gentleman who represented this city, [Mr. SWANWICK,] who, more than any other member, should have withdrawn his opposition to the measure proposed; that gentleman's constituents had it in their power, at any time, to hear the debates of Congress; they were on the spot; ought he not, then, in candor, to assist in facilitating to the remote citizens the means of obtaining the best knowledge of the proceedings, and the most correct statement of the discussions of the House? Ought they, from their remoteness, to be kept in the dark, or to be furnished with such light as would only mislead? Had they not a claim on the House to adopt such means as would enable the citizens in every State to judge of the propriety of public measures? The member from this city had another exclusive advantage; if misrepresented, he could correct the error, and the correction would be read; that was not the case with the members from the remoter States, whose reputation might be injured by misrepresentation, without a similar advantage: the member from this city was in the midst of his constituents; he had daily opportunities of setting right any misstatement by personal explanation.

Mr. SMITH said, he did not agree with some gentlemen, that it was sufficient for the people to know what laws were passed, without knowing the previous discussions; he thought, on the contrary, the favorable or unfavorable impression of a law on the public mind would depend in a great degree on the reasons assigned for and against it in debate, and the people ought to know those reasons. When a law passes, imposing a tax, would not the people be reconciled if they saw, from the discussions of the House, that such tax was unavoidable, and that the particular mode of taxation was the best which could be devised? And ought this information to depend entirely on the caprice or convenience of the reporters, who attended when it pleased them, and who published just as much of the debate as they found leisure or patience to accomplish? Mr. S. said he was convinced that the errors which had excited so much complaint were not the effect of design, but merely of inadequacy to the task. Very few were competent to such a business, which required peculiar skill in stenography, very laborious application, and a clear comprehension of the subject-matter of debate. It could not be expected that persons thus qualified would devote their whole time to this business without an ample reward. The report was objected to because there was novelty in the plan: it was true the House of Commons of England had no such officer, but their practice was not a fit precedent for us on this occasion, for they admitted no person to write down, in the House, their proceedings; their debates were taken from memory. This House, on the contrary, had, from its first institution, facilitated, by every accommodation, the reporting their proceedings. The thing was not altogether, however, without precedent. During the existence of the National Assembly of France, there were officers of the House who composed a daily work called the Logography, which was an exact account of the debates of that body. It had been asked, what control the House were to have over this officer? He answered that the stenographer would be liable to be censured or displaced, if he should be guilty of wilful misrepresentation. It would be always easy to discriminate between a casual inadvertence and a criminal misstatement: the officer's character and talents, his responsibility to the House, and his oath to report with impartiality, would be a sufficient pledge of his accuracy. Mr. S. seriously believed that the character of the House had suffered from the erroneous statements which had gone abroad. He wished to guard against this evil in future; he was willing, for himself, that every syllable he uttered within those walls should be carried to every part of the Union, but he deprecated misrepresentation. He was anxious that the truth should be known in relation to every act of the Government; for he was as satisfied that the affection and confidence of the people in this Government would increase with the promulgation of truth, as that whatever it had lost of that affection and confidence was owing altogether to the propagation of detraction and calumny. It was under these impressions that he had originally brought forward the proposition and that he now recommended the report, and having heard no reasons to change his sentiments of the expediency of the measure, he should persist in supporting it.

The motion by Mr. GILES was agreed to. The Committee rose, and, a few minutes after, the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, February 1.

The appropriation bill was received from the Senate with amendments. None of importance; the most material one is a proposed appropriation of thirteen thousand dollars, instead of ten thousand, for the purchase of copper for the Mint.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARPER laid on the table a resolution, in substance as follows:

"Resolved, That such reports, as well from Heads of Departments as select committees, as are important to explain the acts of Government, be published at the expense of the United States."

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

The engrossed bill for establishing trading houses for the Indian tribes was taken into consideration. The first blank was for the gross sum to be appropriated for the general objects of the bill. It was moved to fill this blank with $150,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS spoke in favor of the bill.

Mr. SWIFT stated some general objections to an appropriation at the present time. The bill had been postponed for the purpose of obtaining further information from the Committee of Ways and Means relative to the actual state of the finances; this information is not yet received, and considering the great sums that must be raised and appropriated for other objects, he conceived that a further postponement was necessary. He moved that it should be postponed to the third Tuesday in February.

Mr. S. SMITH urged the necessity of an immediate decision, in order to answering the object of the bill in any degree whatever. He recited a passage from the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to show that the funds were not so deficient as the gentleman had stated; but all objection on this account was done away by the plan which he was well assured was before the Committee of Ways and Means, and that was, a reduction of the Military Establishment, by which means a sufficient sum would be found without having recourse to new taxes. The goods ought to have been written for last September. There is, perhaps, just time enough left to procure them, but any further delay will totally defeat the salutary purposes of the bill.

Mr. GILES asked, if voting the money would raise it? He did not suppose that a delay of a few days would make any difference in regard to the final object. He confessed he had his objections to the principle of the bill; he did not consider the plan calculated to produce the effects anticipated from it.

Mr. MILLHOUSE urged a speedy decision. The gentleman from Virginia says, that voting the money will not procure it, but will the money be realized unless it is voted? Mr. H., alluding to the retrenchment of public expenses by the proposed reduction of the Military Establishment, said there would be no difficulty about raising the money; but the money will not be immediately wanted. The Government will not be the importer of the goods. Some merchant will probably be employed for this purpose, and the payment called for at a future day. He urged the necessity of despatch.

Mr. PARKER supported the general provision of the bill, and urged the necessity of an immediate attention to the subject. He calculated on a surplus in the appropriation for the War Department to provide for this object.

Mr. HARPER moved that the bill should be re-committed. He then entered into a general consideration of the principles of the bill, which he reprobated altogether. Alluding to the general objects of commerce, he said that public bodies never manage these matters without loss. He adverted to the repairs of roads, construction of canals, &c.; all these objects prosper under private individual direction, but when entered into by public bodies nothing is ever brought to perfection, and the public money is lost. He applied these ideas to the plan of the bill. Persons at fifteen hundred or two thousand miles' distance, are to be intrusted with public property to a large amount. It is not in human wisdom to guard against frauds and impositions; no check or control can be devised which will be found adequate to repressing private rapacity. Mr. H., therefore, wished the bill re-committed, for the purpose of an entire new modification. If the motion should obtain, he should then move a resolution providing for a loan to individuals for the purpose.

Mr. SWANWICK supported the general principle of the bill, and reprobated the idea of loans to individuals; he considered such a plan as one of the worst kind of sinking funds. The plan is an experiment; it is not, perhaps, possible to predict what will be the result; but the object is worth the trial and worthy the attention of the Legislature. He considered the objections against the plan of the bill as applying with greater force against the proposed substitute.

Mr. S. SMITH said, when the gentleman from South Carolina made his motion for a recommitment, he had supposed he would have accompanied the motion with some reasons; but since he had heard what he offered as reasons, he found himself confirmed in his opinion of the inexpediency of his motion. Mr. S. said, the only reason for the commitment was, that the principle of the bill might be changed, by individuals being substituted for the Government, that is, by loaning the money to private persons for the purposes of the trade. He was entirely opposed to this principle. Public debtors are the worst kind of citizens. These persons, after having expended or lost the money, will be coming forward with their petitions to be released from their bonds. He did not wish to increase the business of the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SWIFT enlarged on the idea suggested by Mr. HARPER. He thought it infinitely preferable to leave the business to the enterprise and resources of individuals.

Mr. HARPER rose in reply to Mr. SMITH. He entered into a further consideration and defence of the plan he had proposed as a substitute.

Mr. DEARBORN objected to Mr. HARPER's idea; he saw no sufficient reasons to support the preference that gentleman gave to a loan to individuals. He was in favor of the general principles of the bill; he thought it economical to appropriate money for the object of cultivating good understanding and harmony with the Indians, but should vote for the bill only on the condition of a reduction of the Military Establishment.

Mr. GILES entered more largely into a consideration of the principle of the bill. He had no opinion of Governmental bargains—he believed they always turned out losing bargains. The clause which provides that the original stock shall not be diminished, he conceived, would operate against the general object of the bill, if adhered to; but this he did not contemplate; he supposed that it would terminate in an annual provision. Mr. G. alluded to the PRESIDENT's Speech, a clause of which had been recited; he did not consider that, or a former recommendation of this matter, as binding on the House. If the PRESIDENT's Speech is considered as the political Bible of the Government, the case is different; but he presumed no person was disposed to assert this. He considered the House as perfectly free to adopt or reject the proposition. With respect to the effects of the measure, gentlemen had differed in their predictions. Predictions which were the nearest to the effects produced, may be considered as the result of the greater political sagacity. He would venture to predict that the whole sum proposed to be appropriated would be sunk in three years. With respect to the fund contemplated from the surplus of the War Department appropriation, he considered it as altogether illusory; there is no such surplus, none had heretofore been found, and he presumed none ever would. For though the number of troops voted had never been raised, yet the whole of the money appropriated was always expended.

Some further remarks were made by several members, and then the motion for recommitting the bill being put, was lost—52 to 34.

Mr. SWIFT then renewed his motion for a postponement. This, after a few remarks from that gentleman, and a short reply from Mr. GILBERT, in support of the bill, was negatived.

The motion for filling the blank with $150,000, was then put and agreed to, fifty-six members rising in the affirmative.

On reading the section in which the blank for the penalty is included, Mr. VENABLE moved for a partial recommitment of the bill, for the purpose of new-modifying the section. This motion gave rise to a variety of observations, in the course of which the motion was extended to a general commitment. This motion being put, was lost.

The motion then was, to recommit the second, fourth, and sixth sections. The second section was recommitment. The fourth section provides that the capital stock of the United States embarked in this business shall not be diminished. Mr. VENABLE's object was to have the section so modified as to blend the interest of the individual who is to conduct the business with that of the public. Mr. S. SMITH said the motion went to destroy the bill, for no person would engage in the business on such a plan. The motion for committing the fourth section was lost. The sixth section assigns the sum of $150,000 to be appropriated for the general objects of the bill. The motion to recommit this section was negatived.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the second section, Mr. MULLENBERG in the Chair.

Mr. VENABLE moved that the section should be altered to read, that the agent should give bonds to the amount in value of the goods committed to his charge.

Mr. J. SMITH supposed that the sum should be sufficient to cover the amount of the goods which may at any time be found in the hands of the agents; from ten to fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, he supposed, might be sufficient for this purpose.

Mr. DEARBORN suggested the idea of leaving this part of the business to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. He moved to amend the clause accordingly.

Mr. VENABLE's motion was lost. Mr. DEARBORN's motion was agreed to.

The Committee then rose, and the Chairman reported the amendment, which was adopted by the House. It was then ordered that the bill be again engrossed and read the third time to-day.

[The bill was subsequently read a third time and passed—58 members rising in the affirmative.]

TUESDAY, February 2.

Mr. NEW and Mr. ISAAC SMITH were appointed a committee on the part of the House to examine the enrolled bills. A message was afterwards received from the Senate, informing the House of their having appointed Mr. PAINE for the like purpose on their part.

The amendments of the Senate to the appropriation bill were taken into consideration, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from any further proceedings on the report of the select committee relative to the appointment of a Stenographer to the House.

Mr. HARPER called up a motion laid on the table yesterday, the purport of which is, that such reports from the Heads of Departments and select committees, as may conduce to explaining and understanding the laws, should be published at the expense of the United States. The motion being read, Mr. H. moved that it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. VARNUM objected to the motion. He did not see what purpose would be answered by it. The laws are sufficiently explicit. He did not suppose they would be rendered more so by printing the reports.

Mr. SHERBURNE suggested the propriety of extending the resolution to the first, second, and fourth volumes of the Journals of the Congress under the Confederation. This idea was reduced to a motion that the committee should be instructed accordingly.

The motion for a reference to a select committee was agreed to. Also, that the committee be instructed to report on the expediency of republishing the above volumes of the Journals of the old Congress. A committee of three was appointed.

The following message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen, of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I transmit herewith the copy of a letter, dated the 19th of December last, from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, stating the avowed and daring designs of certain persons to take possession of lands belonging to the Cherokees, and which the United States have, by treaty, solemnly guaranteed to that nation. The injustice of such intrusions, and the mischievous consequences which must necessarily result therefrom, demand that effectual provision be made to prevent them.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 2, 1796.

The said Message and Letter were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers.

INTERCOURSE WITH THE INDIANS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers.

The first section of the bill came under consideration. This refers particularly to the line laid down in treaties already concluded.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out the word "said," referring to the ideal line in the treaties. He remarked, that treaties were now holding for the purpose of forming an actual line of demarcation, which might be very different from that recognised by existing treaties.

Mr. HILLHOUSE supported the clause in its present form. He remarked, that the reference to the line laid down in the treaties was of the utmost consequence to the objects of the bill. The design is to recognise, in a summary and pointed manner, the line of demarcation. This law is to serve as a directory to the people on the frontiers, and will be sent into the Indian country. This will be a simple mode of bringing into one view the stipulations of the several treaties relative to this important point.

Mr. DAYTON objected to the section on account of its connexion with the preamble to the bill, which is not in itself binding.

Mr. GREENUP said the section stood, in his opinion, perfectly well; if it is amended, it will leave the business in such a state of uncertainty as will defeat all the salutary purposes of the bill.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that his motion, so far from producing the uncertainty anticipated by the gentleman, would have the direct contrary effect. This motion went to enlarge, not to narrow the provision for guarding against the violation of the line so much dreaded.

Mr. GALLATIN and Mr. VENABLE supported the motion for striking out.

Mr. TRACY remarked that the only reason for striking out the word appeared to be, that other Treaties may be made which would alter the line; he saw no great force in the objection. The clause provides that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES shall ascertain and cause the line to be marked. That is surely desirable. Should the line be afterwards altered by subsequent Treaties, the new line will then be marked under the direction of the PRESIDENT. This will then become the line. And he conceived that there was the utmost propriety in referring to such line in the most plain and positive terms.

Mr. FINDLEY thought the reference in the clause to the preamble might be of use, and could certainly do no injury. He was against the amendment.

The motion for striking out was negatived.

Some amendments took place in the second section on motion of Mr. HILLHOUSE.

Mr. MILLEDGE moved to amend the clause which prohibits the citizens of the United States from crossing the line for the purpose of hunting and destroying the game. He said if this provision is restrained, it will be necessary to remove all the citizens on the frontiers at least twenty miles within the line.

Mr. HILLHOUSE recited the clause of an Indian Treaty, in which the United States had expressly stipulated with the Indians, that their citizens should be restrained in this particular point. He said this very circumstance is the occasion of the greatest difficulty with respect to the Indians; they were fully sensible of it, and well understood the restrictions which were imposed, and it would be attended with the most pernicious consequences to give the occasion to find fault with the Government in this respect.

Mr. MILLEDGE's motion was not agreed to.

The Committee made various amendments in the course of the discussion. Without finishing, they rose and reported progress. Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 3.

LEWEL BENTON, from South Carolina, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. W. SMITH reported a bill further extending the time of receiving on Loan the Domestic Debt of the United States. It is proposed by this bill to extend the time to the 31st day of December next. Twice read and committed.

DISCOVERY OF THE LONGITUDE.

A report on the petition of Frederick Guyer was read. This petition was for pecuniary aid from Government to enable him to prosecute his researches for the discovery of the longitude by lunar observations. The report is against the prayer of the petition—the compliance therewith being considered by the Committee as unconstitutional.

Mr. PAGE moved that the report should be accepted. He observed that the principle contained in it, if adopted by the House, would, in future, save Congress from similar applications.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, if the object of the gentleman was to have the report placed on the Journal, and to be considered as establishing a principle, he should have his doubts as to its propriety. He should be sorry to have it established as a principle, that this Government cannot Constitutionally extend its fostering aid to the useful arts and discoveries; he did not think that it was true that the Government had not such a power; he, however, was not prepared at present to go into the discussion of the subject. He should have no objection to agree to the report on the principle which had been mentioned: That it did not appear that the object was probably attainable by the plan of the petitioner. The petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

INTERCOURSE WITH THE INDIANS.

The order of the day, on the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, was called up.

Mr. GALLATIN moved, if it was in order [the SPEAKER said it was,] that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged from any further proceedings on the bill, and that it be recommitted to the select committee. He grounded his motion on the motion of amendment brought forward yesterday, founded on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and on a report of the Attorney General, which, though it had not been formally communicated, had been shown to a particular gentleman of the House. It was understood that the amendment referred to respected the line of demarcation.

FEBRUARY, 1796.]

Permanent Seat of Government.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HILLHOUSE saw no use in recommitting the bill to the select committee; no amendment had been proposed which he did not suppose could be made in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARPER, who seconded the motion of commitment, said he saw no impropriety in sending the bill back to the select committee—much light had been thrown on the subject in the course of the discussion, and it was the duty of the House to avail itself of this light. Due deliberation on this important bill was certainly highly necessary, and if further information should arise in a subsequent stage of the business, he should be in favor of a new recommitment.

Mr. GILES was in favor of the recommitment, and if that motion should fail, he should then move for a postponement. The treaty referred to in the bill has never been officially before the House. He referred to General Wayne's Treaty.

Mr. SENDWICK saw no purpose that could be answered in a recommitment. It is not pretended that there is any information to be received which is not already in possession of the House. After recommitting, in the present state of the subject, the select committee will bring in the same report which is already before us.

The SPEAKER here informed the House that the Treaty had been printed, and laid on the desk of every member; but had not been formally laid before the House. This was exactly the state of the matter.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, that the motion to recommit in this stage of the business was not agreeable to the practice of the House, and conveyed an oblique censure on the select committee.

Mr. DEARBORN said, he did not suppose the committee had neglected to avail itself of all the information within its reach; but as there had been a great variety of opinions expressed in the Committee of the Whole, for the sake of greater unanimity, he should wish to have the bill recommitment, and that an addition of two members be made to the committee.

Mr. SWANWICK supported the motion on the ground that the bill was predicated on a Treaty which was not before the House.

Mr. GALLATIN asked if it would be in order to offer a motion grounded on a public document (referring to the Treaty) which is not before the House. The SPEAKER said it would not be in order.

Mr. HEATH was opposed to the recommitment; he considered it as a retrograde movement, and compared the proposition to Dr. FRANKLIN's carriage with horses before and behind; Congressional business progresses too slowly; he hoped the Committee of the Whole would be suffered to proceed; he saw no difficulty in the way of maturing the bill in the Committee of the Whole.

The motion for recommitting was agreed to, and the committee enlarged so as to consist of a member from each State.

Mr. BLOUNT then moved the following in substance: That the above committee be instructed to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, whether any and what relief ought to be granted to persons claiming lands on the Southwestern Territory, purchased from the State of North Carolina; which lands, since they had been purchased, had been ceded by Treaty to the Indians.

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. S. SMITH observed, that the bill was predicated on the Treaty made by General Wayne with the Indians. He doubted the propriety of proceeding on a public document not in possession of the House. It had been laid before the members nobody knew how.

Mr. BOURNE said, the Constitution was silent as to the mode to be adopted respecting the promulgation of Treaties after they had become the supreme laws of the land. He supposed the printing and publishing the same, accompanied with a proclamation, was sufficient ground for the House to go upon in relation to any acts or appropriations which were rendered necessary in consequence of such Treaties.

The SPEAKER here interposed by observing, that there was no question before the House.

PERMANENT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee relative to the Federal city. This report concludes with the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to borrow such sums as, in his judgment, may be necessary (not exceeding the sum of five hundred thousand dollars in the whole, and not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars in any one year) for completing the buildings requisite for the accommodation of the Government of the United States, at the city of Washington; the said Loan to be secured on the public property in the said city, and at such rate of interest as he may judge expedient, and payable at such time or times as he may judge proper, after the year one thousand eight hundred; and that the United States guarantee to the money-lenders, that in case the property so pledged shall prove inadequate, the United States will make good the deficiency.

"Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners appointed by virtue of the act, entitled 'An act for establishing the temporary and permanent Seat of the Government of the United States,' every six months to render to the Secretary of the Treasury a particular account of the receipts and expenditures of all moneys entrusted to them; and, also, the progress and state of the business and the state of the funds in their hands; and generally an account of their administration; and that the said Secretary lay the same before Congress at the next session after the same shall be received; and that a bill or bills be brought in accordingly."

The Message of the PRESIDENT on this subject—a particular detail of the progress of the public buildings, state of the funds in the hands of the Commissioners, &c., signed Alexander White; and the act for establishing the temporary and permanent Seat of the Government of the United States, on motion by Mr. J. SMITH, were read.

Mr. J. SMITH, Chairman of the select committee, who had made the report, said, that the reading of the papers had been called for, that the Committee of the Whole might have a full view of the whole subject before them, that they might be able more fully to judge of the propriety of the report. The committee had proposed a Loan on the principle of economy. Mr. SMITH and Mr. SWIFT called for the reading of several other papers—these were accounts of the expenses hitherto incurred, balances due to the Commissioners, &c.

H. of R.]

Permanent Seat of Government.

[FEBRUARY, 1796.]

The first resolution was then read.

Mr. SWIFT observed, that he would not propose any thing which should tend to contravene the act for establishing the permanent seat of the Government of the United States. He was willing that that act should be carried into execution, but then he was not willing to go to any unnecessary expense to effect the object.

He stated some objections to the resolution; he did not think that a Loan was necessary for the purposes of the act. The funds in the hands of the Commissioners, he said, are sufficient to complete the public buildings in such manner as to accommodate Congress at the period pointed out. He referred to the details of the funds which had been read. Another objection he had to the first resolution, was the discretion vested in the PRESIDENT to institute a Loan at an indefinite rate of interest—another objection to the resolution, in his mind, was the guarantee of the Loan by the United States.

He was averse from the Government's being implicated in this business; he believed it was entirely unprecedented. Adverting to the idea of the lots being enhanced in price at a future day, he very much doubted the accuracy of this. He was rather of opinion that the Government would eventually be obliged to make good the whole Loan. On the whole, he thought it best for the Government to have nothing to do with the business, but to leave the management of it to the Commissioners by the aid of the funds in their hands; with economy they will be sufficient; but the more money there is granted, the less will be the economy in expending it.

Mr. MURRAY said, that the gentleman had taken the only ground which he believed could be taken to set aside the report of the committee, and that was that due economy had not been observed in the expenditures already made; he believed he would be puzzled extremely to substantiate this idea to the amount of one shilling.

Mr. M. said, that no public money to the amount of one shilling had hitherto been expended on the Federal city; nor is any public money now asked for. The object of the resolution is simply a Loan—a Loan on terms that individuals would think eligible. Adverting to the objection on account of the interest, he did not suppose with the gentleman that ten, fifteen, or twenty per centum would be necessary; he had been informed that it could be procured for eight per centum.

Taking a general view of the subject, he remarked, that all that was asked, was as little as could be expected. It is not a grant, a gift; it is simply to guarantee a loan for a public economical purpose.

Mr. GALLATIN objected to the indefiniteness of the rate of interest. He said it would militate against the loans proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury. He moved that the resolution should be amended so as to express the rate of interest at six per cent.

Mr. BRENT said he hoped that the motion would not obtain. The sum of 500,000 dollars is so inconsiderable compared with the loans contemplated by the Secretary of the Treasury, amounting to six millions; that the rate of interest on Governmental loans could not be supposed to be effected by a rate of eight, ten, or twelve per cent. for the sum mentioned in the report. The security he considered so good, that the money would be immediately obtained, and the reimbursement made with ease at almost any rate of interest. He supposed the economy of the plan was so obvious, that no man who was disposed to comply with the act for establishing the permanent Seat of Government, would oppose it. Mr. B. then adverted to the objections offered by Mr. SWIFT, and entered into a general statement of the affairs of the city, to show the policy and expediency of adopting the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER here remarked, that the merits of the report were not under consideration, on which Mr. BRENT waived any further observations.

Mr. W. SMITH stated the difficulties that would result from not restricting the rate of interest. He said it was unprecedented in the practice of the Government; even in the loan for the benevolent purpose of making peace with Algiers, the rate of interest was fixed at five per cent. He adverted to the principle of the report, and said that when the permanent Seat of Government was first agitated, assurances were given that the United States would never be called upon for any pecuniary assistance. It has been said that the money is not now asked for; but only the guarantee of a loan; he observed on this, that the Government ought to make the same calculations as it would were the payment inevitable on its part, for the public faith should be pledged to make good any deficiency that may happen. Mr. S. was proceeding, when

Mr. BRENT rose and said, he would withdraw his opposition to the motion. He was willing that six per cent. should be inserted.

Mr. GILES moved that a blank should be left for the rate of interest. Mr. GALLATIN consented to vary his motion accordingly.

Mr. HARPER, adverting to the period when payment of the instalment shall commence, observed, that in the year eighteen hundred, the United States would be called upon for the sum of 1,200,000 dollars, on account of the deferred debt, &c. He moved that the term should be left blank.

Mr. W. SMITH seconded this motion.

Mr. J. SMITH said, that it was not to be supposed that the United States would be called upon to pay one farthing of the loan. If the measure proposed should be adopted, the property in the Federal City will immediately rise in value; but if it fails, it will paralyze the whole business.

Mr. CRABB said, he hoped the report would not be altered. No man can seriously suppose that the United States will ever be called upon to reimburse one shilling of this money. The property is now the public property, and every principle of prudence and economy forbids that it should now be sold. But if the public faith is supported for fixing the permanent Seat of Government, the property at the period when the instalments become due, when the Government removes to the Federal City, will be so enhanced in value as to furnish a sum much more than amply sufficient for the purpose of reimbursement.

FEBRUARY, 1796.]

The term of repayment was finally left blank.

Mr. SWIFT then moved to strike out the sums of 500,000 and 200,000, before the word dollars, and leave blanks.

A motion for the Committee rising prevented any further discussion. They rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 4.

Mr. HARPER, after a considerable preparatory address relative to the Excise Laws, in which he recited the difficulties, embarrassments, and perplexities attending the execution of those laws, offered three resolutions, the objects of which are,

1st. To transfer the duties from the commodities to the instruments or machines used.

2d. To transfer the collection to the collectors of the State taxes.

3d. To give the State Courts cognizance of causes arising under those laws. Laid on the table.

Mr. W. SMITH, of the Committee of Ways and Means, brought in a report relative to reinforcing the existing provisions for reducing the Public Debt. This report contains several resolutions on the subject; they were twice read and committed for Monday next.

PERMANENT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee relative to the Federal City.

The motion for striking out the sums of 500,000 and 200,000, before the word dollars, in the first resolution, under consideration.

Mr. MACON supported the motion for striking out. He offered some objections to the general scale of expenses.

Mr. FINDLEY said he was against striking out. He was on the select committee, and recited the motives which had governed them in the report they had brought forward. The question submitted was not whether what had been done was proper or not, but what was necessary to complete the plan already begun. The committee had thought proper to report the sum of 500,000 dollars in order to draw the attention of the House more particularly to the object for which the money was wanted. Mr. F. thought it was always disgraceful to a Legislative body to make appropriations which fall short; the consequence always was further applications. The resolution only empowers the President to borrow the sum, but it does not follow that it will be all borrowed or expended. He said the sum might be struck out, and reinserted again, but he saw no good purpose that would be answered by this.

Mr. NICHOLAS was opposed to striking out. He supposed that if a sacrifice of the public property was not determined on, there would be no hesitation in making a liberal provision: a niggardly supply on the other hand would necessarily produce that effect.

Mr. CRABB. Mr. Chairman, I flatter myself that the words five hundred thousand will not be struck out on any principle, but more especially on the one suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina. What, sir, is the object meant to be obtained by the memorial on which the resolution now before you is grounded? Is it not a reserve of the public property, under the well-founded expectation of a rise in its value? This will not, cannot be controverted. Then let us examine the proposition for annual loans and annual guaranties, and we shall find the completion of this desirable measure in a great extent defeated, should we adopt that proposition. For, inasmuch as the public confidence will be diminished by this parsimonious mode of legislation that will require annual Legislative aid, as certainly will it operate as a check on the rise of public property. If the present application of the City Commissioners is fully and completely gratified, public confidence will be fully established; but if left dependent on the passions and prejudices of future Legislatures, I apprehend it will not.

The gentleman from Connecticut, with whom this motion for striking out originated, yesterday more than intimated a waste and extravagant expenditure of the funds that had already been in the possession of the Commissioners. If this is a fact, as the gentleman has made the charge, it becomes a duty in him to designate and point out the particular objects of abuse, and that might lead to a correction of them; but round assertions, [unsupported by proof, can have no good effect, and may tend to injure the reputation and interest of your public agents, and at all events, must wound their feelings, perhaps unjustly. For a moment reflect on the nature and origin of these funds, and I am persuaded the Committee will think with me, that expenditures hitherto made by the Commissioners, under the direction of the President, is hardly a proper subject for examination by this Committee. For, sir, it is well known that not one cent has yet been expended by the Union for the progress or accomplishment of this great national object. But the funds applied have arisen from donations, or grants of lots by private citizens of Maryland, and by voluntary liberal donations from the States of Virginia and Maryland, accompanied by acts of the granting Legislatures, that required annual accounts of the expenditure. Then, sir, it follows, that the Legislatures that made those grants, are the proper bodies to make this scrutiny. When the United States have made grants, or guaranteed loans to cherish and increase the city funds, and thereby become responsible, then, sir, will that kind of discussion be proper: before that it appears premature. The necessity of this application on the part of the Commissioners is objected to. I will not contend for the necessity. I think none existed. Nor was it policy, unless certain of success. Yet I feel satisfied that it is sound policy in the General Government to aid and assist the funds by complying with the resolution. Sure, I am, that if the application had not been made, the city property was commensurate to all the public objects required; and no doubts rest on my mind, if the resolution passes, but that it will increase the funds far beyond the necessary demands: but I feel it a duty to declare, that I much doubt the sufficiency of the funds, provided this application should, from an ill-timed illiberal, contracted policy, miscarry. The refusal of this small parental aid would strongly convey the idea, and enforce belief, that the General Government was not serious, not firmly fixed in their purpose of making the present location the permanent Seat of Congress. Consequently a sudden and dreadful fall of lots, the value of which depends on public opinion respecting that event.

And thus, sir, a sacrifice of the public interest must be the result of such mistaken policy. And, sir, from this loss, one of two evils must follow: that is, we must either have direct recourse to the Federal Treasury to supply this deficiency, or relinquish this momentous object, hitherto so solemnly adopted after the fullest discussion by the General Government. Sir, the first and least of these evils should be cautiously guarded against; but, sir, the second is an evil of that extent and magnitude, that no comprehension, however extensive, can by anticipation arrive at the fatal result; nor no language, however strong, paint it in proper colors, to show fully its baneful effects; such a manifest, indecent, impolitic violation of public faith and private rights, acquired under the sanction of the original law, would shake the Union to the centre, if not burst asunder those political bands that so happily cement and bind this wide extended Union in the governmental compact—the sheet anchor of America, on which all her strength, wealth, and happiness must depend.

The motion for striking out 500,000 and 200,000 was carried, there is a blank consequently before the word “dollars;” no amendment was made to the second resolution.

The Committee rose and reported the two resolutions with the amendments to the first.

The amendments were taken into consideration by the House and agreed to.

The question then was on the first resolution as amended.

The debate was renewed on the general policy and expediency of the measure.

Mr. KIRCHELL was opposed to it. He said the public faith was sufficiently pledged by the act for establishing the permanent seat of Government. He did not suppose this would be more firmly secured by going into the measure. Adverting to the exigencies of the Government for money, he considered the present as the most improper time to make any grants or loans; besides, he saw no necessity for them. The funds already in the hands of the Commissioners are sufficient to complete the buildings for the accommodation of Congress in season. If money should be wanted at a more favorable time, there was no doubt it would be granted; but at present he was opposed to doing anything in the matter.

Mr. J. SMITH said there was no doubt that Congress had a right to withhold their aid in this business at the present time, or any other: the only question is, whether the measure is expedient or not. The committee had thought it was on the principles of economy and sound policy.

The first resolution was agreed to, fifty-seven members rising in the affirmative.

The second resolution was also adopted. They were then referred to the select committee who brought in the report, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills.

The resolutions, as amended, are as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to borrow such sums as, in his judgment, may be necessary (not exceeding the sum of — dollars in the whole, and not exceeding — in any one year) for completing the buildings requisite for the accommodation of the Government of the United States, at the city of Washington; the said loan to be secured on the public property in the said city, and at a rate of interest not exceeding — per cent., and payable at such time or times, as he may judge proper, after the year —; and that the United States guaranty to the money lenders, that in case the property, so pledged, shall prove inadequate, the United States will make good the deficiency.

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the commissioners, appointed by virtue of the act, entitled “An act for establishing the temporary and permanent Seat of the Government of the United States,” every six months to render to the Secretary of the Treasury a particular account of the receipts and expenditures of all moneys intrusted to them; and, also the progress and state of the business, and the state of the funds in their hands; and, generally, an account of their administration; and that the said Secretary lay the same before Congress at the next session after the same shall be received.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

On motion of Mr. SWIFT, the House took up the report of the committee on the contested election of ISRAEL SMITH, one of the members of the State of Vermont. The report was read, which concludes thus: “That they are of opinion that ISRAEL SMITH is entitled to take his seat in this House.”

Mr. TRACY moved that the report should be re-committed. His reason for the motion was, that the petitioner might have an opportunity to bring forward legal proof, if such was the fact, that two towns, which had been deprived of the opportunity of voting, through the failure of notice on the part of the Sheriff, containing a sufficient number of freemen to have changed the result of the election. It appeared that the evidence of this fact had been taken ex parte by the petitioner.

FEBRUARY, 1796.] •

Militia Pensions—Arrearages of Army Pay.

This motion occasioned a long, desultory conversation; in the course of which it was said that evidence had been laid before the committee (but which had not been admitted) that those two towns contained more than thirty persons entitled to vote. It was said, that if this was the case, the election ought to be set aside.

The reading of a great number of papers was called for. Among these were the certificates of the town clerks of Kingston and Hancock, stating the number of freemen in those towns, amounting to upwards of thirty. These certificates, it was said, were sufficient and legal evidence.

It was observed by Mr. J. SMITH that the first question to be determined appeared to him to be this: How far the omission of an officer to notify the citizens of one or more districts, ought to influence in vitiating an election.

Mr. TRACY withdrew his motion for re-commitment, and moved that the report be postponed; this was agreed to, and Monday assigned.

MILITIA PENSIONS.

A report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of John Griffin was taken up in Committee of the Whole. This report contains a resolution for placing on the pension list such non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and volunteers of the Militia as may be wounded or disabled when in actual service, called out by any law of the United States.

Mr. TRACY stated the reasons which had induced the committee to report this resolution. They were, among others, the uncertainty of the existing law, and the justice, policy, and expediency of the measure.

The report was agreed to and reported to the House. The House adopted the same, and the Committee of Claims was directed to bring in a bill accordingly.

FRIDAY, February 5.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH reported a bill regulating the grants of lands appropriated for military services, and for the Society of United Brethren, incorporated for the purpose of propagating the Gospel among the Indians. This was twice read, and committed.

Mr. S. SMITH called up a resolution which he had laid on the table some time ago, and moved that it should be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. The purport of the resolution is, that that committee be instructed to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what, alterations may be proper to be made in the laws of the United States relative to commerce and navigation. The resolution was referred, pursuant to the motion.

Mr. MADISON, after some general remarks on the subject, offered a resolution, the purport of which is to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to cause a survey of the main post road from Maine to Georgia—the expense to be defrayed out of the surplus revenue of the Post Office. Laid on the table.

BENJAMIN STROTHER.

A report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Lieutenant Benjamin Strother was taken into consideration. This report refers the settlement of the claim of the petitioner to the accounting officers of the Treasury.

It appeared that the petitioner had marched a number of troops to the Army on a route on which there was no contractor, in consequence of which Mr. Strother had incurred expenses for the supply of the troops under his command. The vouchers for the charges had been destroyed by a fire which burnt the hut of the petitioner; all the evidence that he could now offer in support of his account was his oath. The report is founded on an opinion of the committee that no account ought to be allowed on the oath of any person.

The report occasioned some conversation, but was finally accepted, and a bill ordered pursuant thereto.

ARREARAGES OF ARMY PAY.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on a report of the Committee of Claims, to whom had been referred a resolution respecting a list of arrearages of pay or other emoluments, which may appear by the books of the Treasury to be due to the officers and soldiers of the late Army of the United States for services performed during the late war. The report states various reasons for not instituting the inquiry proposed by the resolution.

Mr. GILES said, he supposed a book had been kept in the proper Department, in which a general view of the accounts of all persons employed by the public had been stated, but, to his astonishment, he found that no such book was in existence. A strong reason why such a book should have been kept might be drawn from the statement of the Accountant of the War Department, who says that persons had been twice paid, and that instances of this kind had come to his knowledge.

The committee say that the subject cannot be gone into without a repeal of the limitation acts. He acknowledged this, and he therefore supposed those acts should be partially repealed; for in many respects they appeared to him to operate unjustly. From the report, it appeared highly probable that there were arrearages due to many persons; this might be inferred from the deranged state of the business. If anything was due, justice demands that it should be paid. But, from what was disclosed, he was aware that it would be impossible to do anything the present session. He should, however, reflect on the subject, and prepare something in lieu of the resolution he had offered. There are, said he, about an hundred clerks in the Treasury Department; he supposed some of them might not be very busily employed at the present time, and he thought they might be advantageously engaged in digesting these accounts, and bringing forward the different balances.

Mr. WILLIAMS was in favor of agreeing to the report. He recited some facts to show that the business would probably result in the United States being called upon to pay a great number of accounts, which no principle of justice obliged them to discharge.

Mr. FINDLEY said, if the business was practicable, he should think nothing of the limitation acts; they might easily be set aside. But he was convinced, at this time of day, the statement wished for could be partially executed.

Mr. BALDWIN stated a variety of insuperable difficulties which would present themselves in prosecuting the investigation proposed.

Mr. CLAIBORNE spoke in favor of the investigation. He hoped that, because some culprits had imposed on the public, and been twice paid, that Government would not refuse to pay a just debt. He had rather pay ten times the sums than refuse justice to a man who had a claim on the country for actual services. He had always opposed limitation acts as unjust in the extreme; they had operated most injuriously. He felt peculiarly concerned on this occasion, and he hoped the inquiry would be made. There is a sufficient number of persons in the public service, at high salaries, to undertake the business, and he hoped it would not be lost sight of.

Mr. DEARBORN said he had not supposed that the books were in the situation exhibited in the report. He was not, however, prepared to vote in favor of the report; he was rather of opinion that something might be done.

Mr. TRACY said that the suspension of the limitation act was not the question before the Committee of Claims, but simply this: the expediency of making a list of the persons who may appear to have balances due to them. What purpose could such a list answer, but to afford an endless scope of speculation? The consequence would be, forging of powers of attorney without number, by which means thousands of persons would gain twenty dollars for what did not cost them half a dollar.

On this account, no such book as had been mentioned had been kept, and he rejoiced that this was the case. All the evils attendant on the publication of the list contemplated would have resulted from such a book; for all the care and secrecy that could have been used would not have prevented such a list from having been made. Adverting to the mighty mass of public papers that must be examined in the investigation proposed, he said that ten years would not be sufficient to complete the business. He then recapitulated the uncertainty, perplexity, and eventual injustice that would attend the work. A large box of papers had lately been found, which, on examination, proved to be settlements of accounts, the parties to which, he had no doubt, had entirely forgotten that any such documents were in existence.

Mr. GILES differed entirely from Mr. TRACY as to the effect which would result from framing the list referred to; he thought it would prevent speculation. Only persons interested would apply for information, and from such the information was improperly withheld. This uncertainty led persons to dispose of their claims below their value. He hoped the book he had first mentioned would be made; he did not conceive it would require the time stated by the gentleman from Connecticut. The persons in the Treasury Department might easily adjust and reduce these accounts to a simple form in a much shorter period. He was, however, sensible that such was the present mode of keeping the accounts in the Treasury Department, that his resolution would not answer the purpose he had in view. He should, therefore, take an opportunity to reduce his opinion to a different form, in order to bring forward a measure that would reach the object.

Mr. HARPER remarked, that the report of the committee would not preclude any person from coming forward with a just claim. He saw no necessity for such a list as had been proposed; every man who had a demand against the public was fully sensible of it, and needed not any publication of a list to inform him. Mr. HARPER then adverted to the evils which would result from the forming such a list on account of the speculation which it would occasion. He instanced the experience of the State of South Carolina. He said he hoped the report of the committee would be agreed to.

Mr. DAYTON remarked, that it appeared to him to be very uncandid on the part of the gentlemen to attack a member on account of a resolution he had brought forward, when that member had himself withdrawn his support from it; he conceived that such conduct was indelicate and improper.

Mr. HARPER here rose and observed, that if he had said anything which implied the slightest imputation on the motives of the gentleman from Virginia, in bringing forward the resolution, he had been misunderstood—he meant no such thing. If his remarks were susceptible of such a construction, he asked the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. DAYTON replied that the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina had struck his mind in the manner he had stated. He did conceive that it was entirely improper to take up the time of the House in discussing a resolution which was not supported by the original mover. While he was up, Mr. DAYTON said that he would just observe that he had the fullest confidence in the purity of the motives which had influenced the gentleman from Virginia; he had done what was strictly within the line of his duty. Adverting to the report, he observed, that though he did not object to it in all its parts, he was clearly of opinion that it was not well founded in stating that it was impossible to form the list mentioned. He thought such a list could easily be made, as the vouchers were in existence to establish the claims.

Mr. TRACY said that the committee had not said that it was impossible to make the list; such an intimation is contained in the Accountant's statement, but is not in the committee's report.

Mr. HARPER offered a few more remarks on what had fallen from the SPEAKER, in which he questioned the propriety of a member's being reflected on for offering such observations as he had offered on the report of the Committee of Claims.

The question being called for, the report of the Committee of Claims was agreed to.

FEBRUARY, 1796.]

Case of Silas Clark.

[H. OF R.]

CASE OF SILAS CLARK.

The report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Silas Clark was taken into consideration by the Committee of the Whole.

The report is against the prayer of the petition, which was for full half pay. The petitioner was a captain in the Massachusetts line, had returned his commutation, but was not allowed any interest on the certificates returned, so that he never derived any advantage from them. He is an invalid from wounds and disabilities incurred in the public service during the late war; his pension is only one-third of a captain's pay.

Mr. NICHOLAS proposed that a general provision should be made. By a calculation which Mr. NICHOLAS offered, he said the petitioner had, from some cause or other, made a bad bargain in consenting to give up his commutation in lieu of a pension of one-third of his full pay. He conceives that the claim was founded in justice, and supposed the case was not a solitary one.

Mr. HEISTER said that, according to his calculation, the bargain was in favor of the petitioner; the interest of his half pay did not amount to so much per annum as his pension. The pension is $160 a year, the interest on the commutation is only $144.

Mr. TRACY went into an extensive consideration of the subjects of commutation, half pay, and pensions. The petitioner had received the pension from the beginning, and was therefore not entitled to interest.

Mr. S. SMITH supported the claim of the petitioner. He recited some circumstances of the battle of Monmouth, in which this petitioner was wounded, and in which Captain Clark had borne a conspicuous part. He expatiated on the merits of the officers of the late Army. Adverting to commutation, he recited the circumstances under which it was given. Captain Clark had exchanged it for a pension, but, in doing this, he had, through ignorance, made a bad bargain; this is as demonstrable as figures can make it. Now, the question is, whether the Government shall take an advantage of this contract? He could not believe that it would; when fully informed of the circumstances, this Government will always allow and pay a just claim. Mr. SMITH said the petitioner was entitled to his half pay for serving through the war, and to his pension for his wounds and disabilities; and there was a third demand which he was entitled to, and that was for interest on his pension during the time he did not receive it.

Mr. NICHOLAS read a resolution which he would offer, if in order, in lieu of the report of the committee. The purport of this was to make a general provision. It was remarked that the report of the committee ought to be first disposed of.

Mr. SEDGWICK hoped the report of the committee would be accepted. He adverted to the frequent allusions to personal services, and said that the distinction which was made was not, in his opinion, either candid or just. Mr. S. asked what class or description of persons can be named who did not suffer by the events of the late war. The farmer, the mechanic, the merchant—all suffered by the depreciation of the paper money. It was infinitely to be regretted that the officers and soldiers who carried us triumphantly through the glorious contest should not be paid every shilling due to them for their personal services; but it is also to be regretted that the farmer, the mechanic, and every other description of persons, who surrendered up their property to the call of the public did not receive an equivalent: they all made sacrifices, and were all victims to their patriotism in a greater or lesser degree. Can any man seriously contemplate a reimbursement of these losses, or compensation for these sacrifices? The attempt is impracticable, however desirable; it is entirely beyond the abilities of this country.

Mr. S. SMITH, in reply to Mr. SEDGWICK, said, there was a wide difference, in his opinion, between personal services and those which had been mentioned. While the soldier was fighting the battles of his country for a pittance, and suffering all the evils incident in his destitute and hazardous situation, his merit was infinitely superior to that of the farmer who sold his corn or his ox for paper money, or that of the merchant or mechanic who took the paper for the purpose of speculation.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, that he thought it very extraordinary that the gentleman from Maryland should bring forward a charge of speculation against the persons who took paper money: all classes of persons took it voluntarily for a long time. The charge involved all the funds of the Revolution; for, unless they had given it a currency, the cause would have been lost. But this was not all. Did not the States make tender laws to compel the people to take the paper, and were not thousands ruined by it—thousands of as good friends to the Revolution as any description of persons whatever? He saw no good purpose to be answered by such comparisons.

Mr. J. SMITH said, he conceived that the two gentlemen who had lately spoken [Mr. S. SMITH and Mr. NICHOLAS] did not understand the subject. These gentlemen had blended two things which ought to be kept separate and distinct, viz: the engagement on the part of Congress to give half-pay to the officers who should serve to the end of the war, which was afterwards, by agreement, commuted for five years' whole pay, and the engagement to give a pension to such officers as should have the misfortune to be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service. Mr. S. considered these engagements as referring to two different classes of men, viz: able and sound men, and invalids. Those of the former description who should continue in the service to the end of the war were promised half-pay for life; those who were disabled in the service were allowed to retire upon a pension. No man was obliged, against his will, to be placed on the pension establishment; and the fact was, that numbers of officers who were wounded, either from patriotic motives, or other views, chose to be considered as sound and able men, and received the emoluments of such full pay and the commutation. They could not surely complain that they, though disabled, were still allowed the emoluments of able-bodied and sound men. But they cannot be, at the same time, of both descriptions—both able and disabled. If the journals or acts of the Government were examined, Mr. S. was confident that this would be found to be the sense of the Government. If an officer had the misfortune to be wounded in the service, he might retire, and receive the reward promised to the disabled. If he chose to continue in the service as an able man, and the public were pleased to permit him to do so, and to accept of his services as such, he was at liberty to continue, and receive the emoluments of the able officer who served through the war. Mr. S. threw these ideas out for the consideration of gentlemen, and should be obliged to those who would set him right, if he was wrong. He conceived that it was not the intention of gentlemen to take the question immediately, for the usual hour of adjournment had arrived: he moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

The Committee accordingly rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, February 8.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of certain officers and soldiers who have been wounded or disabled in the actual service of the United States; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. HENDERSON moved a resolution in nearly the following words:

“Resolved, That the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business be instructed to inquire into the number of clerks that are now employed in the Department of the Treasury, the Department of State, and the War Department, and that they inquire into the number of clerks that, in their opinion, may be necessary for the services annexed to those Departments and offices, and that they make report thereon.”

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SHERBURNE took notice of the very great expense attending the present mode of payment of the interest on the Domestic Debt, and, with a view to remedy the evil, moved—

“That the Committee of Ways and Means do inquire whether any and what alterations and amendments are necessary in the mode of paying the interest of the National Debt.”

Mr. MURRAY moved, “that a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations are necessary in the offices of the Government of the United States.” Ordered to lie on the table.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. W. SMITH moved for the order of the day for taking into consideration the bill for further extending the time for receiving on Loan the National Debt of the United States. The House accordingly formed itself into a Committee of the Whole, read the bill, and agreed to it without amendment. The House being again resumed, Mr. SWIFT requested the bill might lie over till to-morrow, as he wished then to propose an amendment. Agreed to.

The report on the petition of Silas Clark was taken up again in Committee of the Whole, and a resolution adopted that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for allowing a compensation to the members of both Houses, which proposes an annual salary of one thousand dollars to each member, instead of six dollars per day.

Mr. GILES moved that the word “annually” be expunged from the bill. He thought the present mode of compensating the members of the Legislature a good one, and could not conceive why an alteration should be made. Such a mode of payment as was now proposed ought to be sanctioned only upon the maturest deliberation.

Mr. GOODRICH explained the reasons which induced the Committee to propose an annual instead of a daily payment to members, which was, that members might be induced to greater despatch in business, and to do away an idea which had gone abroad amongst many people, that, being paid by the day, the members of that House protracted their session to an unreasonable length.

Mr. GILES thought there ought to be no pecuniary inducement to members to push forward business in too rapid a manner, or to shorten their sessions. An annual salary would doubtless have this effect, and business, in consequence, would most certainly be neglected. It would be an evil of the greatest importance; it would be a constant temptation to members to neglect their duty; it would tend to embarrass all their deliberations. Indeed, it was a perfectly new mode of requiring Representatives, and would be supposed to be introduced for the purpose of advancing their pay—an idea which he did not wish to prevail, as he thought the present allowance sufficient. He therefore hoped the principle would not be agreed to.

Mr. SWANWICK was against the bill, and said, that to pay members in the way proposed would be to offer them a bounty to neglect the business of the Legislature.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was in favor of the bill. He said, that the Constitution had provided that Congress should meet once a year, and that more time was spent during their sitting than was taken up by the Circuits of the Judges. Yet the Judges had a salary allowed them, and it was not found to have any bad effect. Complaints are now made out of doors that their sessions are protracted for the sake of the daily allowance paid to them. Persons who said this, said he, do not know that we are all the time deeply engaged in business, which is much lengthened by clashing interests of different States. A yearly salary would do away this idea, without making any real difference in the amount paid by the Treasury for their services. If he thought the mode of payment would cause members to neglect their duty, as has been observed, he too would be against the adoption of it; but surely it cannot be supposed that members would not sit as long as business should require them. He observed, they had now been in session two months, and but very little important business had been done. He thought the mode proposed would tend to remedy this evil; it was an experiment at least worth trying.

Mr. FINDLEY did not object to the bill merely as a novelty, but because it offered no advantage. Many persons, no doubt, would think one thousand dollars a year too much; but he believed it best for members to do their duty, without regarding the misapprehensions and prejudices of they know not whom. He did not think the pay of members influenced their sittings. The greatest difficulty, towards the close of the session, was to keep members together. If, indeed, members would attend better at the beginning of a session, and take up less time in speaking, sessions might be shorter; but there must, however, be full liberty given to every member to express his sentiments in his own way. No law can regulate people's conceptions. He thought it best that the members should be paid by the day. He should never boast of passing laws in a short time, but of passing good laws.

Mr. NICHOLAS was in favor of the present mode of compensating members, as the period of their session was uncertain, and wherever salaries were paid, they were for certain business. Give members one thousand dollars, and he did not doubt but some of them would wish to return home sooner than if they had been paid in proportion to the time spent in business. Water, though insensibly, wears away stones; and such an influence, he feared, would have a tendency to undermine the integrity of members. It was better to be slow than too hasty in business. He hoped this bill would not pass as an experiment, for the effect must be corruption; and when once this enemy of all Governments is suffered to take root, it is difficult to eradicate it. Indeed, this bill would be supposed by many as a cover to advance the pay of members. If there were any such view, he wished members to propose the measure openly. He thought the present pay too much, and if the people thought it influenced the length of their sittings, they were of the same opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMS was against the bill, though he believed it to be brought in, by the Committee from the best of motives. It was their opinion it would shorten the sessions, and, if carried into effect, it might do so. If our wages were lowered, the measure would shorten our sessions. Every penny beyond expenses is too much: a medium salary was desirable. If the pay of members was increased, officers of Government will do the same. At present, it was true, all the necessaries of life were at a high price; but when the war in Europe ceases, the case will be different. Whenever we adjourn our sessions, (said he,) much business is necessarily left unfinished; and if members were paid by the year instead of by the day, all those whose business was not completed would be ready to say that members were hastened away to enjoy their salary at home.

Mr. SEDGWICK did not think the business before the House important. He was inclined, however, to favor the bill, not that he would grant a larger amount in that way than the amount of the present allowance per day. The argument of novelty, he said, would not apply; we are in the business of experiment. He would observe a fact well known, that every member in the House was deprived of the opportunity of pursuing his occupations at home, and of the emoluments arising therefrom, by his attendance to public business. He did not believe a yearly allowance would shorten the sessions, but it would remove the charge brought against members of protracting the sessions for the sake of their pay. Whether it is necessary to increase or diminish the present pay is not the question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON expected stronger motives for the bill than he had heard. It is acknowledged a perfect novelty. This, though by no means decisive, is an objection against the measure, and there is nothing else to recommend it. It has, indeed, been said, it will shorten our sessions; but would this be a benefit? If to continue in session be an evil, why are we here? If it could have been proved that expense would have been saved by the measure, that would have been a real advantage; but this has not been hinted at. It has, indeed, been said, it will remove from our constituents a suspicion that we are living here too long. It has been said, that an idea has gone abroad that we receive six dollars a day through the year. Few, he believed, were so ill informed; but this bill, if passed, will cause much more discontent than the present pay occasions. Deliberation in a Legislative body is necessary. The dearest interests of the people, he said, were committed to their charge, and he trusted they would watch over them, and never suffer them to be injured; and then, it was his opinion, their constituents would not think much of their pay.

Mr. BALDWIN said, that it was a disagreeable business to be employed in discussing the subject of paying themselves for their services; it would be a desirable thing to supersede the necessity of doing so. The Committee doubtless thought one thousand per annum would be an improvement upon the present mode of paying members, but he could not think so. He thought it best that the allowance should be paid in the old way.

Mr. GILBERT was willing to try the experiment of the bill proposed. He did not believe that either the present daily allowance lengthened, or that an annual salary would shorten, the sessions. He thought to say the contrary was a base insinuation.

Mr. BOURNE never heard it was the wish of their constituents that their payment should be annual instead of per day. He had heard it complained that their pay was too high; but now, since the price of living is so much advanced, he believed the people were satisfied. He saw no advantages from the proposed change. It cannot be thought that the pay is an inducement to members to prolong their sessions: he had not heard such a complaint. He was in favor of striking out the word "annually," and for recommitting the bill.

Mr. MADISON observed, that the present bill proposed no alteration with respect to the amount of money to be drawn from the Treasury, and it can make but little difference to members. What had been mentioned as the advantages of this bill, in his opinion, would operate against it. A novelty, he said, always called for hesitation.

Mr. SWANWICK thought, if they enacted good laws—laws that should encourage agriculture and commerce—their constituents would not trouble themselves about their salary.

Mr. GILES rose to remark upon an expression which fell from Mr. GILBERT, viz., that, to say members were likely to be influenced by the proposed salary, was a vile insinuation. He declared that it was a recommendation of the bill in the committee, that it would tend to shorten their sessions.

Mr. GILBERT explained, and justified the expression.

The motion for striking out the word “annually” was called for, and passed.

The Committee rose, and asked leave to sit again, which being granted, the House resumed itself; and the motion being put by the SPEAKER for leave that the Committee sit again, it was negatived; and the bill was recommitted.

And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 9.

FISHER AMES, of Massachusetts, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The bill for allowing a certain compensation per day to members of both Houses, was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole to-morrow.

THE DOMESTIC DEBT.

It was then moved that the House take up the bill for further extending the term of receiving on Loan the Debt of the United States; which being agreed to,

Mr. SWIFT moved a clause to be added to the bill to the following effect:

“That it shall be lawful for the officers of the Treasury to receive on Loan Continental bills.”

He observed, that he moved this clause because the officers of the Treasury had, for some time past, refused to receive Continental bills, as usual, and it was necessary to have the matter regulated by an act of Congress. Different constructions had been put upon the laws regulating the payment of these bills; he thought they ought to be received as usual; for though the act of limitation be supposed to have barred the payment of them, an act passed since must extend it. He was not disposed to repeal the statute of limitation: but, with respect to Continental money, there can be no fraud or deception, and there was certainly justice in the claim.

Mr. GOODHUE noticed that it had been observed that the officers of the Treasury had put a wrong construction upon the law regulating the funding of the Public Debt; but he thought differently. He thought they acted right in refusing to receive Continental bills. None of them, he observed, had been received for the two last years. No one could say which was just, or the contrary: There were many counterfeits, and many of them had been bought up for a mere trifle.

Mr. MACON said these bills should have been funded sooner. There were immense counterfeits, he observed, and if there were one case more than another in which the act of limitation ought not to be repealed, it was this.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, that all that part of Continental money which was not barred by the statute of limitation, was now received at the Treasury. Much of it was now in the Auditor's office, which would be received without objection. But if any one wished old Continental money, which had long been considered as dead, to be received on loan, a bill should be brought in for repealing a part of the limitation law.

Mr. GALLATIN was in favor of the clause. The act of limitation was not sufficiently clear with respect to Continental money, to be understood by the holders of it. The officers of the Treasury themselves, it seems, mistook the meaning of the law, and therefore others less versed in matters of this sort, might be supposed to do the same. The construction put upon the act, though true, was forced, and there ought to be a chance given to those who were mistaken. The reason the holders of this money did not fund it, when the funding system was adopted, might be owing to the unfairness of preference to different kinds of securities. He allowed there might be danger from counterfeits, but that these might be avoided by the customary means. He wished always to act for the public, as in a case of his own; and if the present case was his own, he should be for allowing the claims.

Mr. SEDGWICK remembered that when the funding law passed, that the value of the certificates was very low, which was the reason, he concluded, many were not funded. The speculators, no doubt, had taken care to fund what bills they had in time; and what bills remained, he believed to be in the hands of real holders. If these claims had been barred by law, he should be opposed to opening a door for their admission; but if not, he should wish to declare that they will now be permitted to fund. The funding law explained the various species of debt which were to be funded; afterwards came the act of limitation; then an act to authorize a re loan. If this act authorized officers of the Treasury to receive Continental bills, they should have done so. If the construction put upon the law by the officers of the Treasury, be wrong, a declaration should be made by that House to set them right. There are doubtless counterfeit bills, but he believed the persons who had heretofore been employed to detect these, were yet to be found. He had always thought the House went too far in depreciating, by an act of the Legislature, this species of money, and wished the House to be explicit whether it would be received or not.

Mr. SWANWICK remarked, that the situation of the House was one of the most curious they had yet been placed in. After a lapse of nearly twenty years from the emission of Continental money, they were called upon now to say whether it should be admitted to subscription as part of the Domestic Debt of the United States? Every body would pause at such a moment, and think a while on wars; on Government; on paper credit: subject to such revolutions; such strange incidents of time: Who, in 1776, could have predicted such a debate within these walls in 1796? But, since it has happened, let us inquire a little into the merits of this question.

The Public Debt.

A gentleman [my colleague, from Pennsylvania,] has remarked, that he draws, in point of debt, the line for the public as he would for himself. The general principle is doubtless a correct one; but there are exceptions. The public, with respect to money matters, is placed in the situation of the widow or the orphan. Frauds may be practised that it cannot guard against: hence the necessity of statutes of limitation. One hath been accordingly passed on this very subject, supposed to include the Continental money. The Treasury Department hath understood it so; the late Attorney General (Mr. Bradford) hath so interpreted it; but it is said, after all, to be doubtful: and so we, in order to clear away the doubt, are to pass a new clause to settle the doubt. Were there no tribunals, no Judiciary competent to settle the construction, it certainly is a delicate thing for us to unsettle the practice and opinion that hath prevailed. The statute of limitation is a delicate ark to touch. We have had before us many of our suffering officers and soldiers, brothers at least with the Continental money, in effecting our freedom; but these we have transmitted to the Committee of Claims, who usually report only that their claims are barred. Why not send the money to the same committee we send the Army to? What is there in the form or substance of these bills that entitles them to more respect? It is said they remain in the hands of the original holders, and have not passed into those of the speculators. Alas, sir! the wounds of our soldiers may at least be identified as much as the possessors of this money can be. If the law be positive as to one, shall it be doubtful as to the other? In the money, we are said to be in danger of counterfeits; but it is said some clerks are still alive who can vouch for the authenticity—what good fortune that time hath spared them! Suppose they had fallen with the numerous victims of the war, what would have become of this claim? In short, I am for supporting the Funding System and statutes of limitation as they are, without innovation—without alteration. This paper money hath passed away like that of the States before the Revolution; and since, as a kind of indirect tax, it hath fallen into a silent oblivion; let us not resuscitate it; let us not disturb its ashes. I am against the clause.

Mr. MADISON said it was the intention of the Legislature to apply the act of limitation to Continental money, as well as to other claims; and if it was to be admitted, other claims must be allowed. If a review of the act of limitation be proper, he would not wish to blend it with other business.

Mr. SWIFT acknowledged that it was his object to comprehend Continental money, which was in the hands of individuals; he made no reference to what was already in the Treasury. He wished to have the clause he proposed in the present act to prevent future misunderstanding; though he thought there could be no doubt of the meaning of former acts; indeed the officers of the Treasury construed them in favor of the bills in question for seven months. We had nothing to do with the consideration whether speculators or others had the bills; he thought they ought to be received.

Mr. BALDWIN touched upon the nature of the general and definite construction, and the manner of applying these to laws. He observed the quantity of counterfeits of the kind of paper in question was notorious. It was well known that during the war mills were employed to manufacture it; and upon that ground, he supposed it was excluded.

Mr. GILES was against a declaratory law, and against the clause brought into the House so suddenly. He thought the officers of the Treasury were right in their opinion; indeed it was confirmed by that of the Attorney General, whom they had consulted upon the occasion. He wished to disconnect this clause from the present bill, and to move that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House. If the statute of limitation can be justified any where, it is where it prevents abuses; and none could be subject to more than the admission of these bills. It would be impossible to detect counterfeits.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, that it appeared, from members on both sides of the present question, that the acts alluded to are so complicated as not to be clearly understood, which shows the necessity of making laws as plain and simple as possible. As some of these bills had been received since the passing of the act of limitation, he thought others ought to have the same privilege. He wished the clause, therefore, to receive farther discussion.

The question whether the clause proposed be added, being put, it was negatived. It was then moved and carried, that the bill be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The order of the day was called for on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom it was referred, "Whether further measures are necessary to reinforce the existing provisions for the Public Debt."

The House accordingly formed itself into a Committee of the Whole; and, after some remarks from Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. COIT, Mr. GALLATIN, Mr. SWANWICK, and Mr. HILLHOUSE, respecting a small variation in interest, to prevent the introduction of too many fractions, the business being allowed to be somewhat complex, it was moved that the Committee rise and ask leave to sit again.

This was agreed to, and soon after which the House adjourned.

II. OF R.]

Refunding Duties.

WEDNESDAY, February 10.

It being near 12 o'clock, and the SPEAKER having waited a considerable time for a quorum of the House, an order was made by the House that the members absent should be sent for, and the Sergeant-at-Arms was accordingly commissioned to summon the absentees. A quorum being at length obtained, the House proceeded to business.

The bill for further extending the time for receiving on loan the Domestic Debt of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

REFUNDING DUTIES.

The order of the day was called for on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the petitions of Jose Roiz Silva, Nehemiah Somes, James Strange, Israel Loring, & Co. And the report of the committee on the first petition being read, a number of observations were made by many members, for and against receiving this report, which was in favor of the petitioner, who prayed for the return of $2,521 60, which he over-paid in duty upon 197 pipes and 7 quarter casks of wine from the Island of Graciosa. The way in which he was stated to have done this was, no invoice arrived with his wine; and the Collector of the District charged the wine at 20 cents per gallon, as wine of a superior quality, and Mr. Silva having given bond for the securing of the duty, on condition of its being duly regulated when the invoice was received. When it did arrive, it appeared that the wine was of very inferior quality, and should have been charged only with a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem; but the Collector had transmitted his accounts to the Treasury of the United States, and, though he acknowledged the duty to be overrated, yet the account must be discharged, and he must look for relief from Congress.

The business having considerably occupied the time of the House, the SPEAKER observed it was become necessary to recommit the bill for the sake of order; for several members had spoken twice and others three times upon the question of receiving the report, some of whom had not spoken at all when the subject was before a Committee of the Whole.

Several members said, that, as all the circumstances of the case were before the House, there was no necessity for a recommitment. Others spoke in favor of it; and, the motion being put for a recommitment, it was agreed to.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, several certificates being then read to prove the inferior quality of the wine, one of which asserted it was no better than cider—

Mr. DEARBORN observed, that though Government ought to treat merchants with lenity and candor, yet that House ought to be cautious of opening a door to merchants, who might be inclined to be dishonest, to take advantages of the officers of the revenue. He should be freely disposed to grant relief to the petitioner if he was certain that in case it was not granted he would be the only sufferer. But he was not certain whether the wine had not been disposed of conditionally, with respect to the duty to which it was liable.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, it was true that their door was open to petitions, but they were seldom granted. It plainly appears that this man has paid upwards of $2,500 for duty more than he ought to have paid. The transaction appears free from fraud, and, therefore, he ought to have the money refunded. We ought either to do justice to petitioners, or shut our doors against them. To trifle with petitioners was an amusement he was tired of. The equity of Congress ought to give relief in all cases where it can be done with propriety. As much time was spent in discussing the merits of petitions as would satisfy many of the claims.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH thought this one of those cases upon which there could be no doubt. He stated it to be the practice of merchants to give bond for duties in the way Mr. Silva had done. The transaction throughout was perfectly fair. Upon what principle, then, can Congress refuse to do justice to this merchant? It has no plea but one. We have given (said he) so many leaves to withdraw, that we are unwilling to allow a prayer to be granted. No door is open to fraud by this act. Merchants do not expect to be treated with rigor by Government; they expect Government will rather show lenity towards them. The Collector at New York, he said, would have returned the over-paid duty, but it was not in his power. He himself had had two similar cases to this, only that his invoices arrived in time; but, if they had not, he should have thought it hard not to have had his petition to Congress for relief granted.

A member had supposed the wine might have been sold as paying 20 cents duty; but merchants must sell upon the same terms as their neighbors. Besides, Mr. Silva never thought of paying 20 cents per gallon for it, but always calculated upon the ad valorem duty. It was one of those claims we ought by all means to allow. We ought to keep friends with the merchants, for they are the collectors of duties for the United States. At present they do all they can for Government; but if they were to be set against it by ill treatment, it would be in their power to be of considerable injury to the revenue.

Mr. GILBERT saw no reason why the petitioner should not be relieved. He wished officers would confine themselves within the law.

Mr. BOURNE said, it appeared to him that the Collector did very wrong in stating the wine as Fayal wine, which seems to have been of so inferior a quality. He was not authorized to do this. A value should have been put upon it. It does not appear that the importer consented to this duty. Indeed, the Collector himself allows the justice of his claim. It would be unreasonable, indeed, that the petitioner should suffer for the irregularity of the Collector.

Mr. WILLIAMS could not hear the officer blamed in this business without justifying him—he did not believe him blameable. He doubted not that the merchant had consented to have the wine charged 20 cents per gallon, rather than give it up into the hands of the Collector until the invoice arrived. Certificates are brought to prove that 37 out of 197 pipes of wine were of inferior quality. But how is it clear that this is the wine he imported? Why not bring a certificate of more than 37 pipes? The wine never having been in the hands of the Collector, he could not know the quality. Eleven months had elapsed before the invoice arrived. It was possible for this to have been a second invoice, charged on lower terms than the wine was really purchased at. It has been said we ought to be cautious not to offend merchants. He allowed merchants to be serviceable to Government, but Government was also favorable to them in allowing them considerable credits. He wished not to be thought inimical to merchants; he wished only to prevent abuses.

MR. ISRAEL SMITH was of opinion that these were facts sufficient to show that the merchant was in no way to blame. If there was any culpability, it must attach to the officer and not to him. He should be sorry if the House did not feel inclined to grant relief to real sufferers.

MR. PARKER observed, so much had already been said upon the subject, that he felt reluctant to rise; but he wished to do away some objections which had been stated to this claim. It had been said that certificates had only mentioned 37 casks as being of inferior quality. He caused to be read a certificate from the Inspectors at New York, declaring that the wine imported in the vessel alluded to was no better than cider. It has been hinted that there might have been a collusion in the business. He did not think so. Relief ought to be granted. We should be more parsimonious than wise to reject this claim. Merchants, it was well known, always paid their duties with honor, and no advantage should be taken of them.

MR. GOODHUE, of the committee, rose to answer a question put to him by a member. He went through the practice of the custom-house upon these occasions, and justified the regularity of the whole proceedings.

The report was put to the vote, agreed to, and the Committee rose.

The House being resumed, agreed to the report of the committee.

The report of the committee on the petition of James Strange and Nehemiah Somes, for the remission of duties on a quantity of salt lost at sea and by fire, was read and agreed to. The petition was not granted.

The committee's report upon the petition of Israel Loring was next read, which called forth a number of observations from different members. He is stated to have imported a quantity of indigo from New Orleans, in July, 1794, on which the duties were secured according to law, and that in August following he re-shipped the said indigo for Amsterdam, under the inspection of one of the port officers, and his return was duly made to the Custom-house; and that in the transaction of this business every requisite was complied with except that of giving bond and taking the oath prescribed by law, that the indigo should not be re-landed in the United States; that the omission was in consequence of the great number of persons who were in the office at the time he went to give bond and take the oath, and the hurry of business he was then engaged in, and also conceiving that it might be done as well at any other time; by means of which omission the drawback on the exportation is not allowed, notwithstanding he has all the necessary proofs to show that the said indigo was bona fide landed and sold at Amsterdam. He, therefore, prays for the interposition of Congress, and that the drawback on the said indigo may be allowed.

The report of the committee was in favor of the petitioner; but several objections were urged against agreeing to it; the principal of which were that the law was positively against the claim, and that there was a possibility he intended to re-land the indigo in this country. In the course of the debate upon this claim considerable illustration was thrown upon the nature of bounties and drawbacks.

The report of the committee was finally agreed to; and then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 11.

POST ROADS FROM MAINE TO GEORGIA.

MR. MADISON moved that the resolution laid upon the table some days ago be taken up, relative to the survey of the post roads between the Province of Maine and Georgia; which, being read, he observed that two good effects would arise from carrying this resolution into effect; the shortest route from one place to another would be determined upon, and persons, having a certainty of the stability of the roads, would not hesitate to make improvements upon them.

MR. BALDWIN was glad to see this business brought forward; the sooner it could be carried into effect the better. In many parts of the country, he said, there were no improved roads, nothing better than the original Indian track. Bridges and other improvements are always made with reluctance whilst roads remain in this state, because it is known as the country increases in population and wealth, better and shorter roads will be made. All expense of this sort, indeed, is lost. It was properly the business of the General Government, he said, to undertake the improvement of the roads, for the different States are incompetent to the business, their different designs clashing with each other. It is enough for them to make good roads to the different seaports; the cross roads should be left to the government of the whole. The expense, he thought, would not be very great. Let a Surveyor point out the shortest and best track, and the money will soon be raised. There was nothing in this country, he said, of which we ought to be more ashamed than our public roads.

MR. BOURNE thought very valuable effects would arise from the carrying of this resolution into effect. The present roads may be much shortened. The Eastern States had made great improvements in their roads, and he trusted the best effects would arise from having regular mails from one end of the Union to the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS did not think it right for the revenues of the Post Office to be applied to this end. He acknowledged the propriety of extending the post roads to every part of the Union; he thought the House had better wait for the report of the committee to which business relative to the Post Office had been referred, which was preparing to be laid before the House.

Mr. MADISON explained the nature and object of the resolution. He said it was the commencement of an extensive work. He wished not to extend it at present. The expense of the survey would be great. The Post Office, he believed, would have no objection to the intended regulation.

After some observations from Mr. THATCHER, on the obtaining of the shortest distance from one place to another, and the comparing old with new roads, so as to come at the shortest and best, the resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report a bill authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to cause to be examined, and, where necessary, to be surveyed, the general route most proper for the transportation of the mail between —, in Maine, and —, in the State of Georgia, and to cause to be laid before Congress the result of such examination and survey, with an estimate of the expense of rendering such route fit, in all its parts, to be the established route of the post; the expense of such examination and survey to be defrayed out of the surplus revenues of the Post Office.

Ordered, That Mr. MADISON, Mr. THATCHER, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. SHERBURNE, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

INVALID SHIPS' REGISTERS.

The report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the petitions of sundry merchants of Philadelphia and New York, whose registers of ships had become invalid, in consequence of all the owners not having taken the oath required by the act concerning the registering of vessels, and transmitted the same within ninety days to the Collector, by which means their ships and cargoes are subject to the same duties as though their ships were foreign; stating that such omissions were, in some cases, unavoidable, from the absence of some of the owners, in others from ignorance of any such requisite, but in none from wilful negligence: they pray, therefore, relief from the very heavy extra duty. The report of the committee is in favor of the petitioners; which, being read, was agreed to; and this report, with those on the cases of Israel Loring and Jose Roiz Silva, were referred back to the committee to bring in the proper bills.

CASE OF CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SWIFT moved that the House take up the report of the Committee of Elections on the petition of MATTHEW LYON against an undue return of ISRAEL SMITH, a member of that House. The report being read, which was against the petitioner and in favor of the sitting member, a very long debate ensued.

Mr. W. SMITH objected to the form of the committee's report, and moved that it be recommitted. It appeared, he said, that depositions which had been transmitted by the petitioner had not been received as evidence. These depositions proved that the Sheriff had omitted to notify the time of election to the two towns of Hancock and Kingston, which contained fifty votes. This evidence being ex parte, and not admissible, the committee, finding that at a former election fifteen votes only came from these two places, and the sitting member having a majority of twenty-one votes in his favor, determined to set aside the petition, and declare Mr. SMITH entitled to his seat. But he was of opinion that the committee had not sufficiently gone into the merits of the case. He said there appeared to have been an enmity between Mr. LYON and the Sheriff, which had led him to neglect the notification of the election to the two towns above mentioned, in order to secure a return to his friend; and that this being the case, further evidence ought to be had, and the business fairly investigated.

Mr. ISRAEL SMITH supposed it would be expected he should say something on a subject in which he was so materially concerned. He thought the committee had done all they could in the business; and if Mr. LYON did not think proper, or had it not in his power to come forward with evidence which could be received, he did not think it the business of that House to hunt after it. Indeed, the petitioner had expressed his desire that the House should determine the case upon the evidence which he had given in. If all the circumstances of the case were before the House, no hesitation would be made to declare in his favor. The towns in question, he observed, were of little consequence; that they were unorganized places, and, therefore, excluded by the election laws of Vermont. He detailed, at considerable length, circumstances relative to the nature of carrying on elections in Vermont, and assured the House that he did not believe the petitioner had any expectations of gaining a seat in the House at present, but that he took these measures only to influence the people in his favor at the next election, for which purpose he had industriously circulated copies of his memorial. Mr. SMITH spoke at considerable length, and, in the course of his speech, touched upon the nature of personal and political rights. He concluded with hoping the House would not admit of any further delay in the business, but come to a decision.

Mr. BUCK was opposed to a recommitment. It was not the business of the House to search after evidence. It does not appear that there were votes sufficient in the towns of Hancock and Kingston to have turned the scale of the election, had they all voted in favor of the petitioner. And who, said he, can pretend to say how these men would have voted? They themselves cannot tell how they might have been induced to have voted then; and, therefore, no testimony can be obtained on this subject. Shall the election, then, be considered void, because there has been a defect in it? It appears by the law of Vermont that officers are to give notice to the people to meet to vote for members. In giving this notice it appears that two towns were omitted. The law does not say how the notices shall be distributed. In this case the Sheriff distributed them. All the towns which had notice met and voted, and Mr. SMITH was duly elected. Has Mr. LYON any better right to say the people who did not attend would have voted for him than Mr. SMITH? But though the writs did not reach these towns, they might have given their votes. But, the truth is, these persons do not complain, they are satisfied with the election. It is Mr. LYON only who complains; and, not having brought forward sufficient evidence, he saw no reason for going further into the business.

Contested Election.

Mr. W. SMITH took a view of the circumstances at length which had influenced the committee in their determination. He denied that the inhabitants of Hancock and Kingston knew the time of the second election; the time of the first was appointed by law, but of the period of the second they were ignorant, owing to the neglect of the Sheriff. Yet this, it was said, ought not to set aside the election. If this doctrine be admitted, said he, officers may omit giving notice to any town they please with impunity. He could not agree to the propriety of this principle, which cuts up by the roots the right of election. Mr. S. gave some account of the manner in which elections were managed in the quarter from which he came; and then insisted that if two towns might be omitted to exercise the right of election, four, six, or any other number might also be overlooked. If, he added, the fact were as the committee conceived it, that there were not so many votes in the two towns omitted to be notified, as might have given a majority in favor of Mr. LYON, then he should willingly agree to their report; but the fact appearing doubtful, he wished it to be recommitted, in order to ascertain the number of freemen in these two towns.

Mr. SWANWICK observed, that, if notification was essential to the legality of the election, no number of electors in the two towns would influence the election. It had been stated, he observed, by the member from Vermont, that there was a great extent of towns, and that it would be almost impossible that all of them should receive due notice. Two towns are said not to have voted. We are told these towns should have voted so and so; but no one can ascertain this. In a former election they threw in fifteen votes; in the present, it is said, they would have come forward with fifty. This is no evidence of what would have been the case—it is more fair to suppose there would have been no more than fifteen. The danger of Sheriffs being suffered to neglect giving proper notice to electors, from improper motives, has been mentioned. He saw nothing alarming in it. For what purpose, said he, shall we recommit this matter? It is said we may hunt up facts. Mr. LYON called upon us to do justice; he ought to have substantiated his evidence. Why has he not done this? But, because he has not done it, shall we do it for him? Shall we, instead of having our Sergeant-at-Arms attending upon us here, dispatch him to all parts of the Union? To effect this new business a balloon would be necessary to convey the messenger. He hoped the time of the House would be employed more profitably for the public than to pursue this affair. The burden of proof ought certainly to lie upon those who dispute the election. The petitioner expected it; but we say, No, we will have evidence. He thought this was wrong. We are judges in this manner, and not parties.

Mr. NATHANIEL SMITH wondered the sitting member should oppose the recommitment of this subject. He is in possession of his seat, and not remaining here upon expense. He saw no mischief which could result from delay. It has been said the petitioner can expect no more than a fair hearing. But all his testimony has been excluded. Shall we then refuse to give him a further opportunity of producing testimony that will be received? It is said the testimony he brings is immaterial. But let it be brought before the House, and then the House will be able to decide upon it. He thought the number of votes in the two towns not notified material. The omission of a single town is important when the state of an election is pretty evenly contested. If there be near fifty votes in these towns, they might have turned the scale of the election. It has been said we should be volunteers in this business; he thought not. The petitioner's testimony is excluded, unknown to him, and he should have time to produce other evidence. A contrary conduct would be unfair.

Mr. WILLIAM LYMAN was against a recommitment of this report. Mr. SMITH, he said, was entitled to hold his seat until proof was brought to supplant him. Mr. LYON states that the rights of the electors of Vermont are violated; but his petition is accompanied with evidence which is not admissible, and yet he has desired the House to determine decidedly upon it. This, it has been hinted, is not intended to set aside Mr. SMITH's seat, but for another purpose. Shall the House, then, solicit Mr. LYON to come forward? No. It was his opinion Mr. LYON had abandoned the matter. With respect to the two towns not having received notice of the election, no one could say where the omission lay. The inhabitants of those towns, it was possible, might have voted, though they had no notice.

Mr. GILBERT was in favor of the recommitment, that all the facts relative to the subject might be brought forward. It had been said that it was extraordinary that they should volunteer themselves to send for evidence into all parts of the Continent; he did not think this was likely to happen. He thought that the petitioner had not had an opportunity of coming forward with the necessary evidence, and whilst this was procuring, the sitting member would suffer no injury.

H. OF R.]

Contested Election.

Mr. MADISON observed, that it seemed to be supposed that they must either decide for the petitioner or against him. But the House might determine the business in this way, viz: That the evidence before it was not sufficient, and give further time for fresh testimony to be brought in, if the petitioner chose to proceed in his complaint. In acting thus, says he, we shall leave a door open to the petitioner without volunteering ourselves to gain evidence. If the report was recommitted this might be done.

Mr. GILES was surprised to hear the opposite opinions which were held on this subject. If he understood the matter, an election had been held, and that two towns, out of a great number, had not been notified; all the rest voted. He was not surprised that two were omitted to be notified, but that more were not omitted. If all the elections which had been had for the members of that House were examined, it would be found that few of them were so perfect. He was certain that his own was not. It appeared from some members that they were making great inroads into the right of election by a practice of this sort, because it was impossible the persons who did not vote, might have voted for the petitioner. He was of opinion Mr. SMITH was entitled to his seat. Gentlemen speak of the rights of election being injured; but, as it has already been observed, these people do not complain. He thought it extraordinary that the House should wish to hunt after objections to Mr. SMITH's claim to his seat. This was straining the business of election too far, for they could not be always perfectly regular.

Mr. FINDLEY observed, that every State had its own rules for managing elections. The notice given of elections was never general. It was difficult to make it so. The sheriff advertises, but many persons never see a newspaper. This House, he said, should always be open to complaints, but never invite them. As the petitioner has not chosen to come forward with his evidence in a proper way he should not wish to take any further notice of his petition.

Mr. CORR understood that the petitioner had commissioned a member of that House to inform him of the progress of this business.

Mr. VENABLE said, he had a letter from Mr. LYON, requesting him, if the sitting member changed his ground, to give him notice thereof. The sitting member had said that the two towns omitted to be notified were not organized; the committee, therefore wrote to the Treasury to know whether these towns were organized. The Treasury gave for answer that they were not represented in the State. It has been said that leave has been allowed in other cases to take evidence in any part of the country most convenient to the petitioner; but then the petitioner has come forward in person to make his averments. He thought the committee were justified in making the report they had done.

Mr. W. SMITH again complained that the petitioner had not been informed that his evidence would not be received, and went over nearly the same ground of argument which he had before urged against receiving the report of the committee.

Mr. GALLATIN was against the recommitment, not that he was perfectly satisfied with the report of the committee. Two reasons were given why a recommitment should take place: the first was because two towns were not notified; the second, because the kind of testimony given by the petitioner is insufficient. He was of opinion that notification was not essential, and that it was not necessary to send information to the petitioner that his evidence was insufficient. The inhabitants of Hancock and Kingston, he said, were not deprived of their right of voting by notification not being given. The law of Vermont fixed the day of election, and therefore notification was a mere matter of form. When the Sheriff neglects to give due notice, he might be prosecuted, it was true, for a breach of his duty; but this was never done. Elections, he said, were never wholly regular. In the last election for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, several places did not give their votes. They were not, he said, to send after petitioners to that House to remind them of what they ought to do; but those petitioners should attend upon their own business. The House can only decide upon the evidence before it. But if gentlemen thought more information on the subject necessary, the proper way was to postpone and not recommit the report.

Mr. G. having sat down, and it being near four o'clock, a call from different parts of the House was made for adjournment. The House therefore adjourned without coming to a resolution on the subject.

FRIDAY, February 12.

A message was received from the Senate, importing that the Senate had read three times and passed, with some amendment, the act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes; which was read.

Bills were brought in by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, read a first and second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday, for providing relief to merchants whose registers of ships were become invalid for want of complying with certain requisitions of the law; for granting a return of overpaid duties to Jose Roiz Silva; and to Israel Loring, to recover the drawback duties on certain indigo.

The committee to whom the petition of Nicholas Roosevelt, and others, was referred, reported in its favor, and it was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole for Tuesday.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The order of the day on recommitting the report of the committee on the election of ISRAEL SMITH, was taken up.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, there was no ground for committing the report, for the committee could not report in any other way than they had done.

FEBRUARY, 1796.]

Contested Election.

[H. OF R.]

He did not think the election had been altogether properly conducted; but said the House must not refine too much upon the business. The law of Vermont, he observed, showed that if the two towns in question contained more than twenty-one votes, that would not set aside the election. The time of the second election was expressly appointed in the law as well as the first, and these voters certainly knew when it took place. A defect in form, therefore, ought not to affect the legality of the election; if it were, the principle of the election would be confounded. It was not certain but that these voters might have attended at some other place, as no list of the votes was taken. The committee has sat two months on the business, and no evidence is brought forward that can be received; they knew of no public source from whence to learn even the number of the inhabitants in the two towns alluded to, and could gain no information without going to seek for it. It was improper for the committee to open a correspondence with Mr. LYON. To have done so, would have tarnished the honor of that House. It has been said commissions to receive evidence have been given in former cases; but these commissions had been applied for in person. He remarked there was no application from the people themselves who are said not to have voted, but from the man who wishes to have a seat here. He thought the committee had determined properly; for it was not certain that if Mr. LYON was sent after he would trouble himself farther in the matter.

Mr. TRACY observed, due attention ought to be paid to the forming of precedents. In all elective Governments, the importance of keeping them clear of corruption was one of the first considerations. Due attention, he said, was due to the practice of different States. He felt a delicacy with respect to the sitting member, for whom he had a high respect; but the principle of the question before them was every thing. LYON, he said, wrote to the committee, desiring if any farther information was wanting, that he might be informed. No information had been given him. It had been said he had abandoned the business; this did not look like it. He was influenced, he said, in advocating Mr. LYON's cause by no other motive than a wish to defend the rights of election. He might not come forward, it had been said, if he were applied to. True; but he should have an opportunity of doing so if he chose. If the two towns omitted to be notified contain more than twenty-one votes, and it be true that this circumstance ought not to influence the election, then there is no propriety in committing the report. He allowed that in the Vermont law, made specially for this election, the time was fixed, but he insisted that it was essential that the Executive power should give the necessary information.

It has been urged that none of the neglected voters have come forward; but they have sent certificates, which is a conclusive proof that they were not satisfied. Indeed the law was not obeyed in a very essential part, for it is surely essential that every corporation have notice of an election.

4TH CON.—11

To illustrate the bad effects of corruption in returning officers, he referred to Great Britain, who owed many of the mischiefs in her system to this source. Mr. T. dwelt a considerable time upon the nature and practice of elections in general, and applied them to the case of this contest. He said it certainly could be proved how many freemen there were in the two towns; and this being done it ought to set aside the election. It had been suggested that these men might have voted in other places; but this was not reasonable to suppose, and if it had been done, the practice would have been contrary to law.

Mr. T. next adverted to what had fallen from Mr. SWANWICK on this subject, and wondered that that gentleman, whose own election was contested, should come forward with such zeal in behalf of the sitting member, and endeavored to ridicule what he had said respecting impressing balloons in their service for the purpose of hunting evidence.

Mr. W. SMITH and Mr. SWANWICK rose together; but the latter giving way, Mr. SMITH proceeded to explain some parts of the election law of Vermont, which he alleged had been misstated, from which he read several clauses, and asserted the towns of Hancock and Kingston were incorporated and entitled to vote. He insisted upon the propriety of holding another election; and touched upon most of the grounds which had been gone over by Mr. TRACY and by himself yesterday. He spoke at length, and asserted that no part of the people should be deprived of their right of voting.

Mr. SWANWICK.—On this subject, Mr. SPEAKER, I had not intended to have spoken again: My own mind, and that of the other gentlemen of this House, seems so fully made up upon it, that I should not have again ventured to intrude on their time; but I owe to an honorable member from Connecticut to make him my acknowledgments for his remark on the zeal I have expressed already on two contested elections in this House; that zeal it was, sir, that first impelled me to quit a situation at least as eligible as that of any other member on this floor, to encounter all the abuse and vexation necessarily incident on public life; that same zeal the gentleman shall always witness on my part on every occasion wherein the interests of my country are in question. But the gentleman thinks I should have repressed it, because I had myself a contested election at stake. Sir, this would have been furnishing the finest triumph possible to my adversaries, because it would have been silencing me on these great public questions, and thereby rendering myself unworthy of the honor I have received of representing one of the first cities in the Union on this floor. No, sir, nothing shall prevent me, while I have a seat here, to deliver on any, or on all questions, where it may be my duty to do so, my sentiments in this House. Neither of these contested elections have besides any analogy to that in which I am engaged. In the case of Mr. RICHARDS, what was the objection? why, a motion was made to keep him a day longer out of his seat, in order that opportunity might be given for new matter to come against him. Has anything of this kind appeared since? No, sir. Then one of the representatives of this State would have been improperly delayed in taking his place, and this it was my duty to prevent. I have indeed been told, that those who wish to vacate my election, think on that occasion some favorable principles to them were established; if so, I have the merit at least of impartiality in getting them brought forward; but what has Mr. SMITH of Vermont's election to do with mine? there it is alleged two small towns did not receive notice of the election; but is it pretended that Dock ward, or Walnut ward, or any other ward of this city, were not notified of the election in my case? then, where is the analogy? So much, sir, for what respects me. I now proceed to the merit of this particular case.

Here is a petition from Mr. LYON, complaining of the undue election of Mr. SMITH, the sitting member. It has been referred to the Committee of Elections, but your committee have found it unsupported by any but ex parte evidence, not deemed by them to be competent. Well, what are we to do? are we to look after new evidence; are we to send our Sergeant-at-Arms into Vermont to solicit testimony to turn out, as it has been called, our own member? At this rate, I have stated he ought to have a balloon to transport his car; for nothing short of this could do it with sufficient celerity; a few disputed elections over the Continent, might employ, at this rate, all the time of Congress, of its committees, and its officers, in seeking and collecting evidence as to the seats of its own members, to the great waste of the public time and public money. Sir, when a petitioner comes here to complain of an undue election, he ought to come with the proof in his hand, not taken ex parte, or the petition should be dismissed; because the door is never shut to such applications, when the parties injured come properly prepared to substantiate their claims: much has been said of the rights of the election, and certainly, sir, no rights can be more sacred, or ought to be more respected; but there is also a right in the party elected; he ought not, on frivolous or idle pretences, or without sufficient proof, to be exposed to such law expenses in defending his seat, as his circumstances may disable him from discharging; for, at this rate, the competition for such seats must soon be confined to the opulent only, much to the prejudice of the equal system of our Government.

On the whole, I am against the recommitment of the report, and in favor of declaring Mr. SMITH duly entitled to his seat, because I see no proof to the contrary. I am always ready, however, to attend to any remonstrance that may afterwards come forward from the towns of Hancock or Kingston, or from Mr. LYON, when these shall be supported by substantial evidence taken after giving due and timely notice to the sitting member.

Mr. BUCK said a few words principally to correct a statement which he had made respecting the election law of Vermont.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said the petitioner never had had it in his power to take the necessary evidence; as there were no regulations in being at present for that purpose. He observed, there was a law wanted to regulate this subject. He might have appeared in person, it is true; but this would have been very expensive, as he might have been kept in Philadelphia all the Winter. Some way ought to be adopted for taking evidence; but he had no thought of despatching the Sergeant-at-Arms for the purpose of hunting it up. The principle was important, and ought to be established. The principle and facts were two things, which he wished to be separated, so that the House might give an unbiassed decision whether official notice was necessary to the legality of elections, or not.

Mr. GALLATIN agreed that it was essential to establish principles, and to secure the rights of electors. They should decide, he said, upon what was important or useful, and what was essential. With respect to two towns not being notified, their votes would have been taken, though they had not official notice; therefore notification is not essential; but it is said, the Governor of Vermont should have given notice, not only of the second election, but of the state of the poll at the first. This information would have been useful, but not essential; notice of the election was essential, but not the Governor's notice. There was sufficient ground to believe the day of election was known at these two towns, as a month had elapsed from the time of casting up the votes of the first election, and the holding of the second. There is no proof, even ex parte, to show this was not known. The consequence of this doctrine was, he said, that an officer could do no material harm; but, if a contrary position was taken, an officer might tire out the people by frequent elections, omitting continually to notify some place or other. By adopting the report, of the committee, he thought, they should best secure the rights of election.

Mr. SEDGWICK was persuaded, that if ever the time arrived when, instead of adhering to principles in contested elections, the House favored a sitting member at the expense of principle, the case would be alarming. He had attended to the arguments adduced on both sides of the question, and endeavored to profit by them. He thought them, however, more diffuse than truth required. It was said that the petitioner ought to be dismissed, because there was no evidence; but he said, there was no mode in which he could produce this evidence. If the petition was vexatious, it ought to be dismissed, but if the rights of election be intimately connected with it, the means ought to be provided for discussing the question, in order to prevent the operation of corruption in future. He thought if the arguments were compressed, they could not be mistaken; and for that purpose he took a short view of the whole subject, and concluded by saying that the two towns in question were called insignificant. He said they might go from towns to men, and say that such and such men being insignificant, their rights were not worth attending to. This was a doctrine he could not consent to. He spoke of frequent elections, which he disapproved, as tending to create political controversies amongst the people.

Mr. FINDLEY and Mr. GILBERT each said a few words on the same ground as yesterday; and an adjournment being called for, Mr. HILLHOUSE wished the House before it adjourned to take up the inquiry respecting the Treaty with the Indians; but several members seeming to wish an adjournment, the sense of the House was taken, and decided against the adjournment. The inquiry was then read by the SPEAKER, as follows, to wit:

"Can this House proceed to legislate upon the Treaty said to be made by General Wayne, with the Indians Northwest of the river Ohio, upon the information now before the House?"

But Mr. DEARBORN proposing a resolution instead of it, caused considerable debate; but the House at length agreed to the resolution to this effect:

"Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause to be laid before this House the Treaty mentioned in his communications to the Senate and House of Representatives, at the commencement of the session, to have been concluded with certain Indian nations Northwest of the Ohio."

This resolution was agreed to, and a committee of two appointed to carry it into effect.

MONDAY, February 15.

The committee appointed to wait upon the PRESIDENT to request a copy of the Treaty, said to have been concluded with the Indians, reported that he would order it to be laid before the House.

A bill for authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to borrow money for completing the buildings erecting in the Federal City, to sell any part of the same, &c., was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday.

It was moved that the Journals of the House be amended, by striking out the question submitted to the House, by the committee to whom it was referred, to bring in a bill respecting Indian affairs, "Whether the House can proceed to legislate on the Treaty said to be concluded by General Wayne with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio?" This motion was objected to, on the ground of no inconvenience arising from its remaining upon the Journals; for as it was postponed for the sake of getting rid of it, no member will ever think of calling it up; if he did, the House will certainly not consent to it.

Mr. MURRAY called up a resolution laid upon the table some days ago, to this effect, "That a committee be appointed to consider whether any and what alteration is necessary in the compensation of the officers of the Government of the United States," which, being put to the vote whether or not it should pass, was negatived; being thirty-seven for it, and forty-two against it.

It was moved, that the amendments made by the Senate to a bill for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, be taken up; which being done, was ordered to be committed to a select committee of three.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The order of the day being called for upon the report of the committee on the petition of MATTHEW LYON, against ISRAEL SMITH's election,

Mr. GILES said he had made a few remarks on this subject already, in which he gave his opinion against recommitting the report; but many gentlemen, for whose opinion he had the highest respect, having thought differently, and wishing that the subject might be so discussed that a pretty unanimous determination might be had upon it, he had now no objection to a recommitment.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought the committee had reported rightly; but in order to give Mr. LYON opportunity to come forward with evidence, if he chose to do so, he should move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed till the 15th of March.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, if a postponement took place, sufficient reason should be assigned for it. It was said it was to give the petitioner time; but, he observed, it did not appear clear, that if Mr. LYON proved that there were forty or fifty voters in the two towns omitted to be notified, that it would vitiate the election; and if not, it would be only a waste of time and expense to the petitioner, to put off the decision.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was also for a postponement. It was only just, he said, that a day should be appointed on which to hear the petitioner. A distant day; instead of the 15th, he would recommend the 29th of March, when, whether the petitioner chose to appear or not, the matter might be determined. At present, he said, the House only heard one side; further information was wanted. He wished the questions of law and fact might both be settled. For this purpose, he hoped the postponement would be adopted; and if no one brought forward a motion for ascertaining a proper method of taking evidence in the case, he would himself bring in a motion for that purpose.

A letter from Mr. LYON to the SPEAKER was called for and read, when

Mr. RUTHERFORD expressed himself pleased with the candor of the letter. He said he had not yet troubled the House upon this matter. It was a very nice subject. Representation (said he) is the right eye of the people. It appeared that the electors were very nearly balanced in their opinions of Mr. LYON and Mr. SMITH. He thought the House had done their duty in the matter, and that they had had enough of it. It was an old adage, he said, "That too much of a thing was good for nothing." He hoped Mr. SMITH would be allowed to possess his seat.

Mr. HEATH thought a great deal had been said unnecessarily on this occasion. He said much had been urged about the purity of elections. He was a friend to the purity of elections. Let

Mr. LYON show himself entitled; we ought not to seek for his evidence. His prayer was not supported; and why (said he) do gentlemen manoeuvre for three or four days in this business? He detested all ex-officio hunters of prosecutions. The House was fully possessed of the merits of the case. He did not entirely agree with the form of the report of the committee; but hoped the question would neither be re-committed nor postponed.

Mr. BOURNE was against the postponement, and in favor of a recommitment, that the matter might be fully developed.

Mr. VENABLE [one of the committee] said, the committee would again go into the business if the House desired it, but that they could do no more without further evidence. He was also against a postponement. At the commencement of the session, the House gave the committee power to take evidence in any way they pleased; this gave Mr. LYON as much information as a resolution today would give him. If the House agreed to a postponement, he hoped it would give special instructions for further proceeding in the affair.

Mr. DEARBORN said there were different opinions on this subject; to him there appeared only one proper way of proceeding. When a person petitions against the seat of a member, if there be no agreement to the contrary, he ought to come forward in person. Without this, the House cannot, with propriety, go into the subject. Two or three months were passed, and nothing was done by the petitioner. It is said there is a possibility of there being more evidence. This is nothing to the House. He wished the matter neither to be committed nor postponed.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH wished to watch over the purity of elections, and always to aim at perfection in their Government. No election was ever altogether regular. He did not think the Sheriff was partial to Mr. SMITH, or that there was any corruption in the case. Out of the electors who were said not to have voted, twelve were in favor of Mr. S. at a former election. The people had already been called together twice to make choice of a member; he hoped they would not have to meet a third time. He was for adopting the report.

Mr. NICHOLAS explained his view in making his motion for postponement; he did not think it necessary to issue a commission for taking evidence; it was enough to postpone the subject to give Mr. LYON an opportunity of coming forward if he chose to do so.

Mr. PAGE said there was a material difference between recommitting and taking time to reconsider the subject. It was not their business to tell the petitioner how to come forward; but to give him time. A postponement would give him this time.

Mr. KITTERA observed, the House could not make rules respecting a subject of this kind, until a controversy took place. He mentioned several difficulties which arose in legislating on this subject; but thought they might make regulations on a matter of this sort, without the concurrence of the other two branches of the Legislature. This being the case, how will the postponement operate? Will it have the effect to bring forward evidence? No. Rules for taking evidence must first be fixed, and a recommitment would have this effect.

The question being called for, the House divided: for the postponement till the 29th of March, thirty-six; against it, fifty-two.

Mr. GILBERT said he had voted against the postponement; but as evidence had been offered and not admitted, he wished the report to be re-committed, that the petitioner might have an opportunity of properly substantiating it.

Mr. COOPER thought it absolutely necessary, that every town in a district should have notice of an election, and that it was of consequence to establish this principle; for what was the practice to day, would be a precedent to-morrow.

The motion for a recommitment being put, it was negatived—47 being for it, and 49 against it.

This motion being lost, Mr. GILBERT moved, that the sense of the House should be again taken on the postponement, as many members, he was persuaded, voted against the motion when put before, from the expectation of the report being re-committed. The question was, therefore, put and carried—being for it 49, against it 44.

TREATY WITH INDIANS.

A communication was received from the Department of State, with a copy of the Treaty concluded with certain Indians on the Northwest of the Ohio; which, being moved to be referred to the committee appointed to bring in a bill respecting Indian affairs,

Mr. GALLATIN said, he thought it unnecessary to refer the Treaty to the committee. It was enough for them to know that it was on the table. He wished it to be committed to a Committee of the Whole, as it was necessary appropriations should be made for carrying it into effect. He moved, therefore, that the Treaty, and papers accompanying it, be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. Agreed to.

LAND OFFICE NORTHWEST OF THE OHIO.

Mr. HARPER called for the order of the day on a bill for opening a Land Office, for the sale of lands in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio. The House accordingly formed itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MÜHLENBERG in the Chair.

Mr. VAN ALLEN expressed his opinion that the House might have greatly simplified the business, by having the lands properly surveyed and persons employed to sell them. The expenses of carrying the present bill into effect would be very great. He thought it best that the lands should be sold at public vendue. He moved that the first section be struck out.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, there never was a bill of greater importance than that before the House. He said that House were the fathers of the country, and that they were about to set out new farms to their sons, by doing which he hoped they should destroy that hydra, speculation, which had done the country great harm. Let us, said he, dispose of this land to original settlers, 150,000 families are waiting to become occupiers of this land, (a member called out for his authority, when he said there was more than that number.) The bill before the House, he said, was exceptionable. It would not, he said, defeat the speculators. The monsters in Europe, added he, are ready to join the monsters here, to swallow up the country. He said this tract of country should be disposed of to real settlers, industrious, respectable persons, who are ready to pay a reasonable price for it, and not sold to persons who have no other view than engrossing riches. He had made out a rough plan, he said, of what struck him as proper regulations. He was proceeding to read the whole of them, when the Chairman reminded him that the first section only of the bill was under consideration. He said he was against the whole bill, and might as well then express his sentiments upon it. He said he was a mere child of nature, an inhabitant of the frontier, as untaught as an Indian; but he had some faint glimmerings of reason, and he was confident his plan would answer the desired purpose. After explaining and dwelling some time on the merits of it, he concluded with saying, he loved his country and all honest men, but hated speculators, and hoped the present bill would not pass.

Mr. FINDLEY said, it was a difficult matter to legislate well on a subject of such extent as this bill comprehended. He enumerated several defects in the bill before the House. The duty of superintendents, he said, was not sufficiently explained: there was no responsibility in the surveyor; no salary appointed. By these omissions, a part of Legislative duty is transferred to agents. It becomes the Legislature, said he, to improve the advantages of nature; this bill does not do this. He spoke of the necessity of properly dividing bottoms, water, &c., into the different divisions. He said the size of the tracts was too large. It will be said they may be divided between a number of farmers, who might agree to purchase in company. He showed the inconveniences attending a practice of this sort, and said it was inviting people into a snare, which would cast dishonor upon Government. He thought the imperfections of this bill could only be remedied by a new bill. He wished a plan to be adopted that should divide bottoms, and have more precision in the surveys. Many confusions he said, had arisen in all new settlements, which might have been prevented with care. He said a surveyor had great power, and ought to be responsible. He touched upon the different kinds of surveying, and said, magnetical surveys were not always to be depended upon. Delay is objected to, but it is better, said he, to delay the business for a time, than pass a bad bill.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) observed, that the objections which had fallen from the member just sat down, were of importance, but that this was not the proper time to consider them. He wished to be informed by the member who proposed to strike out the first section of the bill, whether he meant to substitute another section in its place.

Mr. VAN ALLEN said, he meant to propose a new clause, and objected to the bill generally. He thought the Treasury and State Departments might undertake the business. He objected to the present survey. He said he thought of dividing the land into parcels of six miles square, which might again be subdivided; that exact surveys of the land should be taken, upon which should be marked the qualities of the land, the rivers, springs, &c., with great precision; that these should be published. If this was not done, he said, purchasers in general would not know anything of what they purchase, and the country would be involved in law suits. He was of opinion the present bill would prove a very expensive one; objected to the terms of payment, and the mode of selling the land, and thought the evils of it could only be remedied by a new bill.

Mr. COOPER was nearly of opinion with the last speaker. He said he also had prepared the sketch of a bill.

Mr. NICHOLAS acknowledged, though he was one of the committee, that he was very imperfectly acquainted with the subject. He wished to hear gentlemen make specific propositions, and not to hear of new bills. Many objections might be urged against any bill which might be proposed. He hoped full liberty would be given to members to express their sentiments, which might be proposed as clauses to be added to the bill, and that they might not be confined in their discussions to any particular section. One great object of the committee was to get the highest price for the land, and for this purpose they thought it necessary to make the titles sure. It has been said that the land should be laid out according to water, &c.; he thought this impossible to be done, so as to make titles certain. He trusted many of the objections stated might be remedied without a new bill. He thought the offices alluded to could not do the business, though he thought there were offices under Government that might do it; and hoped every member would speak his sentiments fully upon the subject.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH thought it improper to discuss the principle of the bill at present, until they had examined its parts. It was now the time, he said, to propose alterations and amendments. When the bill is matured and reduced to form, then will be the time for discussing the principle. The first section he thought proper for any bill, and he hoped the motion for striking out would be withdrawn.

Mr. PAGE was of opinion the first clause was of the greatest consequence; he hoped it would be open to discussion. He had taken a view of the whole bill, and thought it a bad one, and the sooner they entered upon a discussion of it the better. He thought a better bill might be formed, but wished rather to bring on the discussion than to enter on it himself.

Mr. MURRAY wished the question of policy had first been agitated whether it was necessary to open a Land Office at all. He thought it should have been best to have laid off the land in ranges of lots, and when one range was patented and settled, to take another, until the whole was disposed of.

H. OF R.]

Contested Election.

Mr. W. SMITH said the committee did not think it necessary to agitate the question of propriety respecting the establishment of a Land Office; the House having authorized them to bring in a bill for the purpose they thought that sufficient. The committee for preparing a plan for reducing the National Debt, proposed a sale of the Western lands. The question was, whether the present bill was the best that could be formed for the purpose. He believed it liable to objections, as he believed any bill would be that was proposed. The committee, he said, had thought well of this bill. With respect to the motion for striking out the first clause, he thought it now improper, until we know in what manner the lands are to be sold; and when we learn what duties the officers will have to perform, we shall best know who can do them. The second clause, he said, related to the surveying of lands; the third clause is that which has been objected to with respect to the size of tracts. In a former bill it was proposed that the lands should be divided into tracts of six miles square; but the committee thinking these too large, determined upon having them three miles square only. These are yet thought too extensive. He said he wished to hear every objection that could be urged against the bill, and should be open to conviction. The committee had two objects in view—to raise revenue, and to sell the land in such lots as would be most convenient to purchasers. It was once thought of selling the lands by auction; but it was feared to have done so, would have been to open a door to speculators. They determined, therefore, to fix it at the price of two dollars an acre, and to sell no lands at present which would not bring that price, because, hereafter, when settlements are made, inferior land will command the same price. These were their sentiments, but they wished the subject to receive full discussion.

Mr. VAN ALLEN withdrew his motion, and the Committee rose and asked leave to sit again; which was granted.

TUESDAY, February 16.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said he wished, before the order of the day was gone into, to propose to the consideration of the House a resolution which he yesterday mentioned as his intention of bringing forward, if he was not anticipated by any other member, for regulating the taking of evidence in case of Contested Elections. He read the resolution, which went to make legal all evidence taken before any judge, justice, mayor, &c., in a way therein described, and wished it to be taken into consideration immediately, supposing that no objection would be made to the enacting a regulation so necessary for settling disputed elections.

Mr. BALDWIN said he should be against passing the proposed resolution immediately. It was a matter of considerable importance. Besides, to pass it now, would seem as if it was intended for an invitation for Mr. LYON to come forward; and he apprehended that most gentlemen who voted for a postponement of that business did not mean to take any further steps in it, except Mr. LYON himself personally solicited it.

Mr. GILES thought the resolution proposed was of serious import. When the question was formerly agitated whether that Assembly could make its own regulations for taking evidence on Contested Elections, it occasioned considerable debate, and the motion was negatived. He was at that time, as he now was, of opinion that the House had the power. But he thought the question ought to be matured, and not passed on a sudden. The regulation should be general, and not fitted for any particular case. He should move that the consideration of the resolution, therefore, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on a distant day.

Mr. SEDGWICK thought this resolution should be committed to a select committee, which was better calculated for the business than a Committee of the Whole. He was of opinion with the gentleman who spoke last, that the House was competent to make its own regulations with respect to controverted elections. He said the determination upon Mr. LYON's case had been put off till the 29th March. Some way ought to be pointed out in which he might bring forward evidence, or the postponement would be of no service to him. He hoped, therefore, no more time would be taken than necessary to mature the consideration of the measures, that the proposed regulations might apply to the case of Mr. LYON.

Mr. BALDWIN said the resolution should be referred to a Committee of the Whole. He doubted whether Congress could make these regulations go beyond the present session. It had been said no delay should be allowed, as it would prevent Mr. LYON's having the advantage of the regulations. He said he wished the present resolutions to apply to no particular case, but to be general, and then no mischief could arise from delay.

Mr. VARNUM urged the impropriety of making regulations for Mr. LYON's case, when he did not wish them. It was the wish of several members of that House, but not of himself, unless, indeed, he could have a certainty of displacing Mr. SMITH. Mr. LYON very well knew what evidence was necessary; he chose to act differently, and he should abide the consequences. This resolution goes to the admission of ex parte evidence. If it was necessary for the House to make a general rule, it was well; but if gentlemen wished only a regulation in favor of Mr. LYON, he hoped they would have the candor to say so.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was indifferent as to what committee the subject was referred. It had been said that Mr. LYON had given up the contest, except invited to renew it. He thought a principle was involved in this consideration, which he wished to be cleared. Mr. LYON, he said, wanted a full and fair investigation, and he ought to have it. No evidence, he said, was legal, except taken according to a rule approved by the House. It has before been a question whether we could make these regulations. It required discussion. His motive for bringing forward the motion was, that Mr. LYON might have the means of coming forward; but he had been cautious in wording it, that the House might not appear to be volunteering in the cause of MATTHEW LYON, though he owned he did not himself feel any delicacy upon the subject.

The SPEAKER observed that it was out of order to bring into view the Contested Election business, and was about to put the motion, when

Mr. BUCK informed the House that he had that morning received a letter from Mr. LYON, by which it appeared that he intended to prosecute the business of his memorial, and that though he [Mr. BUCK] was opposed to a recommitment or postponement of the report of the Committee of Elections, yet, as the House had declared in favor of postponement, for the obvious purpose of giving Mr. LYON an opportunity of further investigating facts, he considered it his duty, and the duty of every member, now to endeavor to forward that investigation, by removing out of the way every obstacle to it; and as the proposed resolution then before the House contemplated a provision for taking evidence in all cases of Contested Elections, it was of consequence that it should be adopted as soon as possible, that Mr. LYON might take the advantage designed by it. He further said, that though he really believed that LYON had no serious intention of prosecuting his memorial when he first sent it forward; yet, since he had found that Congress had given it a serious attention, he was persuaded LYON now intended to follow it up.

Mr. HARPER said the time was fixed for finally determining the contest between Mr. SMITH and Mr. LYON; to adopt a distant day, therefore, for the consideration of the proposed regulations, would be to deprive Mr. LYON of the opportunity of substantiating his evidence. He hoped, therefore, a distant day would not be fixed upon, as the regulation was certainly intended to include his case.

Mr. HARPER was proceeding to remark upon different observations which had fallen from members in the course of debate, with respect to the late contest, when the SPEAKER reminded him that if such observations had been made, they were out of order, and any remarks upon them would be equally so.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH thought the House should make the necessary regulations, and let Mr. LYON learn them as he could; he would soon be informed, he doubted not, of their determinations. The Committee of Elections, he said, were discharged from the subject. He thought a special regulation should be made for this particular case, and not a general rule.

Mr. GILES regretted whenever a general rule arose out of a particular case; it too often was warped by it. He wished every fact which could be brought in Mr. LYON's case to be heard. If gentlemen would bring forward a particular rule for taking evidence in this case, it should receive his support. For the discussion of the general principle he wished, and should vote for a distant day to be fixed, as he apprehended much difference of opinion would take place on the occasion.

Mr. GILBERT was for a general rule that would embrace all future cases as well as the present.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH rose to inquire if the general regulation was put off to a distant day, whether it would be in order to bring forward a motion to suit the case of Mr. LYON? He was answered by the SPEAKER it would be perfectly in order.

The question was then put for postponing the motion until Monday week, and negatived—being for it 31, against it 50. It was then put for Monday next, and negatived—being for it 39, against it 42. It was then put for Thursday, and carried without a division.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH then moved "that the Committee of Elections be instructed to describe the mode of taking evidence in the case of MATTHEW LYON;" which, after several observations from different members, was put to the vote and negatived—being for it 36, against it 43.

NORTHWESTERN LAND OFFICE.

The order of the day being called for on the bill for establishing Land Offices, and the House having formed itself into a Committee of the Whole—

Mr. WILLIAMS said there was a diversity of opinion on the bill before the Committee. It embraced two objects, as had before been observed, to raise money and invite settlers. He did not think this bill was calculated to encourage settlers. They could not become first purchasers, but must have the second or third transfers. It behooved the House, he said, to deliberate well the subject. It had been said, if the land were divided into small parcels, the expense attending the disposal of it would swallow up the price. He trusted, however, a mode would be devised of bringing double the sum into the Treasury that would be raised by the present bill, and, at the same time, encourage settlers. He hoped, therefore, to attempt to effect this would not be deemed a waste of time. The Surveyor General, he said, should be a man of abilities and integrity, and well acquainted with the country. When this officer is appointed, the bill should be so framed as that he should be directed to lay the land out in small lots, by the course of the rivers, pointing out every situation which he thinks likely to be of importance. He thought the best mode of selling would be by auction, and that a longer time should be given for payment. Let the Surveyor General or Superintendent first explore the country, and cause to be surveyed into small lots all the places which, from the locality and situation, would command an immediate settlement, (reserving all salt-springs and places of importance to be hereafter disposed of;) to these small lots let there be lots of larger denominations also laid out, so as to accommodate the purchasers of the small ones—these to be sold together. Then cause to be laid out the next most valuable places, to be run off in squares of ten miles, which would make one hundred lots of six hundred and forty acres each. Four lots in the centre of each tract should be reserved for public use. Accurate surveys of these lots should be taken. This plan would enable settlers to be purchasers in the first instance. The land, thus divided, would sell for a higher price, and it would be settled with freeholders. On the contrary, if the present bill be enacted, the land will be engrossed by speculators. The method he recommended, he said, had always been found to answer best in the settlement of a new country.

The plan had been acted on in the State which he had the honor to represent, and land much inferior to this had been sold with ease at two dollars per acre. The expense of disposing of the land in this way, he said, would be somewhat greater, but this would be amply repaid by the price it would command. When the Surveyor had finished the survey of a certain part, persons might be employed to sell it, and so proceed progressively. He should waive any further remarks at present. He thought it necessary to throw out these hints for the use of the Committee, and hoped other gentlemen would deliver their sentiments freely upon the subject.

Mr. FINDLEY, in order to bring the subject more fully before the House, moved a clause to this effect: "that the Superintendent to be employed under this act, shall be well skilled in surveying, and shall be paid — per annum, out of the moneys arising from the sale of the lands, and that he shall form boundary lines to be run between the territory belonging to the State of Connecticut, the lands secured to the Indians by Treaty, and the territory of the United States." These lines, he said, would be necessary to be run before anything be done, that the territory might be ascertained. He wished to have an officer responsible, and to ascertain what his salary should be.

Mr. GREENUP did not see the necessity of employing two Superintendents. If two were employed, why not have a commission in every place? He should propose to strike out two, and put one. He thought, indeed, of moving to strike out the whole of the first clause, and introduce another in its place. He was against the whole of the bill, but particularly the third clause, which proposes lots to be three miles square, so that no payment will be received of less than 5,760 dollars down, and at the end of a year, a like sum must be advanced. The land must, therefore, go into the hands of monopolizers or not be sold at all. Mr. GREENUP said the unappropriated lands in the country were the property of the whole community. In his opinion, districts should be first laid off; when these were sold, more might be offered. If two millions of acres a year could be disposed of, that would be sufficient. There was land, he said, (alluding to the salt-springs,) too valuable to be put into the hands of speculators at two dollars per acre. He objected to the mode of paying the money for the lands, and reprobated the bill in general.

Mr. KITCHELL said, it was necessary to confine remarks to specific parts of the bill, and not to the whole. The Committee had done the best they could, but would be glad to have their labors improved. Four or five different systems were already offered to the House, to every one of which, perhaps, as many objections might be raised as against the bill under discussion.

Mr. GALLATIN wished to know whether it would be in order to postpone the consideration of the first section of the bill, to take up the second and third: the first section was of no great consequence.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he had before wished this mode to be adopted. He thought it would be best to proceed to the consideration of the second section.

The Chairman having read the second section—Mr. GALLATIN observed, that two remarks had been made which applied to these sections. The proposed mode of surveying, it had been said, would throw out the natural boundaries of the country. The next objection was to the largeness of the tracts. Two amendments which he should propose would bring these two questions before the House; and if the amendments be thought material, the bill will of course be recommitted. His motion would leave the power of the Surveyor more discretionary; that the words "parallel lines, at the distance of six miles from each other," be struck out; that the Surveyor shall put the lands into such lots as may be most convenient, to be bounded by lines due North and East, or by natural boundaries. In this case, the lands must be surveyed before they are sold, and the lines may be run parallel on by rivers.

This motion being put into form, and read by the Chairman—

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) wished the amendment to be made more correct with respect to the boundary lines.

Mr. NICHOLAS also objected to the amendment, as not being clearly expressed.

Mr. GALLATIN explained.

Mr. HAVENS said, before he could give his vote on the amendment, he wished to know the size of the lots into which the land was proposed to be divided. He said, the State of New York held out an example for them to follow. No State had had more to do in settlements than it. That State had directed their lands to be laid out in squares by means of ideal lines, and found little embarrassment from this plan. He thought it very necessary to ascertain, first, in how large tracts the land should be parcelled—who is to sell it—to ascertain the powers of officers, and the discretion to be allowed them; and, also, that maps be taken of the land.

Mr. NICHOLAS remarked, that if the country was not square, the lines could not be run in squares; but, he said, there was no necessity for going into arrangements for the sale of every foot of land they had to dispose of. Fractional parts might remain unsold with Government. He took notice of the uncertainty of natural boundaries. He thought a discretion in an officer might be used to greater advantage than they could possibly give directions to him for laying out the lands. No officer, he said, could be expected to go into a critical examination of different kinds of soil, situation, and description of water, &c.; nor could it be expected that Government could make the same advantages in disposing of this land as if it were private property. Large capitals, he said, were necessary in a business of this kind. There was great difficulty, he observed, in starting farmers, by any advantages which might be offered, from situations in which they were placed. It might be expected, that at first, large purchases would be made by moneyed men, upon which a profit would be made. But if the land were to be divided into small lots, there would be no encouragement for men of property to come forward: the best land would be bought by farmers, and the rest left. He was fully of opinion, that the first purchaser of the land was not likely to be the cultivator.

The House calling for a rise of the Committee, leave was asked to rise and sit again; which was granted. Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 17.

THE CANADIAN REFUGEES.

It was moved that the report of the committee on the petition of certain Canadian refugees be taken into consideration, for the purpose of committing it to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LIVINGSTON thought this business ought not to go to the Committee on Claims, as a promise of a grant of lands had been made to these claimants by a former Congress; and therefore it was not the justice of their claim which was to be considered, but whether the promise made them should or should not be fulfilled by the present Congress.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, there was no difference, in his opinion, betwixt a claim for land and a claim for money. All claims, he said, should be referred to the Committee of Claims, and no other.

Mr. LIVINGSTON requested that the reports of a former Congress might be read; which, being done, he insisted upon this case being totally different from ordinary claims. He said, the sufferers whose case was under consideration, were men who had sacrificed much in the service of this country, and that, in consequence of the justice of their claims, a former Congress had positively promised them a recompense of a grant of land; they had therefore only to say whether this should or should not be done. He was desirous that the business should be expedited, as these men had been a long time kept from what they were justly entitled to.

A report of a committee in February, 1793, was called for and read.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought it best for the report to be recommitted, in order to determine what quantity of land should be granted to these persons. He said he was well acquainted with many of these persons, who were very deserving men; many of whom had given up their fortunes to engage in the service of this country. The State which he represented had recompensed many of them, and he trusted the House would not hesitate to carry into effect the promise of a former Congress in their favor.

Mr. GILES said, the report before the House contained sufficient information to proceed upon, which ought to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House. He did not think the business proper to go either to the Committee of Claims or a select committee. If no fresh testimony was likely to be adduced, he should move the report of 1793, as a foundation to act upon. Some compensation, he said, should certainly be made to these sufferers for the sacrifices which they had made of their persons and fortunes; or, if the country should hereafter have need of like sacrifices, with what reason could they expect them to be made?

Mr. GREENUP observed, there was another report in favor of these sufferers made on the 1st April, 1794, which was never acted upon. He thought it best that this business should be referred to some committee to be considered. He said it was time these claims were satisfied. A select committee might soon decide upon their merits. He had other papers in his possession which would throw light upon the subject. He thought the report should be disagreed to, and committed for amendment.

The motion was put for committing the subject to a Committee of the Whole, and carried—45 against 21.

Mr. GREENUP then moved that the report of the 1st April, 1794, on this subject, be referred to the same committee. Agreed to, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. LYMAN moved for a reconsideration of the resolution postponing the determination upon the case of MATTHEW LYON's petition against the election of ISRAEL SMITH to the 29th of March. Mr. LYON having announced his intention to proceed in the business, he should wish the report of the committee to be recommitted.

Mr. S. SMITH hoped the House would agree to the report of the committee; and, if in order, he would make a motion to that effect.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, if the gentleman who spoke last had made up his mind on the subject, he had not, and was not prepared to determine so suddenly on a matter of importance. He thought it improper to put such a resolution, and hoped it would be withdrawn.

Mr. S. SMITH understood that his motion was superseded by the motion for commitment, or he should have wished it to have been put. He said gentlemen repeated, day after day, the same sentiments upon this business, in a tiresome manner, and that it had already occupied too much of the time of the House.

The resolution for postponement was rescinded, and the report of the Committee of Elections was recommitted to the same committee.

NORTHWESTERN LAND OFFICE.

The order of the day being called for, on the bill for opening land offices for the disposal of lands in the Northwestern Territory, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and the amendments of the 2d and 3d sections, offered by Mr. GALLATIN, being under consideration—

Mr. FINDLEY observed, that there were different opinions on the subject before them: some were for making complete surveys; some for large and some for small tracts. Surveys, he said, should not destroy natural boundaries; and the fewer parallel lines, the less destruction of this kind. It was not necessary, he said, to say much upon the size of tracts. A gentleman had said, it was necessary to sell the land in large quantities. He was glad to hear members express themselves so clearly. His views were directly opposite: he was for encouraging farmers, and against engrossing. He wished every man to have an opportunity of purchasing fifty or one hundred acres. They ought not only to keep a wholesale but a retail store. It was the interest, he said, of every country to encourage freeholders: they are interested in supporting the laws. This, he added, is not only good for Government, but it tends to make the people happy. Land is the most valuable of all property, said he, and ought to be brought within the reach of the people. He next spoke upon the subject of boundaries, and answered the objections which had been made against taking natural ones. He was for the amendment, and trusted all those who wished to encourage industrious farmers would also vote for it.

Mr. GALLATIN wished to withdraw his motion, in order to introduce one of greater importance. He did not think the present one material to be determined upon at present. He proposed to strike out part of the second section, and to add the following: "to cause one-half of the townships to be subdivided into tracts of, as nearly as may be, — miles square, and the other half to be divided into tracts not exceeding — acres, nor less than —." This, said he, will bring into discussion and to the determination of the committee whether they will agree to the selling of part of the land, at least, in small and convenient farms.

Mr. RUTHERFORD thought the bill altogether improper. If he asked a fine painter to present him a peacock, and he painted him a bat, he should tell him, that though he might be a fine painter, yet he had totally mistaken him. He was proceeding to object to the whole bill, when he was called to order, and concluded by saying he was for the amendment.

Mr. HAVENS did not see the propriety of having large and small tracts: he wished all the land to be in small tracts. Men who have large capitals will have always an advantage over those who have but little property, though the land be in small tracts. He thought a tract of one mile square large enough. He was against the bill altogether, and thought a special committee should be appointed to bring in a bill that would be more likely to answer the desired purpose. He read some propositions which he had prepared on the subject, which recommended the allotting of tracts into six miles square, and subdividing them again into lots of one mile square.

Mr. DAYTON said, there was an impropriety in moving to recommit the bill before it had received discussion. The amendments proposed by a member from Pennsylvania were in order, and should be first considered. If every member were to propose different systems, there would be no possibility of proceeding in the business. The object of the last speaker might be obtained by an alteration in the second section. It was easy to divide one mile square into tracts of 160 acres each. In the third section a subdivision might be proposed, if members pleased. He touched upon the subject of natural boundaries, and said he should be against the amendment, except he heard it explained more to his satisfaction.

Mr. GALLATIN declared his reason for bringing forward the amendment was, to have the important matter settled respecting the size of tracts. It was immaterial whether this amendment was introduced in one section or another. The bill, he doubted not, would be recommitted, and then the committee might place it where they pleased. He considered that there were three classes of purchasers; the first were moneyed men, who were commonly called speculators, who were not likely to settle upon the land they purchased, but who would sell it again for a profit; the second class were farmers of small property, who would purchase and settle upon the land; the third class were men who have not money to purchase, except the land was sold much below its value. He said there was no object of so great importance to the United States as the extinction of the curse of the country, the Public Debt, and no class of citizens would be more benefited by this extinction than the poor. It was in the power of the United States, he said, to redeem and extinguish the whole Debt in ten years. He considered that a certain proportion of farmers of small property, who are able to pay for land, and who wish to remove from their present situations backward, would purchase: he wished to give them an opportunity. But there remains another class, said he, who are likely to purchase large tracts; and this is the only class from whom poor persons can get lands. The farmer, he observed, would not buy land to sell. These poor persons must purchase on long credit, and pay out of the profits of the land. Many parts of the United States, it was true, had been peopled by persons of no property at all; but they got their land for nothing. After a term of fifteen years' possession, the State, indeed, called upon them for some trifling consideration. The purchasers of large lots may, it is true, choose whom they will credit, and what profit they will have; but this must be so. The money, by these means, would be got into the Treasury, and therefore he thought the amendment proper, by dividing the land into two classes. If the whole, he said, were to be divided into small tracts, persons would choose here and there, and prevent men of property from purchasing large tracts lying together. Mr. G. concluded, with observing, he might be mistaken in some things, in others he thought he was not, having paid much attention to the subject. It was necessary, he said, to make some compromises, in order to reconcile different opinions.

Mr. NICHOLAS was confirmed in his opinion that speculators would be of service in the disposal of this land. He was willing that the plan proposed by the amendment might be adopted, but was afraid by the alteration proposed, the certainty which was contemplated by the bill of a person's going over the land, and fixing upon this or that part, would be defeated.

Mr. KITCHELL thought the amendment might be so formed as not to destroy the parallel lines marked in the original bill, by inserting the amendment at the end of the section.

Mr. GALLATIN was willing to agree to the proposed alteration.

Mr. RUTHERFORD again occupied a considerable time in making objections against the bill, which were pretty much the same as those he brought forward yesterday.

Mr. CRABB was in favor of the amendment. It would provide, he said, for different classes of citizens, and, by causing the land to bring a better price, be productive to the Treasury. He was against having all the land laid out in large lots; in that case men of small property could not become adventurers, except by combining into companies—a plan he did not like. A member had said, it would still give moneyed men an opportunity of purchasing to advantage; he thought differently, as there would be great uncertainty in getting lots lying together.

Mr. HAVENS moved that the words "one-half" be struck out of the amendment. He had no doubt the amendment was brought forward with the best intentions; but it would not sufficiently prevent monopolizing. He thought if the land was put in small lots, which was the object of this motion to strike out, moneyed men would have all the advantages they ought to have.

Mr. MOORE said it was desirable that every citizen who had a wish to purchase a part of this land should be accommodated. Security in every purchase of land was a principal thing; and the security given by purchasers will not be equal to that given by Government. If the land were divided into small tracts, he doubted not the best land would sell immediately, and when that was settled inferior land would command a price equal to the best. He hoped the amendment would pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS said there would be no competition, if all the land were in large tracts. A man who can purchase a few hundred acres cannot oppose a man who is ready to purchase as many thousands. If the amendment was agreed to, the bill would be so framed as to accommodate all classes of purchasers, by laying out the lands into small and large lots, as the situation and quality of the land required; this would embrace two objects, to wit: the settlement of the lands, and bringing money into the Treasury, to discharge the Public Debt.

Mr. GREENUP did not like the amendment; he wished the whole of the land to be divided into small lots.

Mr. NICHOLAS observed, that persons who could purchase large lots, would not purchase small ones, and, therefore, the public Treasury would be injured by dividing the whole into small parcels.

Mr. DAYTON was against the amendment to the amendment. Some purchasers, he said, would go out in companies, and some single. If persons of the first description could not have a certainty of purchasing a sufficient quantity of land lying together, it would be a great discouragement to them. Besides, he said, the expense attending the mode, would exceed calculation. He was willing that a part of the lands should be laid out in small lots, but not that the whole should be so divided.

Mr. DEARBORN was against both amendments, because they would not answer the purpose intended. He thought the land would be settled without these regulations. He had no objection to the accommodating persons of small property, but he would lay out small lots in certain parts lying together. Persons, he said, who purchase with a view of selling again, would not purchase unless they were to purchase a township six miles square.

Mr. DUVALL was in favor of the original amendment; but he would burden the public with no expense of surveying lots less than one mile square, or six hundred and forty acres. Persons who purchased might divide such a lot into four parts, if they pleased, at their own expense. The large tracts of three miles square might be left for those who chose to purchase. He would confine all surveys to four lines, except in cases of water, &c. If these principles were agreed upon, the bill might be recommitted.

Mr. LIVINGSTON thought they should either adopt the plan of selling in large parcels only or in small tracts only. No person, he said, would purchase a large tract at the same price which a small one was sold for. He was in favor of the amendment amended. He was for dividing the land into lots of a mile square. It has been said if this was done, large purchasers would not come forward, because small lots might be taken from a parcel which they might wish to purchase together. The plan, he said, likely to reduce the Debt soonest, and encourage settlers, was the best. Small tracts will do this. They will bring a higher price, and from real settlers. The State of New York, he said, first divided their unappropriated lands into large lots, which sold from one shilling to three shillings per acre; afterwards they were divided into small tracts, and sold for two dollars per acre.

Mr. VENABLE said there was not one man in an hundred who could purchase three miles square of land; but ninety-nine out of an hundred might be found willing to purchase a small tract. A fair competition, he said, ought to be given. He saw no difficulty in dividing the lots. Purchasers might do this. The great mass of money in this country, he said, lay in the hands of persons of small property.

Mr. FINDLEY said the amendment to the amendment came nearest to his opinion of right. It was said putting the land in small parcels would prevent men of money from purchasing. Experience in this State, he said, contradicted this, where, though lots were limited to four hundred acres, names are in the books for much larger purchases. When land was divided into small lots, no particular political interest was formed. He did not think large purchases were likely to accommodate poor persons. He believed many persons of this description were already on the lands. The expense of dividing the land into lots of one hundred and sixty acres each would not be so great as had been supposed: he would engage to do it for less than two per cent. on the lowest purchase. The surveys must not, he said, be taken by purchasers, but by a surveyor appointed by Government. He was not for sub-dividing the whole, but a part of the land.

Mr. KITTERA said it was wished, by making small lots, to prevent the necessity of purchasing of speculators. Instead of lots of six miles square, he would propose lots of five miles square, or sixteen thousand acres, as attended with more certainty in the division. Townships might then be divided into four cross lines, making four thousand acres, and then again into four, making lots of one thousand acres each. This might be done with certainty, would save expense in surveying, and answer the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. HAVENS again rose to defend his amendment, and said the reasoning against it was fallacious. Whatever part of the land was sold in large lots, speculators would get the profit of, but of the small lots Government would receive that profit.

Mr. DAYTON controverted the last speaker's arguments, on the same ground as before, that they would prevent companies of persons, or numbers of families agreeing to settle together from purchasing as they would wish.

Mr. CRABE was against the amendment to the amendment. He thought the last speaker had completely defeated the arguments in support of it. Both poor and rich classes, he said, would be disappointed by the proposed plan, and the view of gaining revenue would be frustrated. If smaller lots than a mile square be not laid out, thousands of persons would not be served. Farmers of middling property could only purchase. Two-thirds of the purchasers would be excluded. By laying out the land in large and small tracts, persons of every description would be suited. At least the experiment was worth trying.

Mr. SHERBURNE said if the whole of the land were to be divided into small lots, men of property would be excluded; as if they were to purchase a number of small lots, they could not sell them again on the same terms with Government. He did not think there were many families ready to go and settle upon these lands, as had been asserted; and he was not, he said, desirous of removing the inhabitants of the Atlantic States into these back settlements, but wished rather to import settlers. He was therefore for having part of the land in large tracts.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was for the latter amendment, and if adopted, he had a clause which he wished to be added. He thought the poor ought to be accommodated as well as the wealthy; and he could not see that the latter would be excluded by the proposed division.

Mr. VAN ALLEN spoke a considerable time upon the subject. He was in favor of making the tracts five miles square, which might, he said, be so divided as to suit all purchasers.

At this point the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 18.

A member expressing a wish that before the order of the day was taken up, the bill granting relief to Lieutenant Benjamin Strother, for supporting a number of recruits on their march to the Army might be considered, and the sense of the House being in favor of doing so, it went through the necessary forms, was agreed to, read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

After disposing of a number of petitions—

Mr. LIVINGSTON wished to call the attention of the House to the cause of an important body of men, the seamen of this country. They were, he said, of three descriptions, native Americans, Europeans, or naturalized citizens. All these, said he, are equally entitled to the protection of the laws of the United States, though their profession sometimes puts them out of it. These men, he said, sailing under the American flag, have been illegally seized, cruelly torn from their friends and country, and ignominiously scourged; yet this country has for three years been silent, looking upon their sufferings with listless apathy. An instrument had indeed been formed between this country and that whose subjects had thus treated our seamen; but it was in vain that they looked for redress in that. He should, however, always think it his duty to endeavor to procure this ill-treated body of men some relief. He then read a resolution, proposing to appoint a committee to examine into the subject, and to furnish some remedy to the evil complained of.

After a few observations from Mr. S. SMITH, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. SWANWICK, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

DISABLED OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

The order of the day being called for, Mr. TRACY wished, in order the sooner to furnish relief to their suffering fellow-citizens, that the order of the day might be dispensed with for a short time, for taking up the bill for the relief of wounded and disabled officers and soldiers in the actual service of the United States.

Mr. GALLATIN did not see the necessity of postponing the order of the day for the consideration of the bill in question; but he mentioned another which was of the first consequence, viz, the report of the Committee of Ways and Means for making further provision for the Public Debt.

The sense of the House being taken, it was in favor of taking up the business recommended by Mr. TRACY; and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject, and agreed to the bill without amendment. The House then proceeded to take it into consideration. A few remarks were made by different members on the propriety of including in the bill wounded militiamen also. This was objected to as a separate consideration, which would be better brought forward at another time. The words, "fourth of March, seventeen hundred and eighty-nine," (restricting the benefit of the act to persons wounded subsequent to that time,) were, on motion, agreed to be struck out. The bill was then agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. GALLATIN brought forward the consideration of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on what further measures are necessary to reinforce the existing provisions for the Public Debt.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. GALLATIN moved three different amendments, which went to the making more clear the time of paying dividends, the making of payments more uniform, and the leaving open the rate of interest, which being severally agreed to, the Committee rose, and the report and amendments being read to the House, were agreed to as follows:

"Resolved, That, in respect to the funded stock of the United States bearing a present interest of six per centum, there shall be dividends made on the last days of March, June, and September, for the present year, at the rate of one and one-half per centum; and from the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven to the year —, inclusive, at the rate of — per centum upon the original capital. That there be dividends made on the last days of December, from the present year to the year —, inclusive, at the rate of — per centum upon the original capital; and that a dividend be made on the last day of December, in the year —, of — per centum upon the original capital, in full of the said stock.

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made for reimbursing, in the same proportions as the other six per cent. stock, the balances bearing, and to bear, interest at six per centum, due to certain States, which were funded in consequence of an act passed May the thirty-first, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

"Resolved, That the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund be authorized to appoint a Secretary for the purpose of recording and preserving their proceedings and documents; and that a sum not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars be annually allowed the said Secretary for his services."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that the Committee of Ways and Means do prepare and bring in the same.

NORTHWESTERN LAND OFFICES.

The order of the day was next taken up on the bill for establishing Land Offices, and the two amendments of Mr. GALLATIN and Mr. HAVENS being under consideration,

Mr. KITCHELL hoped, the words one half would not be struck out, as he wished purchasers of every description to be accommodated. If the latter amendment were to pass, a favorite spot might be taken from the midst of a large lot, and prevent large tracts of land being sold. The Treasury, he said, should be considered as well as the convenience of purchasers. One half of the land divided into small lots would be amply sufficient, and the remainder remaining in large tracts, might be purchased by foreigners or others.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, the chief objections urged against small lots, were chiefly that they would not suit persons of large property to purchase so well as large lots. Persons of property, said he, can generally accommodate themselves; we ought to accommodate the lower classes of the people. He hoped the bill might be so framed as to embrace all the objects. He would not wish to prevent companies of persons from purchasing large districts; he believed there were such in this city who would wish to do so. Or townships, he said, might be divided into halves or quarters. By thus dividing their lands, the State which he represented had acquired three times the sum that they would otherwise have got. This plan had not, he said, prevented speculation; but it had excited a competition which had greatly favored their treasury. If the measures now agreed upon, should not be found the best, they might be remedied in the next Congress. A surveyor, he said, should explore this country, and point out the most valuable lots. These would bring a high price. When a settlement took place, he said, the unoccupied land near to it would immediately rise in price. It would be best, therefore, to do the business gradually, as this mode would eventually bring the largest sum into the Treasury; a sum which he hoped would nearly discharge the National Debt. It had been said, it mattered not who got the lands, provided we got the money; but, he thought it of the first consequence that the country should be settled with industrious freeholders. He concluded by hoping the latter amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN thought the original amendment went far enough; he believed the price put upon the land would be a sufficient check upon speculators. Perhaps it would be well, he said, to divide every alternate square into small tracts. If speculators bought the large tracts, when the small ones came to be settled, they would divide and sell theirs; or, if the large tracts remained in the hands of Government, they might afterwards be divided into small lots. He thought it best to commence the business with large and small lots.

Mr. MACLAY was of opinion, that the committee who brought in the present bill had principally the Treasury in view; but if a mode could be adopted that would equally encourage settlers and benefit the public funds, it would be desirable. It must be evident, he said, to every one, that an actual settler would not be able to purchase the quantity of land mentioned in the bill. He believed there would be no difference of opinion on that head. It would be well to inquire what plan would operate most to the advantage of the Treasury. He believed it was a fact generally allowed that the greatest quantity of the money in this country lay in the hands of agriculturists. These purchasers, then, should be met; for if the quantities of land offered be too great, or the price too high, these men would be shut out from the market; but he thought a system might be devised which would equally suit moneyed men and men of small property. In the extent of country they were about to dispose of, there was land enough to satisfy the demand of purchasers of every class. The only question is, the best way of doing this. It must be on terms which they can embrace. Men of little money must have small parcels of land, whilst men of large property may have as much as they please. Shall these purchasers be mingled together or separate? Persons purchasing small lots, would wish to be near their friends or connexions, who might also have been purchasers, that they might be of mutual service to each other. The way then, in his opinion, to meet both demands, would be to lay off one part of the land in large tracts, and the other in small lots. Besides, said he, suppose a lot of six miles square settled, the adjoining lots would immediately increase in value, and as no one would have a claim to it, it ought to go to the Treasury of the United States, which it would do, if the lands were undisposed of. The two plans, he observed, should by all means be kept distinct, as there was an impossibility of doing two things at the same time. One would interfere with the other. He said, the land they were about to dispose of, was a great common right to which every citizen in the country was entitled to a share, therefore, to bring it to market in such lots as but few can purchase, was injustice; besides, persons of small property would be lost as purchasers by such a conduct. If the Treasury, indeed, alone was considered, small lots would best answer the purpose. He said it would be also unjust to bring the whole of the land into the market at once; for, as it is a common right, all ought to have a chance of purchasing, and some persons who cannot just now raise money, might be able to buy in the course of a few years. Nor would it be prudent, he said, to glut the market. The quantity necessary for the present demand might easily be calculated.

With respect to boundaries, Mr. M. thought it easy to describe lots sufficiently correct, by means of rivers, creeks, &c. As one part of the country, he said, became settled, another would increase in value, and by a proper disposal of these lands the National Debt would be extinguished; but, if this plan failed, there would be no resource left but taxation, which it would be desirable to avoid. It has been said that the survey should be bound down by the cardinal points; this method, he said, might prove to be the most inconvenient of any. He concluded by saying, that policy and justice equally required that purchasers of every description should be attended to, and hoped, therefore, that the amendments would be agreed to, and the bill recommitted.

Mr. HARPER wished to call the attention of the House to the business immediately before it. Members still wandered, he said, and lost sight of the point to be decided upon. If these desultory discussions were permitted, there would be no end to the business. Amendments have been made, he said, with a view of bringing before the House the question, whether the land should be laid off in large tracts, in part large and part small, or all small. Some members have given their opinion in one way, some in another. He wished the question to be decided, whether all the tracts should be of one size or not.

Mr. HAVENS again rose to support his amendment, and, in answer to the objection which had been brought against the plan of small lots on the ground of expense, said that the charge of surveying the land into lots of a mile square would not exceed 2d. per acre. In support of his argument, he referred to the experience of the State of New York.

Mr. COOPER said, that though the land in the State of New York had been sold in lots of 100 acres, no farmers were purchasers. He said, he bought many of the tracts himself. Neither did farmers purchase when land was sold at 8d. per acre, at vendue. The true cause of the land selling high in that State, was the competition of moneyed men at vendue.

Mr. HAVENS answered, that it was sufficient to support his amendment, to prove that land in small lots produced a better price than when disposed of in large tracts.

Mr. CRAEB, was in favor of the original amendment as embracing both the wholesale and retail plans. No attention, it is said, should be paid to moneyed men, they will take care of themselves. Though this was true, yet if the Treasury was to be served, it was necessary to accommodate them, as they could not be expected to become purchasers, if obstructions were thrown in their way. If our Treasury was indeed swelled with riches, there would be no necessity, perhaps, for this attention; but, in its present state, their money would be useful. We might say there is no man in the community who has not a claim upon our unappropriated lands. Every man has a right in them: but policy will not admit of a strict inquiry into this, yet we must go as near the mark as possible. It has been said, that selling a part of these lands would raise the price of those adjoining. This was true, and the strongest incitement to purchasers. Men of property, he said, would not lay out their money, if no chance of gain was held out to them. He thought if the price of the land was fixed at two dollars per acre, speculators who purchased it would not injure, but benefit the United States. If nothing, he said, was contemplated but the sale of a small portion of land, Government might reserve a part for future demands; but the Treasury wanted the money. No calculation, he observed, could be made of the quantity of land necessary for the present demand. Many persons would become purchasers who had not yet applied. He said the only way in which the poorer classes could get possession of land, would be by means of the purchasers of large lots, who would give them long credit.

Mr. GALLATIN thought the difference betwixt his amendment and that proposed by the member from New York, was not so great as had been conceived by that gentleman. He did not mean by his amendment (as seemed to have been understood by several members) that one-half of every tract should be laid out in small lots, but that certain townships should be laid out in large, and others in small lots. He thought the plan he proposed, would provide as many small lots as would be wanted, and more was unnecessary. The large tracts, he said, would be purchased by men of large property, and they would sell again to the poorer classes on credit, which was the only way in which they could get possession of a part of this land, as Government would not be inclined to give the credit necessary to be given to these purchasers.

The question being called for, the second amendment for all small lots was first put and lost, and then the first for large and small, which was carried without a division; and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 19.

The committee to whom was referred the bill for establishing trading houses for the Indian tribes, with the amendments proposed by the Senate, report it as their opinion, that the amendments should not be adopted, except one of them which was read.

The bill for relief of certain officers and soldiers who have been wounded or disabled in the actual service of the United States, was read a third time. And the blank which was at first filled up with the words "4th of March, 1789," was agreed to be again so filled, as the member who moved these words to be struck out, said he found that the amendment would not include the persons he intended to include. The bill was then passed.

The bill for relief of Lieutenant Benjamin Strother was read a third time and passed.

DUTIES ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. HARPER wished the unfinished business before the House to give way for a short time to enable him to present some resolutions relative to the duty paid on distilled spirits, for the purpose of committing them to the Committee of Ways and Means. The resolutions were accordingly read as follows:

Resolved, That the duties now payable on spirits distilled within the United States, ought to be transferred from the commodity, and laid upon the instrument.

Resolved, That the collection of those duties, and of all other internal revenues of the United States, ought to be made by the Collectors of the various States under the direction of the Treasury Department, and of the Supervisors of the Revenue, except in cases where the District Judge, on application of the Supervisor, shall declare any such Collector to be an improper person.

Resolved, That all fines and forfeitures incurred under the Revenue Laws of the United States, ought to be sued for in the State Courts; unless where the Commissioner of the Revenue, under particular circumstances stated to him by the Supervisor, shall otherwise direct."

Mr. HARPER observed, that though it might not be found practicable to carry all the proposed measures into effect, yet he wished them to be committed to the committee he had mentioned, in order to have their report thereon.

After a number of observations from several members, for and against the resolutions being committed, it was finally agreed to, 39 to 44.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, as the unfinished business might take up much time of the House, before it was entered upon, he wished the resolution to be taken up, which he yesterday laid upon the table relative to the case of American seamen.

The House consenting, the following resolution was read, agreed to unanimously, and referred to a committee of five members.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether any and what Legislative provision is necessary for the relief of such American seamen as may have been impressed into the service of any foreign Power—and also to report a mode of furnishing American seamen with such evidence of their citizenship as may protect them from foreign impressment in future."

LAND OFFICES NORTHWEST OF THE OHIO.

The order of the day on the bill for establishing Land Offices for the sale of the Northwestern Territory, being again taken up, and the House having formed itself into a Committee of the Whole, and the second section being read,

Mr. HARPER said he wished to move an amendment. The vote of yesterday, he observed, had decided upon one principle of this business, viz: that the land should one-half be sold in tracts of a large size, and one-half in lots of a small size. Another important principle which he thought proper now to be determined upon, was, what quantity of land should be sold—whether the whole of the extensive territory, or a part of it only. It had been observed, that the two important objects in view were to produce revenue, and to lay off the land in such a manner as to conduce to its settlement. These were certainly important objects, he said, but not the only ones. Another object was, to adopt such a mode of settlement as should preserve peace, and continue to give a stable and orderly system of government to this new society. The object of revenue, he said, was not the most important though desirable—as we might do without this for the present—but to settle this land in a way so as to secure order and good government was of the first importance.

The bringing of the whole of this land into the market at once, Mr. H. observed, would be a great disadvantage; as it was a well known fact, that the price of a commodity always depended on the proportion the quantity to be disposed of bore to the demand. Here is a country, said he, containing twenty millions of acres—a part of which are appropriated and part unappropriated. The unappropriated part he supposed would amount at least to ten millions of acres—a tract considerably larger than many large States—larger than Maryland. What number of people, said he, is necessary to people this tract of country? More than can be spared from other States. To bring the whole of this land forward to sale at once would overstock the market; and if you sold at all it must be at a low price to moneyed men, and it would be even doubtful whether purchasers of this class could be found sufficient.

It will, therefore, said Mr. H., be necessary to make the object of revenue productive, to proportion the quantity of land to be disposed of, to the demand. If, instead of the present plan of laying out the whole Territory, one and a half million of acres were to be set out, this quantity would sell at a good price, be soon settled, and then an additional quantity adjoining to this might afterwards be laid off, which would bring a higher price, and be bought by actual settlers. The price of land must ultimately be paid by the cultivator, and if Government can meet his wants, it will be better than referring him to second-hand dealers. There were a class of cultivators, indeed, he said, who could be accommodated only by speculators. (In speaking of speculators, he said he did not mean to cast any odium upon the character; he thought land as fair an object of speculation as coffee, or any other article of merchandise.) The operation will be this: Government offers the land for sale at a minimum price. Persons applying for land will offer their plans, explain their wants, and fresh parcels of land can be laid off as occasion requires. Though, by a plan of this kind, so much money be not raised this year or next year to the Treasury, it will be best ultimately. Had a private individual a large stock of land to dispose of, he would adopt a similar proceeding; he would sell it off in parts and reserve the remainder in his hands to meet future demands as they should arise.

In support of his argument, Mr. H. cited the example of other States which had experience in business of this kind. If the whole ten million acres were to be exposed to public sale at once, it would either not be sold at all, or fall into the hands of capitalists. The 150,000 families which have been said to be ready to settle in this country would do but little towards purchasing this land. By this plan, Government would put into the hands of capitalists, to retail on any terms they pleased, that land which it should keep in its own for the accommodation of its citizens.

The next object, Mr. H. said, was to secure such a mode of settlement as would preserve peace and good government. This, he said, would not be done by selling the whole at one time, but by selling it progressively. To offer the whole for sale at once, and let persons settle on any part of this wide extended country, would be to put them out of all government, out of all reach of the laws of society, and take away from them all power of defence. On the contrary, to limit the settlements, would be to obviate all these difficulties. It might not, however, he said, be expedient to confine settlements to one point—there might be settlements in three different parts of this land, so as to accommodate emigrants from different quarters of the United States. Besides, this plan would increase in a greater proportion the value of the remaining unsold land, as each settlement would enhance the value of the land in its vicinity.

Mr. H. concluded by saying it was an important object to attend to the manner of settling this country. Perhaps, he said, the most important differences which had arisen betwixt the different States in America, was owing to the different methods adopted in their original settlement. If a settlement was commenced by degrees, order begins at first, and grows with its growth, and strengthens with its strength; but if a country be settled before any regular order takes place, if a good Government is ever established, it is by struggling with a variety of difficulties. For these reasons, he thought it of vast importance to adopt the plan he proposed, and read his resolution, the purport of which proposes to divide and subdivide the lands within certain limits having reference principally to natural boundaries.

Mr. MACON asked if the motion was in order; he supposed it was not, as the section had already been amended. He thought it would be best to proceed with the bill, in the mode now pursued; he was sure the House would not get through the bill by next March twelve-month. He suggested to the mover the propriety of reserving his motion for the purpose of bringing it forward in the House.

The Chairman considered the motion as out of order, unless part of the amendment agreed to yesterday was first struck out. Mr. HARPER agreed to alter his motion, so that it might not interfere with that amendment, which he was not opposed to.

Mr. SWANWICK.—The only thing that appears to me to be material to inquire, is how far we have occasion for money, so as to engage us to enter into the sale of these lands. It is allowed on all hands to be a very desirable measure to pay off our Debts. The PRESIDENT has strongly recommended it in each of his Addresses to several successive Legislatures. No blame can rest upon him if it be not done; the moment appears favorable. Owing to the war in Europe all funded Debts are low in price; though we are not engaged in the war, yet our stocks feel the effect; they are even below the British in the market rate in London, according to prices lately quoted from thence, which I attribute in a great measure to the interest being payable, and the principal transferable here only. At the peace it is probable all these funds will rise, perhaps twenty-five to thirty per centum or more, beyond their actual rates; as in Britain, before the war, their three per cents. were nearly at par value; at that rate our six per cents. may be worth twenty-five to thirty shillings per pound deferred, and three per cent. in proportion. Whether lands will rise in proportion to the rise of the price of our Public Debt in the market, is uncertain. The general eagerness to sell lands, and the general idea of their present high prices, seems to indicate the contrary as the most prevalent opinion. Be this, however, as it may, I cannot see that it is less right for a nation, than it would be for an individual, to sell off his landed property to pay off his Debts. On this principle, therefore, consulting all due fairness and publicity in the sale, and dividing the tracts so as to accommodate the greater number of purchasers in the market, I believe we shall run no risk of doing wrong in bringing these lands to sale.

Much has been said about speculators and settlers; a good deal about laying out the lands in particular divisions to suit emigrants from different States; but, however laudable I consider the views of gentlemen who have supported these ideas, yet I cannot conceive them as solid as they suppose. It is immaterial to us who buys the lands so we get a good price for them. Speculators will probably purchase, because they have capital, and can afford to give long credit on the lands; but our plan being to pay off our Debts most advantageously, we must have the money soon to effect it. I have, therefore, no fears of speculators. Their money laid out in paying off our Debts, will do us at least as much good as our lands will do them; for the moment we get our Debts paid, our revenues of seven or eight millions a year will be freed, and at our disposal; by this means we shall cease to be told that our Treasury is empty, and that we must sell off the materials of our frigates, because we cannot afford half a million of dollars to finish them. Our roads, the object of a gentleman from Virginia, can then be perfected; and our seamen, the object on which another gentleman from New York has laid a motion before you, will receive ample protection. In short, nations, like individuals, are respectable only in proportion to their resources. If ours are released from their actual embarrassments; if our Debts are paid, and our revenues left at our disposal, a few acres in the wilderness will have produced the great blessings of peace, union, and respectability, on the Atlantic, and the independence and sovereignty of our country will be, as it ought, properly asserted. For such purposes I think it worth while to employ the present moment of avidity to speculate in our lands, so as to clear off our Debts and produce a nett revenue to our Treasury, to be employed to the most salutary purposes of internal improvement and of exterior defence.

Mr. DAYTON said, if he approved of the principle, he should not approve of the loose manner in which the proposed amendment was drawn up. If the principle recommended in the resolution was adopted, tracts should be marked by certain lines or boundaries; but as he disapproved of the principle, he should not dwell upon the form of the resolution. He thought the arguments of the mover more specious than solid. Every one would see that by limiting the price of the land, the quantity was also limited. The settlement of land, he said, increased the value; but if purchasers be confined to a certain situation, no value will be put upon land five hundred miles distant. If the plan of the committee be adopted, he said, all the land will increase in value. Land contiguous to a settlement now not worth a dollar an acre, will then be worth two dollars. Every year a fresh quantity of land can be brought into the market. Mr. D. did not understand what the mover meant by fixing settlements in different quarters of the land to suit different parts of the United States.

Mr. HARPER explained.

Mr. NICHOLAS said it was necessary to throw land enough into the market to meet the demand. He said they had not only land to dispose of, but they had a million and a half acres of such land as could not be found anywhere else, and if they should limit purchasers to certain districts of the country, where there is good and bad land, if only one-fifth be good, four-fifths of purchasers will be discouraged. If inducements, said he, are to be held out, they must be such as cannot be resisted. Suppose, he said, they were successful in selling one and a half million of acres on the frontiers, nothing would be added to the value of the land in the interior country. The demand for good land, he said, would be certain, and all the rest would become so by settlement. With respect to civilization, so much dwelt on by the mover of the amendment, he had so little theory on the subject, that he should not have thought of introducing it. He lived, he said, where Government scarcely showed its arm, and there seemed to be no defect. The people were just, orderly, and happy; and yet this State was settled in the way which was described as introducing nothing but disorder.

Mr. GALLATIN said, there were two considerations which favored the mover's principle of bringing forward only a limited quantity of land at a time for sale, which were the self-interested landholders, and the fear of too great an emigration from the Atlantic States to this country. He dwelt a considerable time in remarking on these two different views, and concluded with dissenting from the amendment in its present form.

Mr. HARPER replied to the several objections which had been made to his amendment. The propriety of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWANWICK] relative to the funds, derives all its force from the practicability of immediately raising a sufficient sum of money from the sale of the lands, in order to going into the market now while the funds are low; but he conceived that no gentleman had an idea that this could be suddenly done. The diminution of the Public Debt is a most desirable object; but an immediate operation to this purpose, from this source, was a thing quite out of the question.

He next noticed the remark of Mr. DAYTON, relative to sparse settlements. He said the gentleman's reasoning might apply to a comparatively small territory, but applied to a territory of twenty millions of acres, was lost. The gentleman had reference to Symmes's purchase, a tract of about 1,200,000 acres, settled by about 5,000 families. That tract had appreciated in value in consequence of the sparse settlement. But extend the idea to twenty millions of acres, and twenty times five thousand families would form but a thin settlement of the country supposed to be laid open.

His amendment however, agreed in some measure with that of the gentleman. He was in favor of a sparse settlement, so far as extended to forming three or four grand central points, round which settlements may be extended to certain limits. Mr. H. added many other observations in support of his amendment, which he defended with great ability and ingenuity.

The motion being put on the amendment, it was lost.

The third section of the bill being read, Mr. HARPER said there was a necessity of striking out some words in order to accommodate it to the amendment passed yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved an amendment to have the lands sold by auction, in order to bring the question before the House.

Mr. NICHOLAS proposed a motion to supersede that of the last member to nearly the same effect.

After several observations from different members, principally in favor of a sale by auction, the Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

MONDAY, February 22.

The committee to whom was referred a bill originating in the Senate, for the amendment of an act to encourage Useful Arts, report as their opinion, that it would be inexpedient and impolitic to pass the said bill into a law.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HEATH proposed to the House a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That until a Stenographer be appointed, or further provision made for taking the debates of this House, no printer be permitted to publish abstracts of the Speeches of members, unless permitted by the members making the same."

Ordered to lie on the table.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTH DAY.

Mr. W. SMITH moved that the House adjourn for half an hour.

This motion occasioned a good deal of conversation upon its propriety. In favor of it, it was said, that it had been a practice ever since the commencement of the Government, for that House to make a short adjournment on that day in order to pay their compliments to the PRESIDENT, and that several members were absent, from an idea that the House would adjourn at 12 o'clock as usual. On the other hand, it was objected that it was the business of the members of that House first to do their duty, and then attend to the paying of compliments; that just at that time the house of the PRESIDENT was filled with militia and others; and that, therefore, it would be better, upon the whole, to wait upon the PRESIDENT after the business of the day was finished.

Mr. GALLATIN moved that the words "half an hour" be struck out.

The sense of the House was first taken on the amendment, which was lost, without a division. The motion was then put and negatived, being 38 or it, and 50 against it.

LOAN TO THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

It was moved that the unfinished business of Friday be laid aside, to take up the consideration of the bill authorizing a loan for the use of the City of Washington.

The resolution being carried by a vote of forty-eight against thirty-four, the House formed itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MULLENBERG in the Chair, and the first section of the bill being read, and also the resolution of the House, authorizing the committee to bring in the bill—

Mr. SWIFT wished to know why the committee had deviated from the principles contained in the resolution directing them to bring in the bill. By this bill the buildings in the City of Washington are to be conveyed to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, though there were no instructions in the resolution of the House to this effect.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH said the lots were conveyed to the PRESIDENT, in order to reimburse the loan authorized by the Senate, and as a security for the sum to be borrowed by the PRESIDENT in consequence of the present bill.

Mr. BRENT said the bill was framed in a mode which the committee thought best calculated to carry into execution the resolution of the House.

Mr. SWANWICK objected to the bill on the principle, that if the United States were to accept a grant of the lots in the Federal City, they might, if they thought proper, afterwards grant such a sum as they should suppose sufficient for completing the public buildings, out of the general funds; but he was entirely against opening a loan for the special purpose; first, because he thought it degrading to the United States to have it observed in Europe, or elsewhere, that they could not complete the buildings requisite for their own immediate use, without making a loan for the purpose; and secondly, because he had no notion of superadding to the public faith any security of lots, as it might prove injurious to the United States to have loans opened in various quarters on different securities, though ultimately bottomed on the same stock, viz: the credit of the United States. On these grounds, he was for having the bill recommended, to be new modified.

Mr. NICHOLAS offered his observations upon the bill; but from the firing of cannon, the beating of drums, &c., which took place during his speaking, in honor of the PRESIDENT's birth day, the reporter could not hear his sentiments sufficiently distinct to attempt an abridgment of them.

Mr. S. SMITH moved that the fourth section of the bill offering lots as a security of money borrowed, be struck out as altogether unnecessary.

Mr. CRABB said the lots were not offered in aid of the credit of the United States; but as a security to them for the money borrowed under their authority.

Mr. BRENT said, if this section of the bill was struck out, the object of it would be defeated. The preceding clause provides for the conveying of the lots to the PRESIDENT as a security for any sum of money he shall borrow for completing the buildings. And provided the property be not equal to the payment of the money borrowed, the United States guarantee the making good the deficiency. If this clause were struck out, the lenders of money would have no further security, if the buildings were not sufficient to pay. So that, after passing this act, the business would remain in the same state it was in before the House took it up. It has been said, that it would be derogatory to the dignity of the United States to offer these lots as a security, in addition to their own credit; but, that a person should become disreputable by offering too ample a security, was a novel doctrine to him; and that gentleman's ideas of dignity and his, were so opposite, as not likely to meet. It has been said, that it will be necessary to open a loan for 600,000 dollars on the public account, and he could not see the dishonor of opening a loan for this object more than for that. The form of the act was necessary to secure the repayment of money received by the Commissioners, and it was necessary that the lots should be conveyed to the PRESIDENT as a guarantee for the money borrowed. He was, therefore, for the bill remaining in its present form.

Mr. SWIFT thought the faith of the United States sufficient for money lenders, and expressed his disapprobation of the bill in other respects.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, if it would be in order, he should wish to move that the Committee rise, and that the bill be recommitted in order to have it moulded into a somewhat different form.

Mr. DAYTON wished, as there was matter perfectly new to him introduced into this bill, that the Committee would rise, that the bill might be recommitted, and formed agreeably to the resolution of that House authorizing it to be brought in.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH had the greatest respect for the opinion of the last speaker; but could not see the difference stated by him to exist between this bill and the resolution authorizing the committee to bring it in. This he endeavored to show at considerable length, and observed, that the committee did not conceive themselves confined to the words, but to the spirit of the resolution.

Mr. NICHOLAS justified the form of the bill, as being agreeable to the resolution of the House, and said if the fourth section was struck out, the law would be destroyed altogether.

Mr. SENGWICK wished the bill to take a different form.

Mr. MADISON did not see any necessity for the Committee to rise. He thought the bill conformable to the resolution of the House, and sufficiently simple in itself.

Mr. SWIFT was for having the bill recommitted. He wished to know how far a committee had the power to deviate from a resolution instructing them to bring in a bill. He said there were new principles introduced into this bill which he could not agree to.

Mr. GALLATIN said there was no necessity for recommitting the bill. If any provisions of the bill required amendment, the present was the time to amend them. He, therefore, saw no ground for the Committee to rise on that head.

Mr. BRENT was very desirous that a final decision should be come to on the subject; as whilst it was yet pending, the property in the Federal City was subject to much speculation, the minds of persons concerned were kept in an unsettled situation, and the season was advancing in which the Commissioners wished to take steps to forward the undertaking. He answered the objections which had been made against the form of the bill, and justified the conduct of the committee. He remarked upon what had been said with respect to the security offered for the meditated loan. He acknowledged that the credit of the United States was good for any amount, and said that the lots were intended as a security to the United States, and not to the persons who subscribed money to the intended loan.

Mr. S. SMITH understood that the Commissioners of the Federal City were to make the loan in their own name; but in this bill the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES guarantees the loan, which, he thought, would interfere with the interests of the United States. He should, therefore, vote for a recommitment. The fourth clause of the bill, he thought useless, and objected to the making of a loan with a mortgage of lots. But though he made this objection to the bill, he was in favor of furnishing money to complete the works in this city.

Mr. HARPER wished to suggest some ideas by which the question might be immediately taken. The first plan was, that the Commissioners of the Federal City mortgage the property, and that the United States should give security; another plan was that the property should be vested in the United States, and assigned to the PRESIDENT. He thought the latter plan the best, but it would be extremely proper that the sense of the Committee should be expressed. If the motion, then, for the Committee to rise could be withdrawn he would move to strike out certain words, to introduce the proposed amendment.

Mr. GILES wished the subject to go before the committee again; but, he said it was necessary they should have instructions upon which to act, as they could not be guided by a debate of that House only.

Several members calling for a rising of the Committee, it rose, and asked leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 23.

The Committee of Ways and Means gave in their report on the revenue laws, which was twice read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday.

LOAN FOR THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for authorizing a loan for the use of the City of Washington,

Mr. WILLIAMS proposed an amendment, which, after a few observations from Mr. MURRAY and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, was withdrawn.

Mr. VARNUM said he understood a motion had been yesterday made to strike out the fourth clause of the bill; but the gentleman who had made the motion not appearing in his place, he renewed the motion to strike out that clause.

Mr. MURRAY thought that clause essential. For though he believed the lots worth considerably more than the money proposed to be borrowed, yet more implicit confidence would be placed on the security, and it would be a means of accelerating the business, if the sanction of the guarantee of the United States was added to it.

Mr. VARNUM objected to the United States guaranteeing this loan. He did not know with any certainty what would be the expense of the proposed buildings, or the extent of them. To guarantee this loan, was to guarantee what they knew not; and if they guaranteed it, he believed they would have the money to pay. He was of opinion the whole of the buildings necessary for the use of Government might be built for a less sum than was asked to finish what was already begun. Why should the United States guarantee the loan? Because it would be for the interest of certain individuals. It would be the interest of the United States to sell the whole of the lots, and then guarantee a loan. At any rate, before the United States went into the business, they ought to know to what extent they pledged themselves.

Mr. CRABB said the fourth section was a necessary part of the bill, which was to complete a great national object. He could not see therefore, why it should be objected to. If, indeed, gentlemen wished to defeat the whole business, it would be well for them to declare their intentions at once. It has been said, if the United States make the guarantee, there is no security, but they may have to pay the money. There was all the security that could be expected—a vestment of the lots. It was laudable to attend to economy in public affairs; but there would be no economy in refusing to make the guarantee required, but the reverse; as, in that case, the property would not sell for one-third of its value; and if the Government was to be removed there at the time proposed, the money for completing the necessary buildings, would have to be drawn from the Treasury. He expatiated at considerable length on the merits of the bill, and insisted upon its conformity to the resolution empowering the committee to bring it in.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was in some degree of the same opinion with the member last up. But he thought it impossible to draw a bill which should perfectly correspond with the resolution of the House so frequently referred to. It had been said yesterday that it was not possible to frame a bill more conformable to the resolution than the one now under discussion. To show that this was possible, he had drawn up a clause which would make the bill in perfect unison with the resolution. [He read the clause.] The bill, so altered, would not tie up the lots so that they cannot be sold to raise the money. And if this clause was adopted, the United States would not be called upon for the money. He wished, therefore, the Committee to rise, and recommit the bill.

Mr. W. LYMAN was against the Committee rising. He wished the sense of the House to be taken, whether it was in favor of the United States guaranteeing the loan, or not. He did not see anything material in the bill which was not in the resolution of the House, except what related to public squares.

Mr. MURRAY said, to strike out the fourth section of the bill would be to do violence to the property in the Federal City. The first clause transfers the property into the hands of the PRESIDENT, and now objections are raised against the clause necessary to complete the business. If gentlemen mean to destroy the bill altogether, it should be done in a way not to injure the property of individuals.

Mr. RUTHERFORD spoke in favor of the bill.

Mr. SWANWICK was in favor of the Committee's rising for the purpose of recommitting the bill. He objected to the bill generally upon the same ground as yesterday, with respect to joining the securities of the lots, and the faith of the United States together. He asked how the passing of this bill could give value to the buildings of the Federal City? Is it not already enacted that Congress shall sit there in the year 1801? The value of the lots was to be increased only by selling them to a number of persons. The city must owe its prosperity to its peculiar advantages as a commercial spot, and not from its being the Seat of Government. It was, therefore, the interest of the United States to sell the lots and induce people to settle there. The higher price the lots bore, the greater would be the obstacles to settlement. If it was the intention of the United States to grant money for the completion of the building, let the House say so. When it was first proposed to remove the Government to the Federal City, it was said that it would be the interest of persons to give lots to encourage the Government to come there. The security now asked for was never contemplated. He had, however, no objection to the United States granting money, but he was against the making of two loans, one on the credit of the United States, and another on that of the United States and certain lots.

Mr. DAYTON did not altogether like the present motion, and he was against the form of the bill. He wished it to be determined, whether the United States were only to become eventually guarantees for the money borrowed, and whether on the sale of any lot it should be exonerated from the loan. The property he should wish to be placed in the hands of the Commissioners, or in the PRESIDENT, to make sale of it.

Mr. GALLATIN was against the Committee rising, and against the bill being recommitted, until principles be agreed upon on which they mean the bill to be recommitted. Two or three plans, directly contrary to each other, are produced, yet all are in favor of a recommitment. It was necessary first to establish the principle. A gentleman had said he had drawn up a clause, which would completely carry the resolution of the House into effect, but he thought the bill before the House more conformable to that resolution than the clause proposed, which contains a different principle. He wished, therefore, that the gentleman would withdraw his motion, for the purpose of settling the principle.

Mr. HILLHOUSE had no objection to withdraw his motion.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH thought it would be economical in the United States to guarantee the Loan. He thought the substitute offered for a clause of the bill more defective than the one it was meant to supply. He said the United States would not be actually responsible for any part of the money borrowed; and the committee had thought they could not do better than place the property under the direction of the PRESIDENT; but if it was thought too heavy a burden to be laid upon him, the business might be placed in the hands of the Secretary of State or Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the House was willing to give its responsibility; the way of doing it, was the matter contended for. If the fourth clause had been agreed upon to be struck out, he should have introduced another in its place. If the bill remained in its present state, he said, the United States cannot sell the lots; the people, therefore, who go there, must purchase of speculators, who may ask what price they please. It has been said, to strike out the fourth section would be to destroy the bill; if so, he would not vote for it. If the fourth section were struck out, he would return to the second, and make some alteration in it, so as to pledge the faith of the United States. It was ridiculous, he said, to think of mortgaging lots for the money to be borrowed; there was no occasion for a counter-security to the faith of the United States. The bill, in its present form, was calculated to advance the price of the lots for the interest of speculators. He would have the faith of the United States pledged for the proposed Loan, and the lots consigned to them as a security. He saw no occasion for the first section of the bill, as he believed the property already vested in the United States, and that the Commissioners cannot convey any lots without the consent of the PRESIDENT—at least, that they ought not to do it. He wished the Loan to be made by the Commissioners, with the guarantee of the United States.

Mr. CRABB replied to the arguments of the last speaker, and noticed what had fallen from Mr. SWANWICK, on the subject of tacking the faith of the United States and the lots together. He said that gentleman knew it to be the practice of bankers to require endorsers to the notes of men of the first property, and the guarantee of the United States was on the same principle. There would be no necessity for the guarantee of the United States, if the property was as well known in Europe as it is known here. He said, the House had the assurance of the PRESIDENT, that if the property was duly attended to, it would be worth all the money borrowed. But suppose the property was not worth the money, the passing of this bill will not lessen, but increase its value. He said, the faith of the United States was already pledged, and they were bound to pass the present bill.

Mr. MURRAY thought it would save time, if the motion for striking out the fourth section was withdrawn, for the purpose of considering the first and second sections.

Mr. VARNUM consented to this, but again cautioned the House against guaranteeing what they did not know the extent of. He believed the property would not be equal to the money to be borrowed; and although the PRESIDENT considered the property as of that value, yet it became them, as a branch of the Legislature, to be convinced of it also. If it be true that there is money enough in the hands of the Commissioners to complete the buildings, there is no occasion for this Loan.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH said, the committee who brought in the bill thought, as the United States were made responsible, they ought to have a security under their immediate control. If this had not been the case, he should have been against the bill. He went into an explanation of the nature of the Federal City property, and showed that gentlemen were mistaken when they said that the United States had already the property in their hands; they had no control over it, and could not prevent the Commissioners from alienating it, but if this bill pass, they will have that power, and security for the Loan proposed to be negotiated.

Mr. DAYTON conceived the object of reconsidering the first and second clause was to reconcile two opposite principles introduced; this, he said, might be done by moving to strike out a part of the first, or a part of the second clause; he thought the latter would be the best.

Mr. HILLHOUSE wished to move to strike out the first section, in order to introduce another, which he read, for guaranteeing only a part, instead of the whole Loan. He thought the business should still remain in the hands of the Commissioners.

Mr. GILES thought the plan proposed by the member from New Jersey best adapted to taking the sense of the House.

Mr. DAYTON proposed an amendment to the second section, which went to the preventing of lots being mortgaged, and to enable the PRESIDENT to sell them.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH would not oppose the motion, though he thought there was no necessity for it, as he believed the PRESIDENT would have the same power as the bill stood.

Mr. BRENT said, it was the wish of the committee that the property might remain in the hands of the PRESIDENT, to be disposed of as he thought proper; but as different members seem to think the property will not be at sufficient liberty to be sold, by the bill as it stands, he should vote for the amendment. It had been said, by a member, that before he voted for the bill, he should wish for information respecting the extent of the intended Loan, &c. If that gentleman had attended to the documents laid before the House, he would have seen accounts of all the money received and expended, and how much was necessary to complete the business. He may, therefore, be easy on that subject. It had been said, if the lots be a sufficient surety for the Loan, why guarantee it? At present, he said, they were not sufficient. Mr. B. observed, that the bill before them would be considered as the touchstone to determine whether the Seat of Government will go to the banks of the Potomac, or not. Motives of policy and economy, and objections to increasing the Public Debt, will not apply in this case. The very act provides funds to guarantee the Loan; for though the property, until the proposed Loan be guaranteed, would sell for a mere trifle, when it is guaranteed it will sell for a great price. So great a difference would it make, that he believed property which will then sell for two millions of dollars, would not otherwise be worth one hundred thousand dollars. If, therefore, gentlemen are against the bill from economical views, they are mistaken; for, it was his opinion, the property would not only pay off the Loan, but eventually be a considerable fund towards the discharge of the Public Debt. It had been suggested that the United States were under no obligation to make this guarantee. He thought differently; he believed the credit of the United States materially concerned. The public have relied fully upon the countenance of Government in this business; many persons, indeed, have made great sacrifices to procure lots in this new city, and if, after holding out temptations to people, Government should not go there at the proposed time, all these persons will be ruined, and a stain will be laid upon the national character. He hoped, therefore, no objection would be made to carrying the bill into effect.

Mr. SEDGWICK could not consent to the proposed amendment. He had no objection to the guarantee, but he did not consider the United States as under any obligations to provide accommodations for the Government in the Federal City. The friends of the act when it passed, every one who was present at the time must remember, disclaimed all intention of calling on Government for this purpose; he could not conceive, therefore, with the gentleman who spoke last, that the faith of the United States was any way pledged. Motives of accommodation would, however, influence him to vote in favor of the guarantee. But he was against the amendment; as, if the funds proved inadequate, every one would look to Government to make good the deficiency. He was willing to guarantee the loan of half a million. To pledge the United States for the whole of the deficiency, if ever so great, he was not willing.

Mr. MURRAY thought the objection of the last speaker might be done away with by an attention to the third section of the bill, which says the PRESIDENT shall sell the lots, to make good the Loan. He hoped the amendment would pass.

Mr. GALLATIN said, an objection was made to the amendment, because it was a deviation from the original law. We are told, said he, of a sort of contract, and members are called upon to recollect the conditions. He should, however, follow the law. It is said, that Government shall be at such a place, in such a year; but if they change their mind, they may establish Government where they please. The question is, whether the law is to be carried into effect or not. He believed they had the power to determine this. The law says the Government shall be transferred at a certain time; by another law, certain buildings are to be erected by the PRESIDENT. The law must, therefore, either be carried into effect or repealed. The amendment under consideration, Mr. G. said, placed the Loan on the credit of the United States, and not on the lots. It was possible they might have occasion to borrow money on public account, and it would be an awkward circumstance to have two different kinds of Loans. By this amendment, the PRESIDENT has also the power to sell the lots when he pleases, and either pay off the Loan with the money or deposit it in the Treasury. He was, therefore, for the amendment.

Mr. SEDGWICK explained.

The Committee now rose, and asked leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

ALEXANDER D. ORR, from Kentucky, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, of the committee to whom it was referred to bring in a new bill for regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes, and for preserving peace with the Indians, presented a bill; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

LOAN TO THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MUHLENBERG in the Chair, on the bill for authorizing a Loan for the use of the Federal City—

Mr. SWIFT observed, it had been said that the fate of the bill depended upon the fourth section; he thought not. He was ready to guarantee the Loan, but would have the money obtained on the lots, and the faith of the United States pledged only for any deficiency which might remain eventually. He wished to keep the United States as detached from the subject as possible, by letting it remain in the same channel which was intended by the original act. The Commissioners might then proceed as usual. If this plan was adopted, he would move not to strike out the words proposed to be struck out; as, when the principle was settled, he should wish the bill to be re-committed.

Mr. HAVENS did not think the motion for striking out certain words of great importance. He saw no impropriety in borrowing money on lots; he did not think money lenders would be influenced in any considerable degree by the lots being in the security; but if it was the opinion of a majority of members, that this would be the better plan, he should not object to it.

Mr. DAYTON said the words moved to be struck out were certainly of consequence, as they admitted of two constructions. If the amendment took place, he said, the United States would not be pledged, as had been stated, to finish the buildings; all they would be pledged for would be to make good any deficiency which there might be before the sum guaranteed by the present bill and the amount of the sale of the lots. If, indeed, the lots produce more money than will pay off the Loan, then the surplus might be applied to the finishing of other buildings; but he did not consider the United States pledged by the present bill to a greater amount than the sum with which the blank in the bill would be filled up.

Mr. SWIFT said, his wish was that the business should go on in the hands of the Commissioners, as heretofore. This bill, he said, changes the original principle of the plan, by placing the whole of the property in the hands of the United States, leaving it with them to complete the buildings. When once this is determined, he said, the United States might consider the Federal City as a child of their own; and the moment it is known that the Government has interfered in the matter, every expense attending it will be increased. This was a necessary consequence, and ought to be guarded against.

Mr. WILLIAMS was in favor of the buildings remaining in the hands of the Commissioners. He could wish to move, in order to have an important principle decided upon by the committee, that the words "the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES" be expunged. Until this was decided upon, he said, they might go on from day to day, without making any progress in the business. [On being informed by the Chairman that his motion was not in order, Mr. W. proceeded to remark generally.] He said it was imprudent to go farther than the original law intended. When business of this sort, he said, is taken up by public bodies, there is no end of the expense. It had been said, great economy had been used by the Commissioners; he did not think so. He called for the reading of a paper, which lay on the Clerk's table, stating the expense already incurred; which being read, he remarked, that for the single article of surveying alone, more than twenty-two thousand dollars had been paid. It had been computed, he said, that 700,000 dollars would complete the contemplated buildings, but when the high price of materials and labor were considered, most gentlemen would think with him that it would require three times that sum. It was calculated, he said, the other day, that two hundred thousand dollars would complete the buildings for the reception of Congress. There were now lots sold to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars; but it is supposed there will be a failure in the payment of this sum; but it has not been stated why. Is it right, said he, for Government to interfere in this business, to advance the value of property purchased by individuals on speculation? When they legislated, he said, they should legislate with their eyes open. A gentleman had said, that members who opposed the bill would do well to throw off the cloak; he wished the cloak to be thrown off on all sides. But we are told, that if we do not give energy to this business the public will not have assurance that the Government will be removed to the Federal City at the appointed time. There was no ground for this remark, as the original act stood unrepealed, and he hoped would remain so. He wished to keep that act in view, and not vary from it. He said the public buildings had been begun upon a wrong principle—upon a plan much too magnificent; they were more so than any palace in Europe: they would cost a million of dollars more than calculated. And, said he, everything must be in proportion: the officers who go into those palaces must have their salaries proportioned to the grandeur of their habitations.

Mr. WILLIAMS supposed he should be told this land was a gift—but where is the gift? Was not every other lot reserved to the proprietors? and are not these lots now more valuable than the whole was when it was first laid out for a city? It had been resolved, he said, that the permanent Seat of Government should be in this city, and he was willing it should be so. He did not think with some members, that by keeping the lots in hand they would increase in value; he thought the contrary. He wished the House would agree to complete the public buildings alone; for, he believed, the instant the United States guaranteed a loan they would have it to pay, and he did not think it right to engage in anything likely to increase the public debt. He thought the best plan would be to sell the whole of the lots whilst they will bring a high price—he should not object, however, to a reasonable guarantee, but would, by no means consent to the United States taking the business wholly into their own hands.

Mr. DEARBORN said, there appeared a reluctance to give the House the documents relative to the public buildings. The committee, he said, should receive some information on the subject of the money due on account of lots sold, with respect to a part of it being doubtful.

Mr. BRENT believed, if the gentleman examined the memorial of the Commissioners, he would find the papers alluded to. The Commissioners who made sale of the property, he said, were not now the Commissioners. The contracts they made were supposed to be good at that time. The first stipulated payment had been made, the second had been some time due, and was not paid. There was, therefore, reason to believe there would be some failures. It was one of the conditions of these contracts, that a certain number of houses should be built in a given time. Part of these houses have been erected; he believed there were nearly 300. There is no danger, therefore, he said, if the purchasers should not complete their contract, of there being any eventual loss; but, in the meantime, immediate resources are wanting to prosecute the buildings in hand.

Mr. GILES wished this subject might be treated with candor. He hoped gentlemen who were opposed to the principle of the bill, would allow the committee to form as unobjectionable a bill as they were able. He thought it unfair to prevent a thing being brought into as perfect a state as possible, by attempting to destroy it. When the bill has received its final shape, gentlemen could then object to it if they chose. The present question was on the striking out of certain words, which he did not think material. The arguments in favor of striking out on the ground of a double construction, had some weight, but he did not think the objection valid. The guarantee, said he, will be sufficient to satisfy every purchaser; but it was said, the object of this motion was to reconcile different opinions; if that could be done he had no objection to it.

Mr. GILES wished to remark on what had fallen from a member from Pennsylvania yesterday, with respect to the law providing for the removal of the Seat of Government. That law, he said, differed from all others. The Constitution, itself, he said, prescribes the rule, the act only fixes the spot where it should be carried into effect. The act is, therefore, not repealable. The Constitution does not give a power to fix upon two spots, but upon one spot. He thought it necessary to make this remark, lest he might be supposed to countenance the opinion he combated. It had been remarked that it would be in some degree degrading to the United States to borrow money on the credit of lots; he thought differently, and showed that it was a common thing in Governments to borrow money on different funds. It had been wished to disconnect the Government from the business. Whilst Government guaranteed the loan, he said, it would make no difference whether the loan was bottomed on the lots or otherwise. The nature of the engagement was the same. The question was whether the House would agree to guarantee the loan or not.

Mr. SWANWICK explained what he had said on the nature of loans, justifying his remarks on the impolicy of going to Amsterdam to borrow money to complete a building for their Legislature to meet in.

Mr. VENABLE did not feel the delicacy of the member who spoke last, on the subject of borrowing money to carry into effect the present bill. He believed that gentleman was not disposed to give the assistance required; but he thought the majority of the House was in favor of pledging the lots. If this was the case, he should wish to supersede the present motion by striking out the first and second clauses, to substitute another in their place, and amend the third section; this will have the wished-for effect; the House may fill up the blanks as it pleases, and it will probably never hear of the subject again in a Legislative way, except in case of a final deficiency.

Mr. GILES hoped the amendment proposed would accommodate gentlemen who wished to disconnect the Government from the business. He, however, thought it a strong reason for Government's having something to do in the completion of the buildings, that it might have some control over the management of them. He had seen, and was acquainted with, the buildings carrying on in the Federal City. He thought the house erecting for the residence of the President was much too magnificent, much more so than was intended. Every one thought so who saw it. But this was no reason for obstructing the progress of the business. He hoped the bill would be formed in a manner so as to meet the general sense of the House. Though he had objected to the grandeur of the house intended for the President, he would have the buildings for Congress erected on a grand scale, and fitted for the Representatives of a great and free people.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, he had seconded the motion, because it was in conformity to the original act. It undertakes only to guarantee the deficiency between what the lots sell for, and the sum to be borrowed. Thus far he was willing to guarantee, and thought this the most unobjectionable way of doing it.

Mr. SITGREAVES observed, that a member had said that it was uncandid to obstruct the committee in their endeavors to make the bill as perfect as possible. He said it was his design to oppose the bill in toto. There was, however, an objection to the present motion, which he thought it important to make. He said, if the lots were conveyed to Commissioners, there was no occasion for the Legislature to pass an act to enable them to borrow money; but he understood the conveyance had been made in trust; if so, these trusts could not be interfered with by the Legislature, they could not be altered. If they were conveyed to be sold, they cannot mortgage, nor can this House give them authority to do so. Even if the Commissioners could be enabled to mortgage, the one design is incompatible with the other. The idea of borrowing on mortgage is inconsistent with the sale of the lots.

Mr. DAYTON said, the conveyances were made in conformity to the original act for the use of the United States; of course it was necessary to authorize the Commissioners to make any loan; that authority must go from this House. The question, is, whether it is best to place the property in the hands of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, or let it remain in the hands of the Commissioners; he thought the former the best, as it would be in the power of the PRESIDENT so to manage the loan as that it might not interfere with any lien made for the use of Government. With respect to the objection respecting mortgages, it was the same which he had already made, and would be removed by the amendment.

Mr. SITGREAVES was not perfectly satisfied with respect to his objections, and wished the Committee to rise, as, before he gave a vote on the subject, he wished for further information.

After a few observations from Mr. GILES, Mr. HAVENS, Mr. BRENT, Mr. VENABLE, Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. NICHOLAS, and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, the Committee rose, and asked leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 25.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SEDGWICK presented four different memorials from inhabitants of the second middle district, State of Massachusetts, complaining of the undue election of JOSEPH BRADLEY VARNUM, Esq., and praying for an investigation into the matter.

Mr. VARNUM said, this business was perfectly new to him. He inquired the number of petitioners, and was informed that one memorial contained 36 names, another 12, another 23, and another 6. He moved that the memorials be referred to the Committee of Elections; which, being seconded, was agreed to.

LOAN TO THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing a loan for the use of the City of Washington; and the motion being put for striking out the first and second sections, in order to introduce another in their place, it was carried—42 against 32.

The third section being read,

Mr. VENABLE moved an amendment, making the lots an appropriated fund for the repayment of the loan.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH thought this amendment would not answer the purpose. By it they appropriate property over which they have not absolute control. He said the fee simple of the property was in the hands of Trustees or Commissioners; that they have a right to sell, and can make good deeds. There were general words, indeed, in the trust designating the use; yet if these Trustees were not to appropriate the money to the completion of the public buildings, the titles which they had given to the property sold would not be injured. There was no way, he said, in which the United States could have an absolute sway over the property, but by a conveyance of it to some person for that purpose. For if the Commissioners can make a good title, they had no assurance that they might not sell the lots, and the United States be obliged to make good the loan. The United States should, therefore, have a control over the property before the loan be guaranteed. He thought the amendment did not go far enough. The lots should be conveyed to the PRESIDENT, as a fund to answer the guarantee, which he should have the power of selling, whenever he pleased to reimburse the loan. Any bill which did not give security to the United States, he could not agree to.

Mr. VENABLE said, the gentleman last up had mistaken the ground on which this property was held. He asserted that the Commissioners were subject to the control of the PRESIDENT in the sale of the property, and that they could not act without him. The conveyance to the Commissioners was only a conveyance in trust. They now come forward to request the United States to authorize them to borrow money, which, if they borrow, they must take up under the control of the PRESIDENT. The Commissioners, it was true, might abuse their trust, but if they did, they are answerable; nor will the abuse of their trust affect the title of lots sold according to the powers placed in them. The amendment, he said, would not at all alter the ground of the original act.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH said, the deed of conveyance to the Commissioners was not a deed of trust, and that the United States had no property in the lots. He read some clauses of the act to prove his assertion.

Mr. DWIGHT FOSTER wished to hear the deed referred to read. [It was read.]

Mr. GILES said, the amendment which had been introduced into the bill, permits the property to remain in the hands of the Commissioners; the bill, as brought in, proposed to convey the property to the PRESIDENT. Objection was made to the bill in its original form, because it connected Government in the business. He thought the Government no more concerned by directing the PRESIDENT to have the legal, than his having the equitable, right to the property. All Government does is to guarantee the deficiency. The only difference between the two plans is, the difference betwixt the responsibility of the PRESIDENT and the responsibility of the Commissioners. As to the objection that purchasers would not be ready to hold property sold by the Commissioners, it had no weight; the guarantee would satisfy every one. He had agreed to the amendment, but if gentlemen thought it material that a conveyance should be made from the Commissioners to the PRESIDENT, he should not object to it. He wished the bill to be so formed, as to meet general approbation.

Mr. NICHOLAS believed it was always in the discretion of the Commissioners to apply the money as they pleased; but they cannot make a title to any property without the consent of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. He must be as much a party as if the lots were vested in him, and no purchaser who had not the assent of the PRESIDENT, has a legal title. Government would not have accepted of the grant on other terms.

Mr. HAVENS thought there was a considerable difference betwixt the original act and the deed which had been read. He wished to know the reason of it.

Mr. DAYTON said, that he had not intended to have troubled the House again on this subject; but what had fallen from the gentleman from New Hampshire had alarmed him. That gentleman had said that the Commissioners had an absolute title of the property; that they could sell it as they pleased; so that the United States had no right to remove the Commissioners, no right to the buildings, nor any right to appropriate the money arising from the sale of lots. If this were the case, he would never vote for the bill. It has been also said, that the Commissioners may refuse to sell if they choose; were this so, it would furnish another reason for withholding his vote. He hoped the title of the property would be better understood, before the bill was further discussed. Three different gentlemen held different opinions on the subject, and he was at a loss to decide on the matter.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought the amendment did not go far enough; he did not think it sufficiently secured the United States. He would add a proviso, "that, before the lots were conveyed to the PRESIDENT, no money should be borrowed." He should wish also to have an additional amendment, in order to obviate the objections mentioned by the member from New Jersey, of the Commissioners having absolute power over the lots; and, when the loan is repaid, if any lots remain, they might be reconveyed to the Commissioners. If this amendment was agreed to, the PRESIDENT would have full power over the lots.

Mr. BRENT said, in order to convince the member from New York that the deed which had been read was in conformity to the act, he would read some clauses of the act. No particular mode of making the conveyance is pointed out, but it is left to the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES to make such a conveyance as he thought best. This conveyance fixes the fee simple of the property in the hands of the Commissioners, and obliges them to sell publicly, subject to the consent of the PRESIDENT, and that the money arising from the sale shall be appropriated to the erecting of buildings for Congress. The amendment is, therefore, no more than we ought to agree to.

With respect to what had fallen from a member from New Hampshire, that we were legislating on a subject on which we had no right, Mr. B. said they had a right to designate the disposition of the money, when it shall be received by the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES. By this amendment, it is said, the Commissioners may dispose of the property as they please; but the consent of the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES is necessary before any sale can be legitimately made. He could not, therefore, see any ground for the fears of gentlemen on this head.

Mr. SWIFT moved that the Committee rise. They were come, he said, to an important question on the title of the land. Some members say it is in the PRESIDENT, others, in the Commissioners, who have sold lots without the consent of the PRESIDENT. The House had heard the deed read, but it was a matter that could not be determined upon in a moment; it required to be examined. If the motion for the Committee's rising was carried, he should wish the bill to be referred back to a select committee.

Mr. BRENT hoped the Committee would not rise, but proceed with the consideration of the bill. He could not help thinking that the procrastination of this business did not arise so much from any doubts entertained on the subject of the title, as from a dislike to the bill itself.

Mr. CRABB said, the House had already deliberated a long time upon this business. If the bill contains a guarantee, that is all that is wanted. If the House will not agree to this, let the bill be thrown out at once. Clauses had been objected to which were immaterial. If gentlemen would show themselves in their proper colors, they might be met on proper grounds; at present they could not. A gentleman had said yesterday he blushed on account of the magnificence displayed in the public buildings carrying on in the Federal City, and hinted that no gift had been made to Government by certain States; but, he said, the public buildings would be an honor to the country; and, if he will refer to the Journals of the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland, he will find that each of those States have granted a considerable sum in money towards erecting the public buildings.

Mr. NICHOLAS wished the Committee to rise, in order to reconsider the business.

Mr. GILES said, there was a propriety in referring the bill to a select committee, as he thought they might be able to bring in a bill which would meet the wishes of the House.

The Committee rose, and the House refused it leave to sit again. The bill was then agreed to be recommitted, and that four additional members be added to the select committee to whom it was referred; and Mr. BRENT wishing to decline to act again on the committee, a member was voted for in his stead.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

The report of the committee to whom was referred the resolution which passed the House on Friday, respecting the case of American seamen, was read a first and second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

The report states, that the facts relative to the sufferings of American seamen are too notorious to need reference to particular cases, and recommends a plan to be adopted to afford them relief; the principal part of which is that two agents shall be appointed by the United States, one to be sent over to England, and the other to the West Indies, to inquire into the situation of American seamen; to release such as they are able to release, afford relief to others, and learn the number of citizens who have been illegally seized; and that proper offices be opened to which all American seamen may apply to obtain certificates of citizenship.

LOAN TO THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. DEARBORN moved a resolution to the following effect: "That the committee to whom is referred the bill authorizing a loan for the use of the City of Washington, be instructed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the plans of the buildings intended for public use at the permanent Seat of Government of the United States, and make their report thereon."

Mr. MURRAY hoped the resolution would not be agreed to. The buildings had progressed towards such a state of finishing as to put it out of the power of any one, without great waste of money, to make alterations in them. And, though gentlemen may see faults in the plans, or think the buildings too magnificent, yet, as they had no concern in originating these plans, and, as the plans or errors are out of the reach of amendment, what reason is there for the inquiry? No money is asked, either of this House or of the United States; and it would be, therefore, improper to undo what has been done by two States who have made large donations for this purpose. What, then, can be the object of this motion? Nothing can be done, except gentlemen can point to any error which can be rectified. And though he admitted these buildings were the property of the United States, yet there was a delicacy in interfering in a matter in which they had not expended any money. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would not be agreed to.

Mr. DEARBORN said, that if the committee found, upon due examination, that no alteration can be made with propriety in the public buildings alluded to, they would report accordingly. How these facts were it was at present uncertain. As to the question of delicacy, he said, if the business had gone on without application to them, it would have been improper to have interfered in it; but, as the assistance of Government was called for, he thought it became that House to make the proposed inquiry. If the plan was such as it would be impolitic to carry into effect, it would influence his vote on the subject; but if the plan was such as he approved, it would be otherwise. There could be no danger in making the inquiry.

Mr. CRAB thought the proposed inquiry very improper. The law, said he, has appointed the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES to manage this business. Suppose the inquiry were to take place, and the buildings are found on too large a scale, shall they be pulled down, and smaller ones erected? If gentlemen were indulged, where would their inquiries end? He read the Message of the PRESIDENT to the House on the subject, wherein he says the sale of the lots will be equal to the expense of the buildings. It would be well, he said, if gentlemen would gain a little more information on subjects, before they brought them forward. If this had been the case, he thought much of the debate which had occupied the House for several days might have been saved.

Mr. DEARBORN acknowledged he lacked information, but that he had attempted, without effect, to gain it from his accuser.

Mr. BOURNE did not see why the proposed resolution should not be agreed to. Considerable information had come out in the course of the debate on the subject of the public buildings, and more might be got. It appeared to be a subject of doubt whether the House have or have not the power of control over these buildings. The question is worth inquiry. If the committee thought an interference necessary, their report would be so framed. He believed much opposition to the bill for authorizing the loan had arisen from objections to the extravagant style of building employed in the Federal City.

Mr. MURRAY said, he did not think the resolution was worded as if it was intended to gain information. He said the public buildings had been erected under the control of the PRESIDENT, and according to plans, as he understood, first submitted to him. And, if he has acted legally and consistently, if he has not exceeded the powers given him, why should the House interfere in the business? He believed the trust had been performed in the best manner. If the object of the resolution had been to learn how far certain buildings were progressed, or other information, he should not have objected to it; but could not agree to it in its present form.

Mr. THATCHER wished to know if the committee found the buildings too large, they were to divide them, or cut off an end, or, if not large enough, enlarge them? The resolution appeared to give a greater latitude to the committee than he thought the mover intended. It would be difficult to form a judgment of the buildings unless they were in possession of the original plans.

Mr. GILES thought the committee should report facts to the House, and not their opinion, relative to the state of the public buildings at the permanent Seat of Government. He had a resolution, which he thought might be substituted in place of the one proposed.

Mr. DEARBORN said, the resolution just read did not go to the length he wished. He wished that if the house erecting for the PRESIDENT should be thought too large that it might be made the Capitol, and erect another in its stead, and perhaps on another piece of ground.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the House had been called on to guarantee a loan to complete the public buildings in the Federal City. It was proper, therefore, that they should examine what had been done and what remains to be done. This subject has been before the House several days. New facts have been developed, and it was necessary to make inquiry in order to mature the business. A gentleman had said the subject was already in very high and respectable hands; notwithstanding this, he had himself been upon the spot, and could say he had found plans had been frequently changed. Seeing, therefore, that the plan was not at first perfect, he saw no impropriety in vesting the inquiry in a committee. How can this House go into a guarantee without knowing the necessary facts relative to these buildings? The House will not be bound by the committee's report, but will act as they please. Many alterations may be made in what is not finished. This House, before now, has not interfered in the subject; but now the state of the case is altered—Government is called upon for a guarantee, and information is necessary.

Mr. GILES said, if the object of the resolution had been information, he should not have objected to it. He would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what effect the opinion of the select committee would have on him? He wished the gentleman who proposed the resolution would consent to have the one he had read substituted in its place, and suffer the opinion to be the result of facts.

Mr. GALLATIN said, it did not appear to him that the resolution proposed to be substituted in place of the one moved, included all the ideas of the mover. He supposed the committee would not only report their opinion, but the facts on which it was grounded. He saw no impropriety in incorporating both resolutions into one. The objections against the motion are not well-founded. It is stated that we have no control over the buildings, because the land was given by certain States, and because they have been erected under the direction of the PRESIDENT. But, though grants have been made by individuals, the whole of the value results from the Government being fixed there. The discretionary power was exclusively vested in the PRESIDENT. It was subject to one check; it not only gave him the power, but made it his duty to attend to it. The grants not proving sufficient, a demand is made either to give money or guarantee a loan. Money being asked, another check must be introduced, to say how far these buildings shall go. This House has a right to inquire not only the past expense, but what shall be expended in future. This resolution is, therefore, proper. He was a friend to the principle of the bill itself; he did not think any great change could be effected in the plans of the buildings; but it was necessary they should have all the information possible.

Mr. CORT hoped the motion would prevail; many of the objections to the bill guaranteeing the loan having arisen from a dislike to the extravagance of the buildings.

Mr. MURRAY said, it evidently appeared to him that, in consequence of an application to that House for a guarantee, which had been greatly perplexed, under shelter of objections and inquiries, labors were making rather to destroy than to finish the buildings. Gentlemen seemed inclined to destroy the power intrusted to the Commissioners, and with it the property of the city; and, after having taken down the present buildings, and fixed upon a different situation for them, they may proceed to new model the city, narrow the streets, &c., and, by doing this, violate the rights of private property. No man, if this intermeddling system prevails, can be safe; and, as soon as this principle is understood, it will shake the property of the place. It is a city in speculation, and one false step may prostrate it.

Mr. CRABB again strenuously opposed the resolution.

Mr. COOPER was opposed to the resolution. He said all they had to do in the business was to guarantee the loan, and get the security of the lots for the money.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, he had all along viewed the subject in one point of view. Accommodations were to be made for Government without any expense to the public. The Commissioners come forward and say they have property to do this, but that they cannot immediately procure money so as to complete the buildings in time, and ask for a guarantee to a loan. It was extraordinary, he said, for them to say the buildings were too magnificent, too commodious, too expensive. The better the buildings are the more honor it will be to those who erected them, and to those who occupy them. If they were too small and incommodious, there would be real ground of complaint. If that House undertook to say what should be the size of the buildings, they should do what they had no right to do. And, even if they were more splendid than European palaces, they should be grateful for them. The resolution was put and carried, 42 against 38.

Mr. GILES's resolution being called for, it was put and carried, to the following effect:

"That the said committee shall be instructed to inquire into the state of the Public Buildings at the permanent Seat of Government of the United States, into the expense already incurred in erecting, and the probable expense of completing the same."

And then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 26.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to call up a resolution laid on the table some days ago, to appoint a committee to bring in a bill for repealing the last section of the act for building and equipping a Naval Armament. He wished the sense of the House to be taken, whether, since a peace had been concluded with the Dey of Algiers, the frigates which were now building should or should not be completed. The resolution was read and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the subject of the frigates.

The order of the day being called for on the bill for relief in certain cases, for a limited time, of invalid registers of ships, a division took place; 32 members for the taking up the subject, and 31 against it. The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill, and having gone through it, without any other amendment than allowing it a duration of ninety instead of sixty days, the Committee rose, and the bill having gone through the House, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

The order of the day being taken up on the report of the select committee to whom was referred the act, with the amendments made by the Senate, for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, and the amendments being read,

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH thought the amendments very essential, as they changed the principle of the bill. He believed, they had not been printed, and as it was very improper to discuss their merits until opportunity was given to examine them, he should move that the subject be postponed until Wednesday. The Committee had recommended all the amendments to be rejected, except one; but as the House might have full information on the subject, he should wish the bill to be printed with the amendments and the report of the Committee. Agreed to.

COMPENSATION TO MEMBERS.

Mr. GILES moved that the bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and certain officers of both Houses, be taken up, which being agreed to, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole; and the bill being read,

Mr. SEDGWICK moved to strike out one of the clauses of the bill as unnecessary, which brought some observations from Mr. W. LYMAN and Mr. GOODHUE, against the propriety of striking out, and Mr. SEDGWICK withdrew his motion.

Mr. SWIFT wished to strike out the words making the Speaker a greater allowance than other members.

Mr. GILES thought a larger allowance ought to be made to the Speaker than to other members, as his duty was double that of any other member; but, if gentlemen wished to do away the incidental expenses of the office, he had no objection.

Mr. SWIFT consented to vary his motion according to the ideas of the member from Virginia. If the Speaker had more duty to perform than other members, he should be willing to make him a greater allowance, but he doubted it.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped no alteration would be made in the allowance heretofore made; he saw no reason for it.

Mr. GOODHUE said, he voted against the additional pay allowed the Speaker when the act first passed, as he saw no necessity for the Speaker to give dinners to the members of that House; but though he objected to this, he was willing to allow him recompense for his additional services. He hoped, however, the gentleman who now so ably filled the office, would not consider any thing said on this subject as alluding personally to him.

Mr. SEDGWICK was willing to give the money to the Speaker which had heretofore been paid him, and for the same purpose, although he and his colleagues were both against the measure when it originally passed.

Mr. DARTON wished the business might be discussed without reference to him personally. Indeed he believed he should not be materially affected by any regulations which might be agreed to, as, if he might judge by his present feelings, his health would not permit him to remain in the Chair after this session.

Mr. GILES was confident that no one meant to hurt the feelings of the gentleman who now filled the Chair. The member from Massachusetts had said, when the measure passed, he was against it, but now he was in favor of it. He could see no ground for this change of sentiment. Mr. G. said, he was against the money being paid for incidental expenses, but not against making the Speaker ample allowance for his services.

Mr. KITCHELL was also for striking out the words, but for making ample compensation to the Speaker.

Mr. BOURNE did not suppose that the incidental expenses of the Speaker were confined to the dinners which he gave them; he was put to more expense in receiving company than other members. He did not think six dollars a day too much for this.

Mr. MADISON said, it was customary in all the State Governments to make the Speaker a greater allowance than other members: his services were far greater; they were uninterrupted. Besides, it was necessary to do so to invite men of talents to accept of the office; and every one knew the advantages arising from having a man of talents as Speaker. Without inquiring whether the compensation was too large or too small, he doubted whether it was Constitutional to make any alteration in it which might affect the present Speaker. To support his opinions he read a clause of the Constitution.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was of opinion that nothing in the Constitution extended to the present question. He hoped they should agree to strike out the words alluded to, as the sooner the practice of feasting was abolished the better. If members wished to form social acquaintance, it was far preferable to visit each other at their lodgings. He said, this was the first time the law had come under review since it had passed, and it was proper to have the matter settled. He wished to allow a reasonable sum for the services of the Speaker but no more. He did not think there was any weight in the observation, that a large compensation was necessary to induce men of talents to accept of the Chair—he thought the honor was a sufficient inducement.

Mr. WILLIAMS said there was no office appertaining to the Speaker which included expence; the words ought therefore to be struck out.

Mr. PAGE was in favor of striking out the words, as he did not understand their meaning, but in favor of keeping the allowance of the Speaker the same as usual. The Speaker, he said, ought to be placed in an independent situation, by a handsome salary. His duties were fourfold to those of any other member. Indeed, said he, nothing but a sense of duty could induce a man to undertake such an office.

Mr. GILES said, if it was agreed to strike out the words for the incidental expenses of his office, he should move to introduce in their place, "on account of extra services annexed to his office."

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH liked the words proposed better than those in the bill, but did not think it of the importance it was made.

The motion for striking out was put and carried.

Mr. GILES then proposed his motion.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was against the introduction of these words.

Mr. VARNUM hoped the motion would prevail. The services of the Speaker are extraordinary and laborious. The State Legislatures, he said, always allowed their Speaker double the pay of other members.

Mr. MURRAY hoped the words would not obtain. He considered the Speakership of that House as a very elevated situation. In certain contingencies, he believed he was the Chief Executive of the United States. He thought the calculation of pay too mechanical. The dignity of the office was sufficient without extraordinary compensation; the duties of it were well known.

The question was put, and negatived.

Mr. GILES moved to fill up the blank for the daily allowance of members of the Senate with six dollars.

Mr. PAGE proposed seven; which, after a few observations from Mr. WILLIAMS in favor of six, the sense of the House was taken which was in favor of six dollars—only twenty-one members rising in favor of seven.

The allowance of the Speaker again coming into consideration, Mr. SWIFT wished an inquiry might be made into the duties of the office. It was his opinion that many members upon committees performed greater services than he; and if the Speaker had an extra allowance, they ought to have an extra allowance also. Some gentlemen thought, on the score of dignity, a high salary ought to be paid. He thought differently. Can it be supposed it would be necessary, said he, to give any member of this House double to accept of the office? No such thing. Being now discharged from any obligation to treat members, he could not agree to allow him the usual sum. He should not object to two or three dollars a day extra, but no more.

Mr. GILES thought the duty of the Speaker three times as arduous as that of any other member of the House.

Mr. CRABB voted for striking out the words, but he was not for diminishing the salary of the Speaker.

The motion for the usual allowance was put and carried, and the other blanks of the bill were filled up with the same sums as heretofore allowed to the different officers. The Committee rose; the bill then went through the House, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. W. SMITH moved the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the Internal Revenue.

Mr. GILES objected to taking up this business until they received the information which had been asked for from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The sense of the House being taken, there appeared for consideration 86, against it 83. The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole—

Mr. S. SMITH moved that the Committee rise, as it was not in possession of the necessary information to go into the proposed inquiry. Near twelve months had elapsed, he said, since the Secretary of the Treasury was applied to for the accounts now wanted. The resolutions which the Committee of Ways and Means report, go to new-modify the revenue laws. They may have had some information to enable them to form a judgment upon the subject which the House had not. The House cannot agree to the proposed change until they have information on the subject. If the officer of the Treasury had obeyed the order of that House given last session, they might have proceeded in the business, but at present they could not.

Mr. W. SMITH had no objection to the Committee's rising. The Committee of Ways and Means, he said, had obtained information from the Commissioner of the Revenue on the subject, but that they did not think it proper to lay that information before the House, as they understood this Commissioner was preparing a more perfect account for the House. The report, he said, did not go to change the method of collecting the revenue, it went only to certain changes which they thought would materially improve the present plan. If the Committee was of the same opinion, the report might be referred back; but if the Committee wished to wait for further information, he should not object to its doing so.

Mr. GALLATIN said, the gentleman from Maryland was right in the principle he had laid down. No doubt the Committee of Ways and Means ought not only to give their opinion, but all the facts on which it rests. On this subject there would have been no hesitation, but for one thing. The Commissioner of the Revenue seems to be the proper officer to make the report to this House. A conference took place on the subject betwixt him and the Committee of Ways and Means. He said he had taken all the steps in his power to get the information wanted, but that it was not yet complete; and that, as he was inclined to make the report as perfect as possible, he wished that it might be postponed until he could complete it; but it was desired he would, in the mean time give the best information he could to the Committee of Ways and Means. He did so. Upon these documents the committee have acted.

The House may, therefore, either wait till the report comes from the Commissioner, or they may direct the committee to give an extract from the information before them. He wished the Committee to rise, until the necessary information was obtained.

Mr. GILES gave some account of the progress of this inquiry into the state of the revenue, and complained of the length of time taken to give the information required on the subject. Until this was before the House, he doubted whether any gentleman was even prepared to speak as to the proportion that the expense of collecting bore to the revenue. He hoped that the Committee would therefore rise.

Mr. HILLHOUSE hoped the proper officer would be called upon for the necessary information, and not the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Committee having rose, Mr. GILES proposed to the House a resolution to the following effect, which, after a number of observations from different members on its propriety, was agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish this House with such a statement of the internal revenue of the United States as can be prepared in pursuance of a resolution of the 2d March, 1795.

REFUNDING DUTIES.

The order of the day being called for on a bill for affording relief to Jose Roiz Silva, in returning him an excess of duty paid on a cargo of wine, also on a bill for the relief of Israel Loring, allowing him a certain drawback on certain indigo; they went through the Committee of the Whole, and through the House without amendment, and were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday.

A communication was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing an account of the expenditures for the quarter closing the 31st December.

BENJAMIN TITCOMB.

The report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Benjamin Titcomb, a Colonel in the late war, was read; they lament that no general relief can be granted to him, and that to grant special relief might be attended with bad consequences, and therefore recommend that he have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. RUTHERFORD spoke in favor of the report of the petitioner.

Mr. W. LYMAN hoped a provision would be made for this gentleman, and some others in a similar situation. There ought to be a distinction made, he said, between wounded officers and those who were fortunate enough to escape without wounds. He hoped the report would not be agreed to.

Mr. SHERBURNE thought this petitioner might be provided for without infringement on the laws which militate against his claim. Indeed, he said, it would be most disgraceful to the country to turn a deaf ear to such a sufferer. He wished the Committee to rise, as he would, on a future day, bring forward the discussion whether this petitioner is not, as a wounded officer, entitled to a pension, and, as serving to the end of the war, to half-pay.

The Committee now rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 29.

Mr. SWANWICK presented a petition from the manufacturers of hats in Philadelphia, together with several others from manufacturers of hats in different parts of the Union, praying that an additional duty may be laid on hats imported from Europe, in order to encourage the American manufacture; which were severally referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill for allowing compensation to members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives, and certain officers of both Houses; also the bill for relief for a limited time, in certain cases, of invalid registers of ships, were read a third time and passed without a division.

The bill for the relief of Jose Roiz Silva, and the bill for the relief of Israel Loring, were read a third time and passed; but a division of the House being called for on each, for the former there stood up 51 members in favor of it—the negatives were not taken; for the latter there were 43 in favor of its passing, and 27 against it.

IMPRESSMENT OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. LIVINGSTON wished the order of the day to be postponed, in order to take up the report of the committee to whom was referred the resolution he had laid on the table respecting the impressment of American seamen; which being agreed to, the House went into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARPER had hoped when this resolution was committed to a select committee, some statements would have been brought forward, some facts produced, upon which to found the proposed inquiry. The committee have reported that they do not think it necessary to adduce any particular instances in which American seamen have been impressed by foreign nations—the facts, they alleged, are too notorious to require particularizing. He could not suppose these gentlemen would believe that that House could proceed to legislate on uncertain newspaper reports. He trusted they would afford some proof who, what number, when, and where American seamen have been impressed. Until this was done, he should doubt the fact. He was heard, he believed, by Representatives from every port in the United States, and if the fact was so notorious as to need no further evidence, he doubted not some of these gentlemen would be able to give some account of the business.

If the facts were established, Mr. HARPER believed there would be but one opinion on the propriety of granting relief; but before they proceeded farther, some information was necessary respecting the existence of this abuse. He had applied to the office of the Secretary of State, and to other offices likely to afford information on the subject, but he found no instance of impressment complained of in which redress had not been given. But, if any such instances did exist, in which relief has been applied for and not obtained, some of the gentlemen from some of the seaports will be able to mention them. If not, he hoped the Committee would rise, and recommit the report.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, the present measure was intended to afford relief to such of their distressed fellow-citizens as had been illegally seized on the high seas. The gentleman, he said, who brings forward objections to the proposed inquiry was in his place when the resolution upon which the report of the committee is founded passed unanimously. Why did he not then come forward? [Mr. HARPER said he was not in the House at the time.] The resolution does not direct the committee to inquire into facts; they were considered as notorious, and nothing seemed necessary but to fix upon the best mode of furnishing relief. The Legislature of the United States have formerly had evidence, and they have acted upon it. If the gentleman will look into the proceedings of the last session of Congress, he will find a considerable sum granted to Mr. Cutting, for the relief of this distressed body of men. Some he relieved, others he did not. When the dignity of the nation, said he, is insulted, in the persons of our fellow-citizens, it is necessary at least to make inquiry into their sufferings.

A remark had fallen, Mr. L. said, from the member from South Carolina, which he wished to notice. He said he had applied to the office of the Secretary of State, and found there no complaint which had not been redressed. Now, he had waited upon the Secretary of State, as Chairman of the committee, in vain for information on this subject. He informed him that he could not give him the evidence which it appears he has given to the member from South Carolina. How, he wished to know, happened it that a member who opposes the inquiry in question should be furnished with that information which is denied to a member who supports it?

It is said, added Mr. L., that we are attempting to legislate without evidence. Though no facts are at present before the House, it is notorious that numerous instances have been made known to

Government, and the present measure is meant to inquire into the cases of sufferers, and remedy them as far as possible. It is admitted by the member from South Carolina that facts have existed, but that they have been removed. If these grievances, then, said he, have existed, let us prevent them in future. Let us not wait till it is too late to grant relief. The men, said he, who suffer by the depredations complained of, are at a great distance from their homes and friends in foreign ports, dragged on board tenders, and made to experience every hardship which can be conceived; and now, when a mode is proposed for the relief of these distressed citizens, evidence is called for! If one of these men is confined in the East Indies, can evidence of his bondage be expected to be given here? Such hardships have existed, and it was their business to prevent them from again occurring. He hoped, therefore, the Committee would not rise, as he trusted there was sufficient evidence on which to ground the inquiry.

Mr. HARPER wished to remark, on what had fallen from the member from New York, on the Secretary of State's refusing information to certain members and giving it to others. He applied to the office of the Secretary of State, to learn whether there were any documents there to support the proposed inquiry, and was informed there were only two cases; in one of which application was made to the British Government. Four persons were said to have been impressed; but, on inquiry it appeared that two of them were British subjects, and the other two had enlisted into the service. The other complaint came to the office when the Secretary of State was much engaged in other concerns, but he believed relief was granted. This, he said, was verbal information. He had applied for written documents on the subject, and doubted not he should receive them as soon as other business would permit.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, some observations had been made by him which implicated the Secretary of State. Those observations, he said, arose from the manner in which the member from South Carolina had mentioned his having received information from the Secretary of State's office. He had said that he had learnt from the office certain particulars which he himself had not been able to learn. If the gentleman had explained the manner in which he had gained the information at first, it would have prevented him from making a charge which appeared to him, at the time, but too well founded.

Mr. BOURNE said, the member from New York must know that the Secretary of State had said, that he would prepare the information wanted as soon as other business would give him time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON explained, and said that he had not complained that the information he applied for was refused, but delayed.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the member from South Carolina had called for information: he conceived no particular information necessary. He could mention an instance in which he had immediate concern. A vessel of his, going to the West Indies, had all her hands taken out of her, and obliged to work the guns of the English frigate; and on their expostulating, that though they were prisoners, they did not wish to work the guns, they were threatened with whipping; and the Captain was told, if he interfered, he should be whipped and sent home to England in irons. If he had thought facts were wanting, by a single advertisement in one of the Philadelphia papers they would have been overpowered with facts. But, if he had done so, he supposed he should have been charged with raising dissatisfaction in the minds of the people, or with encouraging Jacobinical principles: he therefore did not do it. But, without going out of the walls of the House, he said, he found evidence sufficient. He read an extract from the communication of the Secretary of State, dated March 2, 1794, in which were mentioned the representations made by sundry merchants of Philadelphia (of whom he was one) respecting the impressments of American seamen. This document was thought sufficiently strong, to make an article of instruction to Mr. Jay in his late negotiation; but, owing to certain difficulties, no specific agreement was entered into by him for their relief.

The plan now before the House, said Mr. S., is intended to remedy the difficulties which have been urged as obstacles in this business, by opening registers in which to enter every American seaman, by which may be known, at any time, the number of seamen belonging to the United States, and by means of which every such seamen would be possessed of a certificate of his citizenship.

The object of the Committee, said Mr. S., is that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES shall send agents to England and the West Indies, in order to afford relief to any American citizens who may have been illegally seized. Every one knows, said he, what has been felt on account of American seamen carried into Algiers. No evidence was required with respect to their numbers, or how they were employed. The united exertions of the whole American people seemed to cry out for their release, and the business at length has been effected. And let us not, said he, attend to our distressed citizens in one part, but in all parts of the world. Let us not, he said, be too nice about evidence. These men are generally ignorant, and cannot give the necessary information; he thought, however, they had information sufficient for legislating upon in the present case. He hoped, therefore, the report would not be recommitted, until the committee had discussed the subject.

Mr. TRACY believed that every member in that House felt the propriety of extending the benefit of the laws to every class of citizens, and to none more than to American seamen. Some members seemed to suppose that the distresses of American seamen have been looked upon with apathy; but if due attention had been paid to the efforts of Government, it would have been seen that they had always been duly attended to. It was well known that great difficulties arose when it was attempted to distinguish between English and American seamen. This has been the reason why ample regulations have not always taken place. He hoped the Government would be popular, and that the new members in the House would assist the old ones to render it more and more so; but thought the Government ought not to be charged with apathy without giving due attention to what Government had done.

Mr. T. proceeded to take notice of the resolutions proposed in the report. He inquired what good the agent to be sent to Great Britain would do? Are their seamen, said he, employed at but one place? Had not the United States Consuls at every port, and can they not do the business? He wished for information on the subject. A great part of the seamen were foreigners, he said, and it would be very difficult to separate them. If the plan proposed, however, can be made to appear to be beneficial, he would heartily join in effecting the desired relief to the class of citizens alluded to.

Mr. GOODHUE said, the member from New York, on bringing forward this subject, had charged Government with looking upon the distresses of American seamen with apathy, and blushed on account of its conduct towards them. He represented, he believed, twenty times the number of American seamen that that gentleman represented. He was himself, indeed, formerly a seaman; yet he did not believe the evil complained of existed to any alarming degree. Mr. CUTTING, it had been said, had relieved many seamen; that was in the year 1790. Last Summer, the British took many vessels bound to France, but they did not take the crews. There were some instances, he said, in which seamen had been impressed, and he should be in favor of every necessary step to afford them relief. But no obloquy should be thrown on the Government. Neither does the evil exist to the extent it might have been supposed when the subject was brought forward. A member from Pennsylvania had mentioned a particular instance: he could mention a particular instance of a French officer who had so ill-treated some American seamen as to be cashiered, on a representation being made to the French Government.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, that he had not expected an opposition to the resolution under consideration on the ground of fact; that he could not have supposed any member would have questioned the existence of the evils which the propositions were calculated to remedy. He entertained a belief that the impressments of American seamen, particularly on board of British ships of war, was a matter of too great notoriety to need any evidence at this time. But the member from South Carolina, who manifested the most zealous opposition to these measures, had admitted that there had existed instances of this sort: and as it must follow that what had once existed might again exist, it behooved Congress to make provisions tending to prevent, or at least most speedily and efficaciously to remedy, them.

Mr. D. declared, that he heartily approved the object of the resolution as originally proposed by the member from New York, and the general principles of the report founded thereon, as a question of humanity, and of great national policy. It was, however, with pain that he heard the worthy mover draw into unfavorable question the conduct of the Secretary of State, and indulge himself in some severe reflections and imputations upon that officer. Mr. D. ascribed it to an irritability—and perhaps an honest irritability—upon this subject, so affecting and interesting to Americans. He ascribed it to a warmth of temper in which, in this particular case, the cooler judgment of that gentleman, and the knowledge of the real character and conduct of the Secretary of State, had no agency or influence. The expressions which had been uttered by some gentlemen, in the course of the discussion, tending to charge our Government with a criminal apathy and indifference towards this description of citizens, did by no means, Mr. D. said, meet with his approbation. He believed them to be unfounded; for he was persuaded that whenever it was informed, it did whatever it could to relieve the seamen of the United States, and to obtain for those who unfortunately needed it, complete redress. Having said thus much in vindication of the conduct of the Government, he returned to the resolution itself, and declared himself its advocate. It contained, neither in its words nor spirit, any imputation upon the Executive, of the sort hinted at. The question was, simply, whether the seamen of America should, when impressed by foreigners, wait the slow process of a representation of their situation to the Government in the American metropolis, or be furnished with a protector in every country, and almost in every port.

In the former case, every one must perceive it more than possible, that owing to distance and the time which must consequently be expended in the communication to and remonstrance from our Government, an American citizen might be impressed and compelled to serve months—perhaps years—in a service which he detested, and possibly forced to apply the match to cannon charged with balls, aimed for the destruction of his friends.

Mr. D. said, he rose principally to inquire whether the plan proposed by the committee was the most effectual one. He wished to hear from the Chairman, or some other member, whether they had attended to the circumstance of our having Consuls in many ports, and had weighed the propriety of investing them with the powers in question. These officers appeared, at first view, the most fit and convenient for the purpose, on account of their number, their situation, and the saving of expense.

Mr. BOURNE said it appeared, on inquiry, that the United States had no Consul in the West Indies, and that as Consuls received no salary for their services, it was thought best to appoint a person specially to undertake the business in question. He believed, however, that the duty ought to devolve on Consuls in Great Britain, as it is the duty of Consuls to relieve distressed seamen wherever they may be found. This may be done with much less expense and with more efficacy.

With regard to the information on the subject, Mr. B. said, it did not appear that any considerable number of seamen had been impressed lately, or since the negotiation of Mr. Jay. In that nenegotiation, it appears some difficulties were suggested, and no general regulation on the subject took place; but the English Minister assured Mr. Jay that fresh instructions should be given to the commanders of their vessels, and, in consequence, many complaints have not since arisen. There are not, he believed, at present, many American seamen in the British service—most of them being discharged; yet it is possible, from the many impressed some years ago, relief might be afforded by sending an agent to the West Indies. It was possible, he said, that American seamen on board vessels taken by Bermudians may still be detained, who might be relieved by this agent.

Mr. B. proposed to amend the resolution, by striking out that part of it which appoints an agent for Great Britain, and confine the sending of an agent to that part of the English possessions in the West Indies to which the greatest number of American vessels sail.

Mr. LIVINGSTON was pleased to see gentlemen concur in endeavoring to form a plan for the relief of American seamen. It has been asked why the Consuls were not intrusted with this business. The committee considered, that as the Consuls of the United States received no other recompense for their services than the dignity and consequence which their office gives them, they would not be likely to pay sufficient attention to a business of this kind. They considered the immense labor of Mr. Cutting to deliver the impressed American seamen. They supposed, therefore, if the duty were laid upon the Consuls, a salary should be annexed to their office; but as there is no Consul in the West Indies, a special agent should be appointed. In order to bring a view of the subject before the House, he would inquire how relief is to be afforded to a seaman who has been impressed? Suppose he is seized in London; he is sent down to Portsmouth. The agent must attend immediately—get certificates—pay fees of office—employ counsel, &c., to release a single seaman;—a trouble he believed no Consul would take. The committee supposed that the solemnity of commissioning an agent especially on the business would convince foreign Powers that they would no longer suffer the British, or others, to exercise that power over American seamen which they themselves could not exercise. It is to be hoped, also, that when the Government of Great Britain sees a step of this sort taken, she will give up the practice of seizing American seamen, and let them pass in quietness. If not, the agents employed could transmit to this country an account of what seamen were seized by them, and every particular respecting the same. This consideration influenced the committee, and he trusted it would influence the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON next remarked on what had been said on the introduction of this business into the House. It was said that a young member had thrown obloquy on the Government. He had uttered nothing but facts; he had said that the distressed American seamen had for five years looked in vain for relief. The Government might have had prudential reasons for its conduct. He thought it time, however, the subject was attended to. It was true he was young, but he was not inattentive to public business, and he should always hold it his duty to persevere in such measures as appeared to him calculated to promote the public good; nor should he be deterred from engaging in a business because it had not been attempted before, for that principle would shut out all improvement. Mr. L. said his friend from New Jersey had made an apology for his heat on opening the business; he was sure he was actuated by the best motives in doing so, but he did not think his conduct needed an apology. And what he had said with respect to the Secretary of State, he thought justified, from his conduct towards him, and from hearing a member say he had recourse to his office, he supposed that gentleman had received information which he could not receive. It arose from error, and the method of communication adopted by that member; he was, therefore, justified in his remarks; as, though it was a mistake, it was caused by that member, and no fault of his.

Mr. GOODHUE agreed with the member from Rhode Island [Mr. BOURNE.] He supposed it the duty of Consuls to attend to the cases of impressed seamen. There was no need, therefore, to send an agent to England.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that as the member from South Carolina had called upon gentlemen from seaports for evidence, if they were silent, it would be supposed no information could be given on the subject under discussion. He supposed he should be prevented from giving this information now, because the amendment of the first resolution was under consideration. [The House called for information.] He said he represented a port where the fact of American seamen being impressed by the British was so notorious that every man knew it. But how, said he, is this information to be got and transmitted to the Secretary of State? No complaint is likely to reach his office, except brought there by merchants. In his own trade, he had frequent instances of this sort almost in every voyage. He could not say the men impressed were always Americans, but they were men sailing under the authority of the United States. We have a flag, under that flag men are seized, and they have a right to expect, when seized, redress from Government. There is no difference between British and Algerines, for, by the former, they are compelled to fight against those whom they wish well, which is equal to any slavery that can be imposed. He said, that from one of his ships there were two New England men impressed; one of whom being a stout, courageous man, wished to have defended himself against his assailants; but the supercargo said, no, this will risk the cargo of the owner. This advice he gave, supposing Government would afford these men relief.

If the member from South Carolina wished for such information as would be received before a Court of Judicature, it could not be got. Mr. S. thought sufficient attention had not been paid by Government to the merchants and seamen. Mr.

FEBRUARY, 1796.]

Impressment of American Seamen.

Jay, in his communication to Lord Grenville, says, an impressment of American seamen had taken place, who had been forced to fight, &c. If this had not been so, it had not been written by Mr. Jay, nor would Lord Grenville have promised relief. He hoped this information would be thought sufficient.

With respect to the business being transacted by Consuls, he believed America had only two in England, who are merchants, and who, having no salary, could not be expected to go from one part of the kingdom to the other. It was said by the member from Massachusetts [Mr. GOODHUE] that few American citizens sailed from the part of the country he came from; but would he not have citizens sailing from every part of the Union equally protected? It had been said that there were not many instances of American seamen impressed; but, suppose there were but one man, and he a negro, suffering under the galling yoke of impressment, it is the duty of Government to provide relief for that man. The same member has said that the Quiberon vessels did not impress the crews of the ships; he said it was sufficient to take their flour and pay them nine dollars for what might have been sold the next day for twenty or upwards. Mr. S. concluded by observing, that if we were a feeble nation, we had a right to expect justice; but he hoped we were not so feeble as some gentlemen imagined. He was pleased that a majority of the House was inclined to improve the resolution, rather than to destroy it.

Mr. GOODHUE said, he thought as ill of the British on account of their conduct in taking American vessels as any member; he mentioned only that the crews were not taken. He believed representations were made by Government respecting the conduct of the British. He was willing to join in any necessary measures for the protection of seamen. He did not think it would be necessary to send special agents to England.

Mr. MADISON observed, that the gentleman from Rhode Island who made the motion now in question, thought it unnecessary to send agents to Great Britain, because America had Consuls there. The member lately up from Maryland had anticipated what he intended to have remarked on that subject. He did not think the Consuls could do all that agents might. The Consuls are but two in number in the Kingdom, who receive no recompense, except an increase of business from their public character. Under these circumstances, if they do their ordinary functions, it is as much as can be expected; the business now wanted to be done is extraordinary. Besides, Consuls are unequal to the task. Men are seized, put on board vessels allotted for the purpose, until ships of war be ready to receive them. It is a heavy business, therefore, for a person to follow up the inquiry and go in pursuit of persons thus seized. If an agent or agents should be sent to Great Britain, no other business will require his or their attendance. After the present motion is decided, he should wish to have the words struck out, "fixing the place of residence for agents," and leave it in the power of the PRESIDENT to appoint that particular.

Mr. HARPER always believed it necessary to have information on any subject on which that House legislated; but in this particular case, it seems it may be dispensed with; it is unnecessary to know whether any seamen have been impressed, or whether there be any at present impressed; and when a gentleman asks for information, he is represented as zealously opposing a measure in which he wished every necessary relief to be given. He should not inquire into the reason for this conduct, nor suffer it to deter him from doing his duty. He did not wish to make public professions of love to his country, but to leave his conduct to speak for him. He had understood that zeal, unless founded on knowledge, was not a very beneficial thing, and that the public good might be attained without vehement speeches. Under this conception he should continue to act, and he would leave other gentlemen to act a contrary part if they chose. He again called for the information he asked for before. He had called upon the Representatives of every seaport in the Union for information; he had received none. He then took notice of the different kinds of evidence which had been adduced, and would not allow it any weight. He said he was disposed, as far as prudence, necessity, and justice, required, to afford relief to his suffering fellow-citizens, but he should never agree to proceed in a business until he understood the nature of the grievances complained of. He said the Executive had a right to interfere when representations were made to him; the authority lodged in him is sufficient, and Legislative means are unnecessary. If his power did not enable him to do this, he should be disposed to arm him with the necessary power. He did not believe the cases of prisoners made by the Algerines, and men impressed by the British, materially different, except in the evidence of the fact. He had, indeed, seen certificates in the newspapers asserting that sixty men had been taken from American vessels, by one English frigate, but he did not believe it, because there was no other evidence of the fact. Mr. H. concluded by observing, that if the Committee thought differently from him, he should heartily give his consent to what the majority may approve. He thought a sufficient number of agents should be appointed, and that they should be placed in situations, not in which their own private interests might be best served, but where the public business required them. He would also have these agents paid a salary equal to their services. He was opposed to the amendment of the member from Rhode Island.

Mr. BOURNE rose to enlarge his amendment, leaving a greater power in the hands of the PRESIDENT, with respect to the appointment of agents.

Mr. BALDWIN wished the resolution to be so modelled as to enable the PRESIDENT to take the most effectual means to inquire into the situation of American seamen who may have been impressed by foreign Powers. He believed, though different members held different opinions on the subject, they were equally inclined to effect the object in view. The Consuls were not sufficient, he said, but he would have it left to the PRESIDENT to appoint what persons he thought proper to do the business, and they must provide the necessary means.

Mr. GILES could not agree to striking out the duty of the agents; he thought it as necessary to say what the duty of the agents should be as to appoint them. He did not wish their place of residence to be designated—they might be employed in going to different countries. He was for getting redress from France as well as from England. He said it was somewhat singular to hear particular evidence called for, on the present question, after the general form of the resolution had been unanimously agreed to. It has been granted that American citizens have been impressed, but it is not known but they may be now at liberty. If coolness and deliberation, said Mr. G., do not give more information than the gentleman from South Carolina seems to possess, it would be well if he had a little more of the zeal he blames in others. They had endeavored heretofore to furnish a remedial redress to the evil complained of, but without effect; they wished now to take preventive means. If there are persons in bondage, they will be relieved; if not, future impressments will be prevented. He thought there could be no doubt of the fact. But he said the probability of danger was sufficient. At the breaking out of every war, neutral Powers are liable to have their rights invaded, and persons might be placed with propriety to prevent depredations on them. A circumstance had been mentioned that the British colonial regulations are such as to prevent a Consul residing there; it is doubtful, therefore, whether an agent commissioned by the present bill would be permitted to remain. It requires consideration. We have heard, said he, remarks on different kinds of citizens; it is the duty of Government to defend alike the native and the naturalized citizen.

The certificates of citizenship proposed to be given by this measure would accomplish this end. The similarity of language of British and Americans requires this step. If Britain discovers, said he, that we are determined to defend our seamen, she will forbear to injure them.

Mr. GOODHUE accorded with the member of Georgia not to designate the place of residence of agents. He thought there were not many impressed American seamen in Great Britain; he believed there were more in Hispaniola. Gentlemen had doubted whether agents would be allowed to reside in the British West India Colonies; he believed they would; the reason America had no agents there, was, they had no trade there.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, if the gentleman who brought forward the present question, had been in the House when the subject was formerly discussed, he would have seen that the feelings of members were sufficiently alive towards their fellow-citizens—the American seamen. He believed there had been instances of impressment, and that they ought to be inquired into. What had been done for their relief, he knew not, but did not doubt that the Executive had taken proper measures.

Mr. GALLATIN hoped the amendment would be adopted, as it had a tendency to unite the different opinions of members. As to a degree of sensibility taking place in any gentleman, it was not surprising. The first degree of heat displayed on the occasion appeared in a member opposing the business. The report before the House, said he, stated, merely, that the sufferings of our fellow-citizens are too notorious to need proof, and the feelings of every man would establish the truth. He would even ask the member from South Carolina himself, if he did not believe the fact? the only question was, whether this public notoriety was sufficient to ground their proceedings upon? In many cases it would not; but in a case where they might do good and no harm, they might safely act upon it. But, he said, there was an official report before the House in which the fact is mentioned. They had not had the Treaty between this country and Great Britain laid before them, but they had been officially informed of it, and there is no provision in that Treaty for the grievances here complained of. A gentleman has told the House, that Mr. Jay had made a representation on the subject, and that his representation was unsuccessful, so far as that it did not procure an article in the Treaty; but if they have confidence enough in the assurance of a British Minister, that Great Britain will protect American seamen in future, no farther steps are necessary; but if not, they should let the Governments of different nations know that proper means were taken for their protection. Mr. G. did not mean to tax any branch of Government with not having done its duty; he hoped it would not be made the business of the select committee to go into a detail of facts; he wished the bill to be general, and thought the facts sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. GILBERT was in favor of the business under contemplation, and of the amendment proposed; but wished for information, as, upon the extent of the evil, the number of agents to be employed would depend. He wondered there should be any objection to this; he wanted it not only for himself, but that the country might know the whole extent of the mischief.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said the proposed measures would give gentlemen the information wanted of unfortunate individuals at three thousand miles' distance, as it was proposed to send them a friend to inquire into their sufferings. He would state for the information of the gentleman from South Carolina, evidence which came within his own knowledge. The ship Somerset, from New York to Bordeaux, was taken on her passage home, by an English man-of-war, five of the crew were impressed, three of whom were American citizens. He hoped, therefore, after this fact, he might depend on his vote. He had no great objection to the amendment, though he wished the business to have continued as at first stated.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, that in order to know how far the appropriation of money is necessary to enable the PRESIDENT to go into the subject, the extent of the evil should be ascertained.

Impressment of American Seamen.

Mr. W. LYMAN liked the original form of the resolution better than the present. He said there were very few causes of complaint except against Great Britain, and he thought it a kind of false charge to charge other nations. It had the appearance of timidity. Gentlemen had said there was nothing but newspaper information to act upon; if there were no more, this, he thought, would be sufficient ground to inquire into the fact. There would be an expense indeed of five or ten thousand dollars, but he thought it better to pay this sum than that a single citizen should lie in chains. He was of opinion that there had not been too much, but too little sensibility discovered on this occasion.

Mr. BOURNE said, that the gentleman who spoke last had objected to the resolution because it included other nations with the British, though a member, in the course of the present debate, had mentioned an instance of a French privateer having so notoriously abused some American seamen, that the commander of the vessel was cashiered on a representation being made to that Government. With respect to the information wanted by the gentleman from South Carolina, he wished him to recollect what had happened at Rhode Island at a time when Government was sitting there. Nine citizens, he said, were discovered bound in fetters on board a British vessel, and taken out of it; and it is possible, added he, that this may be the situation of numbers of citizens of the United States. He approved of the resolution, because it made it the PRESIDENT's duty to appoint the agents, and the duty of the House to appropriate the money.

Mr. REED said, it seemed to be a doubt whether any American citizen was at present in the power of the British. Bishop White had mentioned to him, he said, that he had lately received a letter from an American sailor on board a British ship now lying at Halifax, whose mother lives in this city, entreating that some interference might be made on his behalf.

Mr. GILES did not wish to encroach on the duty of the PRESIDENT, nor did he think it would be any, to say agents should be appointed, and leave it to him to appoint them. He was of opinion with the member from Rhode Island, that American citizens should be attended to in other countries as well as in Great Britain. He had not heard of any impressments but by the British, but he had heard of captivities; and that House had heard of a French officer being cashiered for ill-treating American citizens; but it had heard no instance of Great Britain punishing officers for ill-treating American citizens. No; this marked the different character of the two nations towards the Americans.

A rising of the Committee being called for, it rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. W. SMITH presented a report from the Committee of Ways and Means, respecting an appropriation for the Military Department, who recommended a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved, That the sum of five hundred thousand dollars be appropriated towards the defraying of the Military Establishment for the year 1796."

Read a second time, and ordered to be recommended to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.
Adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 1.

A memorial was presented from Richard Taburn, praying for a law to be enacted to encourage the introduction of the Useful Arts into this country, by allowing citizens who prevail with foreigners to bring over their discoveries to this country, to participate with them in the advantages to be derived therefrom. After some conversation on the propriety of admitting this memorial to be referred to the committee to whom was referred the bill for the encouragement of the Useful Arts, it was ordered for the present to lie on the table.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House having agreed to postpone the unfinished business of yesterday, to take up the report of the Committee of Ways and Means for an appropriation for the Military Establishment for 1796, presented yesterday—the House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and went through the report without amendment. It was suggested by Mr. NICHOLAS whether a less sum than $500,000 would not be sufficient for the present provisional supply. Mr. W. SMITH and Mr. SEDGWICK said that a less sum might answer the present purpose, but that it would make no real difference whether two hundred or five hundred thousand dollars were granted, being only on account of expenditure, which would require, it was supposed, near a million and a half of dollars. As the bill passed through the House, Mr. GALLATIN observed, that if any member wished a less sum to be granted for the present, a less sum might be agreed to. No amendment being proposed, the report was agreed to, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill.

TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

The Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, concluded between the United States of America and His Britannic Majesty, having been duly ratified, and the ratifications having been exchanged at London on the 28th day of October, 1795, I have directed the same to be promulgated; and herewith transmit a copy thereof for the information of Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 1, 1796.

The note from the PRESIDENT accompanying the Treaty, and the additional article being read, the Treaty and papers accompanying it were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

The order of the day on the report for providing relief to American seamen, being taken up,

Mr. SWANWICK rose to inform the House, that since he was in his place yesterday, he had been called upon with evidence on the subject now before the Committee, in consequence of the call made for it in the course of the debate. The instances he had given to him were, the case of Robert Norris, a native of Princeton, in New Jersey, and five others, who sailed on board the American brig Matilda, Captain Burke, from Philadelphia, which sailed from this port in May last, for Bordeaux, and were, on the 9th of July, brought to by four British frigates, forcibly taken out of the vessel, impressed, and compelled to go and serve on board one of the said frigates, called the Stag, where they served four months, when the said Robert Norris made his escape from the frigate at Sheerness, at the risk of his life, and returned in January last to the United States. His companions he believes are yet in bondage. The other instance was the brig Sally, Captain Wilkins, which sailed from this port in May last, bound to Madeira, and five days after leaving the Capes was brought to by the Rattlesnake sloop-of-war, Captain York, and the mate (a native of Scotland, but who had sailed for many years out of the United States) and one of the best seamen, (an American,) taken out. They were carried to Halifax, from whence the foremast man made his escape, and arrived here the beginning of July. Before they arrived at Halifax, he informs, that fifteen men were taken out of American vessels. Mr. S. read also an account from an owner of several other impressments.

Mr. MADISON said, if the motion under discussion was meant to supersede the appointing of agents, he should object to it. Perhaps, he said, a question might arise whether an agent of this kind might be an officer of the United States. But, however this might be, the Constitution said that no office could be created and filled by the same power; this being the case, that House ought to establish the office, and leave the PRESIDENT to fill it. Besides, if it be the intention of the House to furnish relief to the objects contemplated, they should designate the mode; and no doubt could be entertained but that agents specially appointed would be preferable to Consuls. But if the present motion was agreed to, it would be dismissing the plan of appointing agents, and leaving it to the PRESIDENT to appoint them or not. He hoped therefore the original resolution, and not the amendment, would be agreed to.

Mr. W. LYMAN opposed the motion on the same ground as yesterday.

Mr. S. SMITH said that it was true the PRESIDENT had already the power to appoint agents, and the annual vote of forty thousand dollars for foreign intercourse would give him the means, but that he could not pursue the liberating of our seamen so well without as he would with such a law as the resolution contemplated. In addition to the instances given of American seamen being impressed, he read some accounts of impressments from a Baltimore paper, made recently at Cape Nichola Mole, one of which stated that one hundred and fifty Americans were on board one frigate on that station. Mr. S. concluded by saying that if a law passed agreeably to the resolution, it would show the nations of Europe that we would no longer submit to the injuries done our seamen.

Mr. HARPER said, he should give his concurrence to the amendment, as most likely to obtain information of, and furnish relief to, American seamen; for, though he differed from certain gentlemen, he was not less a friend to that useful body of men than they. He supported, as before, the reasonableness of grounding every proceeding of that House upon due evidence.

Mr. BALDWIN said, if the amendment was considered as his, he should not think it of sufficient importance to delay the matter. Of the two means, he thought it the best, and gave his reasons for that opinion. The Constitution, he said, supposed that the Executive would always create as many officers as were necessary, and the Legislature had the power of checking too great a multiplication of them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON was more and more convinced of the propriety of the original resolution, and of appointing agents specially for the purpose. He mentioned an affecting instance of the impressment of an American seaman, and touched upon some of the arguments which he yesterday used in support of the measure.

Mr. BOURNE wished the resolution to be as general as possible. The PRESIDENT, he said, had sent an agent to the West Indies, and he doubted not that he had authority to relieve American seamen: if so, there was no necessity of providing by law for a special agent. If this should appear necessary when they received information from the Secretary of State on the subject, they might provide accordingly. It may appear, perhaps, that the Consuls in different ports have already received instructions to inquire into the state of impressed seamen. He defended the conduct of the member from South Carolina, and thought much had been said against him, unnecessarily, on account of his difference of opinion on the present question. Mr. B. concluded, by observing that he doubted not that the evil complained of existed, and that when official statements were received, they would fully establish the fact. He hoped the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. GALLATIN wished yesterday that the resolution might be made as general as possible, and that nothing might be included in it that could give offence to any branch of Government. On due consideration of the subject, he had, however, found that, without appointing an agent, the desired effect would not be produced. The PRESIDENT, he said, has the power to appoint Ministers, Consuls, or Ambassadors. It was necessary they should designate the kind of agent they meant to appoint. The PRESIDENT has the power to appoint agents of inquiry, but he has no power to appoint an agent in an official capacity. The resolution, he said, went to two objects: the first, that of inquiry into the state of American seamen, might be attained by an agent appointed by the PRESIDENT; but so far as relates to obtaining relief, it is necessary for the Legislature to appoint an agent. To show that this distinction was a good one, he said, there was now a proposition made either to the House, or to the Committee of Ways and Means, for the appointment of an official agent to go to Holland. This shows the opinion of the Executive on the subject. Unless, therefore, it was meant to prosecute the proposed inquiry by means of the Consuls, the amendment must be rejected. It was not necessary to designate the residence of agents; indeed, it appeared matter of doubt whether they had power to appoint an agent to reside in the British Colonies in the West Indies. He should wish the terms to be general, leaving the particular places of residence to be fixed upon afterwards. He wished, therefore, the words for appointing agents to be retained.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, he was yesterday prevented from attending the House by indisposition. The subject struck his mind, he said, in several points of view which had not been noticed. He was surprised why the business was undertaken in the way it was. No description of men, he said, were more entitled to regard than seamen; but this did not reconcile the adoption of the subject in the manner proposed. The Executive, he was of opinion, would consider itself as charged with this business. An agent who is neither Consul nor Minister, is an instrument unknown, an undefined character—a character that would not be recognised. It was impossible, he said, for any two agents, one in Great Britain and the other in the West Indies, to gain information of the sufferings of seamen in different parts of the two countries, particularly in Great Britain. He called upon gentlemen to say whether they had ever heard of such a character as they were proposing to create? He said America had Consuls in every part of the world; and if they have not, they ought to have salaries for the business. Why appoint agents, and what authority will they have? Was there, Mr. S. asked, any information before the House of remissness of duty in the Executive? He was of opinion all due care had been taken for the protection and security of citizens of the description alluded to. Had no inquiry been made of the Secretary of State on the subject? It was well known that neutral nations will always be exposed to injury whilst war existed. Insolence of office, he said, would serve to widen breaches of this sort, and American citizens speaking the same language with the English, were more than others liable to injuries. Mr. S. noticed the different kinds of American citizens, and of the difficulties arising from the doctrine of inalienable right, supported by the English; and observed that when two countries each claim a right to a man, no means but force was left to decide between them. He concluded, by observing that whilst this country had Consuls whose business it was to attend to the distresses of sailors, he could see no reason for appointing agents. Nor was he prepared to go into the question, until he was conscious there had been remissness in the Executive.

Mr. WILLIAMS observed, that he was opposed to the amendment, because it would not, in his opinion, extend to the relief intended. But he did not suppose the Executive had been remiss in duty, or any officer in the Government; or that the Minister in a late negotiation did not exert himself to prevent the abuses complained of; but finding every measure heretofore adopted ineffectual, ought they not to point out some other mode? Whilst the evil exists, let not, said he, our fellow-citizens languish under British cruelty and oppression. The resolution, as reported in its present state, contemplates the appointment of agents to reside in the most proper places, to receive information, and pursue such measures as prudence shall dictate. This method, said he, will be a guide to the PRESIDENT; and the will of the Legislature will be carried into execution; but if the amendment prevails, it will then leave the resolution upon such general principles as to afford no specific direction; will add nothing to the authorities which the PRESIDENT now possesses, nor give any new direction, and will therefore leave the business exactly where it was found.

Mr. S. SMITH should not have risen again, had it not been for what had fallen from a member from Massachusetts. That gentleman said we had Consuls everywhere; but he believed they had Consuls scarcely anywhere. He answered what had fallen from a member from Massachusetts respecting the inquiry at the office of the Secretary of State; members in that House, he said, too frequently bottomed their arguments on the credit of the PRESIDENT; he believed no man had a higher value for him than he had; but it was enough for him that the unfortunate men whose cases they were considering needed relief, to join in bringing forward the present subject; nor, in doing this, did he mean to reflect on the Executive. He touched upon several arguments which he used yesterday, and concluded, by citing a number of hardships experienced by American seamen from the cruelty of the British.

Mr. GILBERT wished not to precipitate this matter until the necessary information could be got from the Secretary of State. He wished the Committee to rise.

Mr. SEDGWICK explained, and mentioned five Consuls in England.

Mr. SWANWICK explained the nature of the Consular character, and said, though there were five in England, there were none at the seaports where the British ships of war principally lay, viz: Portsmouth, Chatham, Sheerness, &c., nor any in Scotland or Ireland. In the West Indies there was no Consul; and it was necessary to have attention paid to Halifax and Bermuda, where many American seamen lie. The expense in effecting this business, he said, would be considerable; but this was no objection; it was a measure necessary to preserve to the country the lives and usefulness of a valuable body of men. Mr. S. next alluded to what had been said about the proposed agents being of a nondescript character, and believed the British would treat them with as much respect as any other officer of the American Government. No reflection was meant by this view of it to be thrown upon any body; they sat there, he said, as legislators, and when they talked about hurting the feelings of such and such officers, he thought they were mispending their time. The present measures, Mr. S. said, were not only calculated to produce relief for present sufferers, but prevention from future evils, by giving certificates to every citizen seaman: and he hoped this would induce merchants to take apprentices to the sea-faring business; and by that means build up a valuable body of seamen, which will be of greater wealth to the country than the mines of Mexico or Peru. He concluded, by supporting the original resolution, and against the amendment.

Mr. GILBERT explained.

Mr. HILLHOUSE believed the great diversity of opinion on the subject before the House, arose from a wish to determine upon the best possible way of serving the class of men who were the object of their present inquiry. It has been said that America had only five Consuls in England, but surely these five Consuls would be better able to do the business in question than one solitary agent. He thought a Consul General might be appointed, who should have the power to call upon all other Consuls for assistance to carry into effect the business upon which he was commissioned.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH proposed to combine the two places of agents and Consuls together, by leaving it optional with the PRESIDENT, which plan he thought best in each particular case.

Mr. MADISON again urged the propriety of adopting the plan of agents, in preference to Consuls, and showed that in adopting this plan, they could not be considered as wanting in respect to the Executive, since they would be doing no more than their duty.

The question being called for, the amendment was lost—being 33 for it, and 52 against it.

The original resolution was then carried, after striking out the words "such part of."

The second clause being read, Mr. GOODHUE and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH remarked upon the difficulties which would attend the registering of seamen. They were replied to by Mr. LIVINGSTON, who was of opinion it was perfectly practicable. In speaking of the different kinds of American citizens, Mr. L. spoke of those who were natives of other countries, but who had sought an asylum under the American Government, and quoted a great number of ancient and modern authors, and even some English acts of Parliament, to prove that "man has an inherent right to go into whatever country he pleases, and by residing there, and conforming to its laws, become a citizen thereof."

After which, the report was agreed to, and the Committee rose. It then underwent a consideration in the House, and after a number of observations with respect to the propriety of two or three different amendments, it was agreed to, with an amendment, proposed by Mr. SWANWICK, to strike out the words "West Indies," in order that Halifax and Bermuda might not be excluded.

The report, thus amended, is in the following words:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the support of two or more agents, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; the one of which agents shall reside in the Kingdom of Great Britain, and the others at such places as the President shall direct; whose duty it shall be to inquire into the situation of such American citizens as shall have been, or hereafter may be, impressed or detained on board of any foreign vessel; to endeavor, by all legal means, to obtain their release, and to render an account of all foreign impressments of American citizens to the Government of the United States.

"Resolved, That proper offices ought to be provided, where every seaman, being a citizen of the United States (on producing evidence, duly authenticated, of his birth, naturalization, or residence within the United States, and under their protection, on the third day of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three) may have such evidence registered, and may receive a certificate of his citizenship."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. BOURNE, Mr. SWANWICK, Mr. S. SMITH, and Mr. W. SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

WEDNESDAY, March 2.

A bill for making a partial appropriation for the Military Establishment for the year 1796, was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

It was moved that the consideration of the Land Office bill, which was the order of the day, should be laid aside, to take up the consideration of the subject of the Naval Equipment; but after some observations for and against the postponement, the sense of the House was taken, when there appeared for it 27, against it 41.

Mr. BOURNE wished a Letter that had been mentioned to have been received from the War Office might be read. It was produced and read accordingly. It contained an account of the materials wanted, the money expended, and what would yet be required to complete the building of the frigates. Referred to the Committee on the Naval Equipment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that it was generally understood that some important Constitutional questions would be discussed when the Treaty lately concluded between this country and Great Britain should come under consideration; it was very desirable, therefore, that every document which might tend to throw light on the subject should be before the House. For this purpose, he would move the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of the instructions given to the Minister of the United States who negotiated the Treaty with Great Britain communicated by his Message on the first instant, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to the said Treaty."

Ordered to lie on the table.

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

Mr. PARKER moved that the unfinished business might be postponed, to take up the consideration of the report of the select committee to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes. The House agreeing to this question, the report and amendments were read, when

Mr. PARKER, one of the committee, gave the reasons which induced them to recommend to the House to disagree to the amendments of the Senate. He said they went to alter the principle of the bill. The bill took precautions to prevent Government from suffering loss, but one of the proposed amendments puts it in the power of the PRESIDENT to alter the price of merchandise, as he may think proper. The bill fixed the sum of six thousand dollars for the payment of six agents, which was thought both by the late and present Secretary at War to be sufficient; but the Senate has struck out the clause, and left it to the PRESIDENT to appoint as many agents and to pay them what sum he pleases. The bill has directed that offenders against the act shall be tried and punished in the vicinity where they live; but the Senate propose that offenders shall be taken and tried anywhere. It may be said that offences against this act would be of the same nature as a debt; but, he said, to be so tried, would take away the great privilege of the Habeas Corpus act; that it was one of the grievances complained of when this country was under British Government, that they were removed into that country to be tried. The principle of these amendments, he said, amounted to this, that the PRESIDENT should sell goods at what price he pleased, give what salary he chose to agents, and try offenders against the act where he thought proper.

Mr. SEDGWICK hoped the amendments would be considered separately.

The first amendment being read, respecting the appointment of agents—

Mr. HILLHOUSE hoped the House would agree to the amendment. He saw no inconvenience in leaving it to the PRESIDENT to appoint agents and fix their salaries, as they might be employed in other business, which, at present, persons are specially employed to transact under a former act.

Mr. PARKER said, this act was meant to introduce a friendly intercourse with the Indians, and ought to have no connexion with any other business.

Some observations took place between Mr. J. SMITH, Mr. PARKER, Mr. SEDGWICK, and another member, on the propriety of the wording of one of the clauses of the bill, which was at length allowed to be right.

Mr. GILES said the question was, whether one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the sum proposed to carry into effect the bill in question should be given up to the sole direction of the PRESIDENT, or whether that House would direct how it was to be disposed of. It was the first time, he said, that a proposition had been made that the PRESIDENT should be allowed to give salaries ad libitum. The bill provided that six thousand dollars should be paid for salaries, but it would be very improper that the whole sum for carrying the act into effect should be put in the power of the Executive. He said he had never any sanguine expectations from this bill, but had no objection to the experiment being tried.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH believed it was right to limit the power of carrying into effect this bill, but thought six thousand dollars too small a sum to be allowed for agency. He said it was contemplated to have six trading houses, and it would be necessary that each should have a clerk, who would expect five hundred dollars, so that there would remain only three thousand dollars for the six agents. He supposed an alteration would therefore be necessary in the sum. As a conference would most likely take place between the two Houses, he thought it best to disagree to the amendment, in order that the clause might be differently modified.

Mr. HILLHOUSE again spoke in favor of the PRESIDENT's appointing the agents, in order that he might employ them in other business, and by that means save an expense to the public.

Mr. MILLEDGE was of opinion that the agents, appointed under this act, should be confined to the business of it alone.

Mr. DEARBORN said it would require a very different person to be employed in a trading house from those employed in distributing articles to the Indians, the act for authorizing which he believed expired this session. He thought the sum would be fixed for salaries; but he thought six thousand dollars far too little, and he believed it should be twelve thousand.

The motion being put, on agreeing to the report of the committee to reject the first amendment, it was carried. The other amendments were severally put, and, after a few remarks, four of them were agreed to, and four rejected; and the Clerk was directed to acquaint the Senate therewith.

LAND OFFICES N. W. OF THE OHIO.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for establishing Land Offices for the sale of the Northwestern Territory. The amendment proposed for selling the land by auction being under consideration—

Mr. BALDWIN said he was in favor of the amendment. He was not disposed to encourage, in his own mind, too great suspicions of the integrity of individuals; but it is not to be forgotten, said he, in making the provisions of this land law, that it is to be carried into operation in times singularly exposing it to a mercenary and unfaithful execution. We must temper our laws to what we see to be the state of the country. Philosophers and politicians, in some ages, have made such successful addresses to human nature, on the subject of honor, virtue, patriotism, and regard to the public interest, that reputable men despired appearing to be governed in their actions by pecuniary considerations; but philosophers and politicians with us have of late made their most importunate and successful addresses to other passions, and have excited the insatiable sordid passion of avarice to an unusual degree. Speculation and making money are rarely found in a more raging extreme, and persons whom we have supposed worthy of our confidence and esteem, publicly practising the meanest and most disgraceful arts and tricks of swindling; and instead of being exhibited to public infamy in the pillory, they show an unblushing front in a very different situation. When such men, said he, are publicly patronized and treated with respect, it is necessary to take care how we suffer the execution of our land law to depend on the disinterestedness of an individual.

Mr. COOPER was in favor of selling by auction. No man, he said, would be at the trouble and expense of exploring the country without some certainty of purchasing. But if the bill remained in its present form, a farmer might travel and explore these lands, and when he goes to the sacred Land Office, with his money in his hand, the agent might easily inform some favorite speculator what was the highest sum offered, so that he might advance some trifle upon it. Why, said he, adopt a secret plan, when an open one can be adopted with greater advantage? He referred to the State of New York, as a proof of the preference due to the public mode of selling.

Mr. KITCHELL said he was one of the committee who brought in the bill, and at that time he thought the plan proposed the best; but from what he had heard advanced on the subject, and from seriously considering the matter, he was now of opinion that a sale by auction would be best. He knew there were objections to be urged against that mode of selling, but he trusted they would be mostly obviated.

Mr. HILLHOUSE also said, from observation and reflection, he was now in favor of selling the land by auction. He hoped that salt springs and other valuable lots would be reserved for the use of Government. He had no idea of bringing the whole of the land into the market at once, and would therefore preserve that clause of the bill which makes two dollars the lowest price at which any part of the land shall be sold. He would have offices opened to which applications should be made for any lot of land that might be chosen, which should be advertised and publicly sold; and he would have no parcel of land offered for sale, which was not fixed upon by some person, and then there would always be a certainty of one bidder at least. By this means, he doubted not, a good price would be got for all the best tracts of land.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH was in favor of selling by vendue, as he hoped it would preclude the possibility of deception or fraud.

Mr. HAVENS spoke in favor of public sales, but, he said, if the minimum price was set too high, it would prevent competition in bidding. The bill was objectionable, as it contemplated only one plan; if the whole of the land is not sold by the present plan, there is no provision for selling the rest. If the map was looked at, he said, it would appear to be most convenient not to dispose of the whole at once, but only particular parts. He thought the bill should describe such parts of the land as should be sold.

Mr. MOORE thought that if a mode was adopted for persons inclined to purchase to offer their proposals in writing, unsealed and open to inspection, for the small lots, it would afford the best opportunity of suiting persons who might wish to become settlers.

Mr. CORR wished to make a motion to strike out the whole of the section. It was his opinion they ought to proceed no further in the business, until they had caused a survey of the land to be taken. It was unfortunate for the House that they were legislating on a subject upon which they had very little information. In the course of the next season, he said, the land might be surveyed, and important advantages would arise from it in the sale of the land, by the quality of soil, situation, &c., being distinctly marked on the map. The sale might then be regularly entered upon. At present he thought the House had too little knowledge of the land to fix upon such a plan of sale as shall produce the greatest advantage.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought that the present was the time to dispose of the land, when speculation was at so high a pitch. The fixing upon a plan of surveying would take up as much time as the selling of the land. They would be perfectly safe, he said, in selling by auction, and fixing a minimum price; and no error, he was of opinion, could take place in the sales.

Mr. W. LYMAN hoped the section would not be struck out. The advantage of selling at present was great, owing to emigration, and if the land be not sold, it will be taken possession of without sale; and if settlements begin on that principle, it will deprive the United States of great advantages.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, it was well known to gentlemen that there was plenty of land to be purchased, whether Government agreed to open a Land Office or not, and except in providing for a survey, a sale is also provided for, the consequence will be, that persons will buy land of others, who have it to sell in the neighborhood of these lands. Another thing; as the sale of this land respected revenue, so far from providing a revenue by the plan of surveying proposed, a certain great expense will be incurred. The present emigrations, he said, were great, and likely to increase, from the opening of the Mississippi and other causes. The object should be, he said, to hold out inducements to these people to wait for these lands. He was in favor of the mode of selling by auction; but as that was not at present the subject before the Committee, he should wish the section to remain, in order to consider the amendment.

Mr. KITCHELL said, that the speediest manner of bringing forward land into the market, would be of the greatest advantage in all respects.

Mr. COIT supported his motion. It was said, he observed, that if the land was not sold, it would be settled upon. He said it would take up nearly as much time to make a survey for sale, as to carry into effect the plan he proposed.

The motion was put and negatived.

The motion for selling by auction being put, was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out a part of a section, and insert the words, "Provided, That no part of the said land be sold for less than two dollars per acre."

Mr. COOPER wished the House might not determine to fix the lowest price of the land at two dollars per acre. Many millions of acres were now selling, he said, on the Ohio, for three shillings on long credit. He thought if the minimum price was fixed at ten shillings, it would not affect the price of good land.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said it was not meant to sell the whole of the land at present, but only a certain proportion. For this purpose, two dollars per acre is the price fixed upon as the lowest; and if this price were not sufficiently high to prevent more than from five to 800,000 acres of the best land being sold the first year, he should advise it to be higher. The following year a like quantity might be brought forward. By this means, the land will progress in value as it becomes settled, and the land of second or third quality, in the course of a short time, will come to be worth as much as the best land at the opening of the sale.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought the plan proposed would prevent more land from being sold at first than would be purchased by settlers, and cause a competition in the sale. He thought there were many tracts of the land worth double the price mentioned, but a sale by auction would find its real value.

Mr. HEATH thought the minimum price of the land too high.

Mr. DEARBORN believed a very great proportion of the land first sold would command a considerably higher price than that fixed upon.

Mr. GALLATIN said the more he reflected on the subject, the more he was convinced there was no safe plan to be adopted in the sale of this land without limiting the price. And if a low price was fixed, in order to accommodate persons of small property, they should fall into error. He said there were two kinds of purchasers of lands, settlers and speculators. The demand of the first class is always limited, and the remainder falls into the hands of speculators, and they will be induced to purchase only by a prospect of profit. In the year 1792 all the land west of the Ohio was disposed of to speculators at 1s. 6d. per acre, and in a week afterwards sold for a dollar and a half; so that the money which ought to have gone into the funds, went into the pocket of the moneyed men who purchased. In order to govern the price of the land in contemplation, it is necessary to inquire at what price land in the neighborhood sells for. This inquiry has been made, and it is found, that land as good in quality sells for double and treble the price put upon this. Speculators cannot afford to give this price: the consequence will be, that those only who mean to settle will give the price. This will prevent too large a quantity from coming into the market at once, and give Government that money which speculators would get were a lower price fixed upon the land.

The motion was put and carried.

Mr. GALLATIN said that it had now been agreed that the land should be sold by auction, and that no lot should be sold for a less price than two dollars per acre. If in order, he would move a provision that the large tracts should be sold at the Seat of Government, and the small ones in the Western Territory. He proposed this provision, as he believed it would meet the wishes of the House, though he was of opinion it would be best to sell the whole in the Territory, as he conceived, that no person would give two dollars per acre, except such as were acquainted with the quality and situation of the land; the conclusion is, that a man who wishes to purchase must send an agent to examine the land before he purchases, and when he is upon the spot, he can purchase without further trouble. This would be the most equitable and equal way. Whereas, if sold at the Seat of Government, an advantage is given to such as live in the neighborhood; but, as he did not expect it to pass, he did not wish to move this proposition. He moved first, "that the small lots be sold upon the Western Territory."

Mr. WILLIAMS wished some specific place to be mentioned.

Mr. GALLATIN thought that different parts of the land would sell better at one place, and other parts at other places.

Mr. HAVENS thought the proposed plan of sale would yet favor speculators too much; for, when agents were sent to explore the lands, they would become acquainted with the value of small tracts as well as large, and enter into competition with the settlers for them.

Mr. DEARBORN said it appeared that the member who spoke last was afraid of too great a competition for the lands; he thought there was no great danger of getting too high a price for them.

The motion was put and agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved that it be added, "And that the large tracts of land shall be sold at the Seat of Government."

Mr. MACLAY was in favor of selling all the lands upon the Territory.

Mr. NICHOLAS said there would be a great advantage lost by selling the large lots on the Territory; for when agents are commissioned to buy, they are limited to price, but when principals attend a sale (which would most probably be the case if sold at the Seat of Government) they are frequently induced by competition to give more for an estate than they at first intended.

Mr. DAYTON said, if the member who objected to the present motion, would apply to his former remarks on the subject, he could not support his objection. He said, the sending of agents might be of considerable advantage to the sale of the lots, as, on their return, their report would be heard by many, and probably influence persons to attend the sale at the Seat of Government; but, if the sale were on the land, no such advantage would arise from the mission of agents.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was in favor of the whole of the lands being sold on the Territory.

Mr. VENABLE said, if the large tracts of land were to be sold only at the Seat of Government, it would be a great disadvantage to the sale; for if a person goes from a very distant part of the country to view the land, he will perhaps have a still longer journey to the Seat of Government to make a purchase, as it is not to be presumed that all persons who mean to purchase will employ agents. This was a very serious inconvenience, and he hoped it would not be agreed to.

The motion was put and carried.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought it necessary to add a clause, in order to reserve all the salt springs for the use of Government. Agreed to.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH moved that a suitable reservation of land should be made for colleges and schools. Agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved a clause to the following effect:

"Provided one actual settler be not on every — acres of land within — years from the sale thereof, it shall return to the Government of the United States, the same as if no such sale had taken place."

Mr. CLAIBORNE hoped the lands themselves would be sufficient inducement for settlers, and that purchasers would be left at full liberty in respect to settlement. He could never agree to any regulation that should go to the taking away of land from a purchaser who had fairly paid for it.

Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. COOPER were both against the motion.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was in favor of the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, if the clause which was recommended was made a condition in the purchase, there was nothing unreasonable in it. It was as necessary that the country should be settled as that the land should be sold. Or shall it be said that the honest, industrious settlers, shall make roads, bridges, and other improvements, whilst the rich holders keep their lands in hand until these improvements are made, in order to increase the value of them? The member from New York who opposed this motion, knows that the poor inhabitants on the new settled lands in that State are obliged to do this. He thought this clause very essential in the act.

Mr. COOPER replied, and the Committee rose, and asked leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, March 3.

A message was received from the Senate announcing that they insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes."

NORTHWESTERN LAND OFFICES.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for opening Land Offices for the sale of the Western lands, and the amendment proposing that there should be one actual settler upon every — acres of land, being read—

Mr. HAVENS wished to give some reasons why he thought the amendment unnecessary. He said it had been introduced in the State of New York without effect; there was not rigor sufficient in Government to carry such a clause into effect. Besides, in order to avoid the forfeiture, a purchaser might build a hut, put in a person for a time, and then go off again. Another reason for objecting to it was, when a certain number of inhabitants shall have taken up their residence in the country, it would be organized into a State, and form itself into a Government, which could tax the property of non-residents. This would be an effectual measure to prevent the engrossing of land. A like regulation had taken place in the State of Vermont, which had answered the purpose, and he conceived always would have the effect. He should, therefore, vote against the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS said the regulation he proposed had not been carried into effect in the State of New York, but it was owing to the influence of the Legislative body preventing it. It was introduced four years ago; but it was now put into other hands, where the interest of great landholders will not prevent its operation. Were land sold in small tracts, it might be taxed in the way proposed; but when sold in large tracts, the holders of such tracts have generally too great an interest in the Legislature of the State to prevent a law passing to this salutary end. In the State of New York, a tax of this sort was every year proposed, but always rejected by those whose private interest would be affected thereby.

Mr. GALLATIN was in favor of the amendment. He conceived that the happiness and prosperity of the country would be promoted by preventing the lands, the sale of which they were contemplating, from being engrossed in few hands, and he believed the provision now under consideration, together with the price fixed, would have that effect. The only material objection to it is, that it may diminish the revenue by reducing the price that would otherwise be paid for the land. He thought this a specious objection, not a solid one. He believed the regulation would prevent some speculators from purchasing, but he thought it a beneficial thing that they should be driven from the market. Lands which produced nothing were of no real value. The high price expected must be got from real settlers alone. The consequence will be, that a less quantity of land will be sold, but a sufficient quantity to satisfy actual settlers will be disposed of, notwithstanding this clause, and Government will pocket the profit which speculators otherwise would have had. And, in the following year, the land which would have been engrossed by speculators, but for a provision of this kind, will be brought into market to meet the demand of fresh settlers, at perhaps an advanced price.

It had been said, Mr. G. observed, that this regulation would hold out too great encouragement to emigration. Whether this law passed or not, the same number of men would go to this land. It was not from a distance that emigrants were to be expected, but from tracts adjacent; this clause would inflict a penalty on men who purchased lands with speculative views alone. With respect to what had been said about an evasion of the act, it would be easy to define what constituted an actual settler.

It has been said, that taxing non-residents would produce the effect intended by this clause. Mr. G. thought differently. In the State of Pennsylvania that practice had been adopted; the taxes laid upon persons of this description have never been sufficient to induce settlement. They have found their land increase more in value by means of settlements taking place, than any amount of taxes laid upon it. It has been said, that larger taxes might be imposed; but they will not be paid. In the country where he lived, the occupiers had been called upon to pay their quota of taxes which could not be got from non-residents. He would ask gentlemen whether they wished the land to be engrossed or not? and if they do not, he would be glad if they could produce a better plan for preventing it than this. Before the Revolution, a plan of this sort was adopted from one end of the country to the other, and he believed it was owing to this regulation, that they owed a great deal of the happiness and prosperity which they had since enjoyed. He wished, therefore, the example to be followed.

Mr. COOPER said few men could afford to pay two dollars an acre, and none would pay it, except those who meant to settle upon the land. It was not well to make severe settling clauses. Security would operate against them. In the State of New York the regulation could never be put in force.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, if the sole object of the amendment had been to prevent the land being engrossed, it would have had his support: but he did not think it would have that effect. He thought that fixing the price of the land, which should not be less than two dollars per acre, would produce this effect; but the proposed regulation, he thought would have a different effect; it would reduce the price of the land. He was of opinion that land, which, without this clause, would sell for four dollars an acre, with it, would not sell for more than three and a half. Besides, no Government ever did, or ever would, enforce such a regulation. It would be holding out, also, a premium to emigration, which, he trusted, was not the intention of the Legislature; for persons who purchased land at three dollars and a half per acre, to obtain settlers, might be obliged almost to give it away. Indeed, he thought it unnecessary to multiply arguments against a regulation calculated to produce so many injurious consequences.

Mr. S. SMITH said it did not appear to him that the amendment could have any good effect. No law which countenanced injustice could be carried into execution; and to take away land from a purchaser, after he had justly paid for it, could not be accounted anything less, as perhaps it might not be possible to get men to settle upon the land within the limited time. For instance, suppose a war was to take place with the Indians, it would be impossible to fulfil the contract. In such case, it will be said, petitions would be heard for relief. The regulation, in his opinion, might produce many evils. The large tracts of land, he said, must be purchased by moneyed men, and there ought to be no objection thrown in their way.

Mr. RUTHERFORD thought the amendment ought to be agreed to. He spoke highly of the people living on the frontier. He heard fishermen say that the best fish always rise highest, and so it was with the people, who were the best on the frontiers; they are not too polite to be religious; they are hospitable and neighborly, and do not employ their nights in nocturnal revellings. These honest men suffer immense inconveniences by the incursions of their savage neighbors, the Indians; they cast their eyes about them for assistance, and see nothing but large unoccupied tracts of lands, whose owners, perhaps, are living secure in some large city. This, he said, was distressing to them. Without this amendment, he thought the bill would have no good effect.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was sorry to differ in opinion from his colleague on this subject. He thought the land would not be settled in half a century, and that the amendment would be a clog on the sale, by deterring men from purchasing. They ought, he said, rather to throw out encouragement to induce men to become purchasers. Excessive laws, he said, were never executed, and to adopt this measure would destroy the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS was confident his amendment would have the best effects. He believed no country was ever more speedily settled than the Genesee country, in the State of New York, in the law for effecting which, there was a clause of this sort. It is said that the price of two dollars will cause a settlement; then, said he, where is the harm of this clause? There is no forfeiture incurred in case of settlement. With respect to the regulation being a check to the sale, he believed it would be a salutary check. Large lots may be sold somewhat cheaper, but it would not affect the price of small lots. There might be a provision in case of an Indian war; the land, in that case, should not be forfeited for want of settlers. He referred to the practice in the State of New York, and was certain that this plan would eventually produce the most money, at the same time that it would insure a settlement. The lands should be paid for by instalments, and by being gradually brought in the market they would constantly rise in value.

Mr. DAYTON rose to explain, and again expressed his disapprobation of the amendment. He said non-residents might be taxed as high for their unoccupied lands as were the occupiers of improved lands, by which means they would be made to contribute their full proportion towards the expense of making roads, bridges, &c.

Mr. COOPER wished to get a good price for the land, in order to pay the Public Debt; and, on this account, he hoped no discouragement would be thrown in the way of purchasers.

Mr. GALLATIN remarked that the member from New Jersey had said, the present amendment would reduce the price of the land. He thought differently. None would purchase but real settlers. Of course, a less quantity will be sold in any one year; but what is sold will command a good price. Instead of selling three millions of acres at two dollars the first year, perhaps one million might be sold at four dollars, and the remaining two millions, instead of selling for two, will bring four dollars, which will be the effect of driving those purchasers from the market who meant to purchase on speculation. The quantity of land to be disposed of, Mr. G. said, was about ten millions of acres, which, divided by 4,000, would make 2,500. But there would be no hope of getting 2,500 families on the lands in one year; but to sell one million of acres a year, it would be disposed of in ten years, by which means 1,000 families might be accommodated with 1,000 acres each, and the highest price be got for it that the land was really worth. With respect to the revenue, this plan will give to the Government all the profits of the speculator. Government would be, in effect, its own speculator. If the land, said he, was the property of a private individual, he would never agree to sell the whole in one year, when he knew that a large number of families would every year be in want of a portion of this land. Another objection is, that this regulation would amount to a bounty on emigration. An observation made by gentlemen who opposed the amendment, struck him with much force in favor of it. Say they, if you oblige purchasers to settle the land within a limited time, they may be obliged to give their land for nothing. He wished that might take place. If the cause of the happiness of this country was examined into, he said it would be found to arise as much from the great plenty of land in proportion to the inhabitants, which their citizens enjoyed, as from the wisdom of their political institutions. It is, in fact, said he, because the poor man has been able always to attain his portion of land. And it was perfectly immaterial to them whether a man was happy in New Jersey or upon the Western Territory, it was their duty to do all in their power to promote the general happiness of the whole country.

To resume, said Mr. G., the experience of a century might be called to prove that the happiness of this country had been promoted by regulations similar to that now under consideration. In New England no tract had ever been granted without an obligation to settlement. He thought therefore they ought not to part with such a provision on mere theory. The consequence would perhaps be, the price of labor would be kept up. He wished it to be so. It was not only a sure mark of prosperity, but afforded comfort to the poor man; it was his wish to increase rather than diminish that comfort. He concluded by hoping the amendment would obtain.

Mr. N. SMITH said the proposed amendment in his opinion, would have no effect but to diminish the price of the land, and offer a premium to emigration. The advantage proposed by the measure is to drive all speculators from the market. He thought the argument ill founded. He said this clause would introduce considerable embarrassment into the business, and where there was any degree of embarrassment, the broader was the field for speculation. Speculators will still purchase, but at a price that will indemnify them against any contingency. For, suppose the land worth four dollars an acre, under these circumstances, not more than two or three will be given. Gentlemen suppose that, if this amendment takes place, every purchaser will go upon the land. No such thing will happen; a servant or tenant would answer the purpose. Advert to the bill, said Mr. S., and it will be seen that tracts are to be sold in lots of three miles square, by vendue, at the Seat of Government. The speculator comes forward, and every man who purchases will bear it in mind, that settlers must be upon the land in a certain time. This will not prevent the land from being sold, but it will diminish the price, and operate as an encouragement to emigration. He was surprised to hear that the gentleman who, a few days ago, had said he did not wish to encourage emigration, now supports a measure which seemed to have that for its principal object. He would have men emigrate to what place, and when they pleased, but would not offer them a premium for doing so.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought the clause proposed would be extremely discouraging to purchasers. The uncertainty of procuring settlers will deter moneyed men from adventuring their property in this land. He was of opinion it would have a tendency to put the land into the hands of speculators at a low price. The condition was an unreasonable one. Suppose, said he, a merchant was told by Government, you may import as many goods as you please, but if you have any left at the end of the year, they must be burnt; would he not think it a tyrannical decree? The object, if he understood it rightly, was to sell the land to emigrants going into that country, at as good a price as could be got, without throwing any discouragements in the way.

Mr. HAVENS understood the operation of the bill in this way: Government does not expect much above the minimum price. Ho that will first bid two dollars per acre will get the land. So that, when the land shall be thought to be worth this price, it will be sold to any person who bids it. He said the effect of a clause of the same kind with that under consideration had been tried in the States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont, and was found ineffectual. If he thought it would answer the purpose intended, he would vote for it; but he believed it would be a clog upon the sale, without any advantage. He was of opinion the wished-for effect might be obtained in a different way, and therefore this clause was unnecessary.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania was mistaken with respect to what he had asserted of the practice of the New England States. He believed the amendment would have a bad effect. The way in which the part of the country which he came from was peopled, was one part at once. If this amendment was adopted, what would be the consequence? Instead of the people who go upon the land being settled compactly, and in the neighborhood of each other, they will spread themselves over the face of the whole country, without the power of assisting or defending each other. He did not think this regulation would prevent the sale of a single acre, but lower the price, and the forfeiture never had, and never would be enforced. Indeed, it might create a war to attempt to dispossess persons of property they had paid for. He should have no objection to any clause which would confine settlers on small tracts to a particular part of the Territory.

Mr. FINDLEY observed, there were many different opinions on the subject before them. Some members thought to obtain money was the grand object; others had different views. He did not think the raising of money ought to be the leading object. He did not wish a single acre to be sold more than could be settled. He did not think the United States could have a greater advantage than to have a reserve of good land to offer persons who wish to emigrate. He thought the price fixed upon the land would be a check on the sale, and discourage emigration. Had gentlemen considered what they were about? Whether they were merchants, only to get money? Surely not; they had men, and the happiness of men in their view. On the frontier parts of the country, there is no greater unhappiness, said he, than that occasioned by the settling too widely, the settlers can neither make the necessary improvements, nor defend themselves; but by settling compactly, the inhabitants experience all the advantage of society, good schools, and everything desirable. He did not think the present amendment calculated to lower the price of the land; the price would advance by degrees. Why sell more lands than can be settled? To have them engrossed? This would be a great evil, and might have an effect on the happiness of the country, which could not be at present foreseen. The comparison betwixt a merchant selling goods, and a Government selling lands, would not hold. It is a sort of transaction which should always be kept in the hands of Government, and not in those of speculators; for, if speculators had the sale of the land, the price they would fix upon it would drive emigrants upon the territory of other countries, who hold out encouragements to receive them. The prospect of peace and security will have a considerable influence on the price of the land; he himself was fearful that the Indians would commit depredations on the frontiers.

He did not think the practice of the Eastern States practicable in this new country, but he would have it approached to. He wished the land to be settled gradually, and that an effectual check might be put on the rage of speculators, which seemed to have no bounds. The most barren mountains were embraced by them. He thought it would be prudent to adopt the amendment as an experiment which would be perfectly safe; for, if the land was once engrossed, there would be no remedy. He said there were facts and experience in support of the proposition, and theory only against it. He should therefore vote for it, and trusted other checks would be provided before the bill passed into a law.

Mr. RUTHERFORD spoke again in favor of the amendment, and of the frontier inhabitants. Experience, he said, was vastly preferable to a fine spun theory. He hoped the mind of every member in that House was as pure as that of the great FRANKLIN, and he paid great attention to their sentiments, but experience taught him to differ from them on the present question. He had been acquainted with the frontiers, he said, fifty years, and had seen the country progress from woods to towns—he was reminded by the Chairman that there was a specific question before the Committee.) He wished, he said, to introduce his experience. He said the country would be settled, should be settled, and must be settled. The most untaught Indians were to receive information; it should be compactly settled by honest, respectable yeomanry; but will a man who has his land, his orchards, his gardens, in good order, pack up his all, and go to this new country? No; but he will send one or two of his sons. Gentlemen thought the country would not be sold. There was no doubt of it. He said the people of this country were doubled since the horrid, detestable war with England. The people were eight millions, at least; they increased like a bee hive. He was not, he said, for shutting out members of Congress from getting lots for their children, but he wished to discourage speculators.

Mr. MADISON was not surprised to hear different opinions on this question, according as members felt from the usages of the States to which they belonged. It was difficult to judge precisely betwixt different opinions, from the blanks of the bill not being filled up. Perhaps a good deal depended on the quantity of land to be offered for sale. Purchases made, he said, under a consideration that the land would be speedily settled, would be made at a higher price, and those made under an idea of a considerably distant settlement, would command a price in proportion. The principal object was to fill the Treasury as soon as possible. He believed the obliging of purchasers to settle land within a limited time would be an obstruction in the sale; but there were several considerations which ought to be weighed. If, by requiring actual settlers, they should repel a part of those who did not intend to settle themselves on the land, they might not repel others. Persons would be more ready to go into a wilderness, if they were assured of company. The amendment would have less effect in repelling large purchasers, than at first imagined. If persons knew when they purchased that they must provide settlers, they will see that a great advantage may arise from their enterprise, and will give a greater price. With respect to the policy of increasing emigration, there seemed to be a middle course. It would not be right, he said, to encourage emigrations, nor to throw obstacles in the way of them. He believed, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that if they were ever so desirous that emigrations should not take place to that country, it would not hinder them. He was opposed to a greater quantity of land being brought to market than could be settled. The consideration of settlement, he said, would be found to operate much less on the price than was supposed; he knew not whether it would increase the price. But as the subject was important, and greater light might be thrown upon the subject hereafter, he would wish the forfeiture of the land to be struck out, and left to be modified by the select committee.

Mr. HARPER said, when the amendment was first proposed, he thought it a good one; but, on more mature consideration, he found it would not only fail in producing the effect intended, but be pregnant with evil. The good effects proposed by the amendment were to restrict the quantity of land sold, and to accommodate that class of settlers who may be in want of land at a low price. The first object was of great importance. But does it not appear that, by limiting the quantity of land sold, it would have an effect to decrease the competition? Decreasing the competition will not decrease the quantity sold, but the price; for when the competition is greatest, the price will be highest. But if you subtract a certain number of purchasers, you leave the market open to a few bidders, you will get the land at a less price. The amendment must, therefore, produce a disadvantageous effect, as the same quantity of land will be sold, and less money produced. The next beneficial consideration was, to accommodate those persons who want lands, but cannot afford a high price. A certain proportion of citizens every year emigrate: some of them will be able to purchase, others must either obtain land at a low price or on long credit. If the sale be left unfettered, the competition will be increased by persons purchasing, who will be willing to accommodate this latter class of persons. As to that class, who purchase with a view of settlement, they can accommodate themselves. Persons, he said, who purchase at a high price, without this amendment, will be induced to settle the land as soon as possible. The amendment will tend to scatter settlers over the whole country; for if purchasers get land in quite opposite parts of the Territory, they will be obliged to settle it, whereas a person who might purchase lands at two dollars an acre in distant parts of the country, might not be very desirous of having it immediately settled. He believed these restrictions had been tried in different States, and it was found impossible to carry them into effect. If this was so, all the inconveniences of them would be experienced, and the proposed benefits lost. But he believed it was not the object of Government to settle the whole of that country at present, as there remains yet much unappropriated land in the Atlantic States, which is in want of settlers. He believed when land could be purchased, for the purpose of actual cultivation, at two dollars an acre, it was a proof there was no want of land. And there was a certain proportion of population, he said, which was necessary to the happiness of society. While lands, therefore, could be purchased at this price in the neighborhood, he should not be for sending people into the back country. He was, on these accounts, against the amendment.

Mr. KITTERA thought the best price might be obtained by competition, and that driving out of the market many purchasers, would not increase the price of the land. Gentlemen have said that money is not the object, but settlement. Perhaps it was not correct to say that universal experience was in support of the present amendment. With respect to the State of Pennsylvania, the proprietors had never fettered land with conditions of this sort. It was true, they did at one particular time give improvers a pre-emption right, which was done to encourage emigrants from neighboring States, but, being found an injurious policy, it was given up. Since the Revolution, there was only one instance in which restrictions were made. He saw many evils that would arise from persons purchasing lands on the other side of the Alleghany mountains, as there were many persons at present settled on lands there. This kind of bounty, to encourage emigration, was not good policy. He said there were millions of acres in this State yet to be disposed of. He thought it necessary to mention these facts.

Mr. FIXDLEY went over the history of the settlement of Pennsylvania, in order to support the propriety of the proposed amendment, and to controvert some of the statements of the last speaker.

Mr. KITTERA said, it was agreed that a provision should be made that, in case of an Indian war, land should not be liable to forfeiture for want of settlement. This, it might be seen, would be a motive for purchasers to excite an Indian war.

The motion being put, it was lost, only twenty-two members appearing in favor of it.

Mr. NICHOLAS proposed to strike out the fourth section, and insert a clause for extending the time of payment to one quarter of the amount in hand, and one quarter each of the three succeeding years; which, after a few observations, was agreed to, with the amendment of a blank instead of the word quarter.

Mr. HARPER proposed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That payment shall be received for lands purchased in pursuance of this act, in certificates of such parts of the Public Debt as bear a present interest of six per cent."

Which, after a number of observations from different members, was negatived.

The sixth and seventh sections of the bill, on motion, were agreed to be struck out.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to strike out the eighth section, which gave an opportunity to persons holding military warrants to pay them for one-seventh part of any purchase they might make of these lands, as giving too great an advantage to persons holding those warrants.

Mr. DAYTON said, it had been agreed by a former Congress, to set apart certain lands for satisfying military claims. Two millions and a half acres of that land had been taken away from the United States by the late Indian treaty, so that there was now an insufficiency to answer the claims. The committee appointed to bring in this bill thought some attention due to these claims. His opinion had been asked on the subject, and he had given it in favor of the plan proposed; and as there remains now only one million of acres, one half of which is good for little, to satisfy the military claims which was not more than half the necessary quantity, if all good, but being half of it bad, not more than one-fourth of what is necessary, he was persuaded that the committee would agree to do the claimants justice, by giving them a share in the present land. He owned he was, in some degree, interested in this subject.

Mr. KITCHELL spoke in favor of retaining this section.

Mr. WILLIAMS had no objection to grant the bounties mentioned, but it was never intended, he said, that these warrants should have the very best parts of this land. Suppose land sold for seven dollars an acre, (which he believed it would,) in every 700 acres, 100 would be paid for in warrants, which the soldiers had sold for a mere trifle. The honorable gentleman had said he felt himself interested. He, also, felt interested, but he wished to legislate for the whole. If there be not land enough set out, let more be appropriated; but to take one-seventh part of the price of this land in warrants, was giving a greater advantage to holders of warrants than ought to be given. He wished Government to be perfectly faithful, but he did not wish speculators to have an unreasonable advantage.

Mr. DAYTON said the plan proposed by the gentleman who spoke last would be more expensive than that proposed by the present bill, as two millions of good land must be set apart for the purpose. What does the argument, of military warrants covering land worth seven dollars an acre, amount to? If the purchaser, who had obtained military warrants from soldiers at a low price, comes into the market to buy these lands, will he not give more for them, knowing that his warrants will be taken in part payment, and thereby increase the price of the land? The fact was, he said, that whenever there were any alterations proposed, with respect to the late Army, they have always been injured. He referred to several instances as proof of his assertion.

Mr. HARPER said, that he was in favor of the section remaining in the bill, and upon the same ground as the mover alleged for striking it out, viz: for the advantage of persons holding military warrants. He thought the soldiers in the late Army had received too little recompense, and he was glad when an opportunity presented itself of doing them justice: That these warrants should be received as part of purchases, would be advantageous to the sale of land, render the warrants valuable, and be a small reward for past services. Instead of voting to strike out, he should be for enlarging the provision, so as to give the holders, particularly original holders, the greatest advantage.

Mr. FINDLEY said, if he thought it would do service to soldiers, he should not object to the clause in the bill, but he did not know a single soldier who had one of them. He said there was already land appropriated for the purpose, and if not enough, he was willing to appropriate more. This is not the first time, he said, that they had heard the claims of soldiers, when the money was intended to go into the pockets of speculators.

Mr. DEARBORN said, that these lands were promised many years ago, and if soldiers have sold their warrants, it has been because their patience has been exhausted in waiting the fulfilment of the engagements of Government; but there are many who have not sold their warrants. Yet, said he, if we go on to put off the satisfying of these claims, it will induce those who still have warrants, to sell them for what they can get. In laying off two millions of acres more, in addition to the one million which remains, much time and expense would be thrown away. It might be said that his situation should prevent him saying much on that question. He thought it necessary, however, to deliver his sentiments on the subject.

Mr. DAYTON said that, as it had been doubted whether any warrants were now in the hands of the original holders, he rose to inform the Committee that he had forty-seven of these warrants belonging to officers and soldiers who had earned them with their blood and wounds. They were sent to him to have them laid upon the tract of land ceded to the Indians; but, said he, if confined to the single million of acres now only appropriated, the value of the warrants is gone. Is this the way, exclaimed Mr. D., in which gentlemen, under cover of preventing the advantage of speculators, would reward their brave soldiers! He had said he was interested, so he was; for he had a warrant in his own name, but not in the way in which the gentleman from New York was interested, for he knew not that he had served in the Army. He should speak his mind on the subject, he said, but would not vote.

Mr. COOPER spoke in favor of the clause of the bill.

Mr. FINDLEY said, no one intended to injure the Army. It was time enough to complain when injury was done. Members could not be supposed to injure the Army, because they did not choose to enter upon new plans, in their opinions calculated to favor speculators.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, in a debate of this kind, where all were interested, the less said the better. He should not have risen again, had it not been doubted whether he had served in the Army. He would inform the honorable gentleman that he had so served; that, for many years, when he lay down on his bed, he seemed yet to have arms in his hands. He said, in the State of New York, warrants were bought for a mere trifle; he had bought some of them. All that can be demanded, was a faithful discharge of the obligation of Government. It had been said that the admission of these warrants would increase the price of the land, but he did not think so; it would increase the price of the warrants only. If, said he, a discrimination could be made between real holders and purchasers, he would go any length in satisfying the claims of the soldier.

Mr. KITCHELL spoke in favor of the clause of the bill.

The Committee now rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 4.

It was moved and carried that the unfinished business should be postponed to take up the bill providing for a partial appropriation towards the Military Establishment for 1796, when the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and reported the bill without amendment. It afterwards went through the House, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved that the unfinished business might again give way, to take up the consideration of the resolution laid upon the table on Wednesday, requesting the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to lay before the House certain documents relative to the Treaty lately concluded between this country and Great Britain; but, on being informed by members near him, that the going through the Land Office bill would take up but little time, he consented to withdraw his motion.

NORTHWESTERN LAND OFFICES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for establishing Land Offices for the sale of the Northwestern Territory, when the motion for striking out the section allowing military warrants to be received as one-seventh part of a purchase, being put, was lost by a considerable majority.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) wished to introduce an amendment in the section respecting the allowing of a certain portion of military claims to be received, viz: to strike out the words 'one-seventh,' and introduce 'one-sixth.' His reason for making this amendment was, that he had found, on inquiry, that a great part of the million of acres mentioned yesterday, as remaining towards satisfying military claims, was also ceded.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he should oppose that amendment when the bill came before the House; for the present he should waive his objections.

Mr. DAYTON wished the gentleman, who seemed to be principally opposed to this clause, would state his objections now, that he might have an opportunity of replying to them, as, when the bill came before the House, he should be in a situation which would deprive him of the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. NICHOLAS observed that the bill would again come into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KITCHELL proposed to amend the motion by striking out the word "seventh" and leaving it blank; which was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved a clause to this effect: "that the Attorney General shall superintend the Land Office at the Seat of Government of the United States, and that the PRESIDENT be authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an agent for the sale of the lands in the Northwestern Territory."

Mr. W. SMITH wished the motion to be divided. He had no objection to the latter part of it, but a very material one to the former. It would require consideration how far they could with propriety lay this duty upon the Attorney General, as it was not contemplated in his appointment. It would also involve personal considerations as to the fitness of the officer alluded to for the business. Besides, he said, it would be interfering with the duties of the Executive to appoint a superintendent under this bill—a power which, he conceived, was vested in the PRESIDENT to nominate and the Senate to appoint. The Attorney General, he said, had special duties to perform, and he did not think he would have leisure sufficient to attend to this subject. Besides, not being sufficiently compensated by the United States, he was obliged to follow his own practice, with which an appointment of this kind would interfere. He thought the business of the Land Office would require all the attention of a special agent, and that it would be impossible to be transacted by any existing officer. It was true, for the first year, there might not be much to occupy an agent, but afterwards the business would be very considerable. He moved, therefore, to strike out the first part of the proposition.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought the objections urged against his motion of little weight. They went to this, that whenever Government wanted any new service performed, a new officer was to be employed, though it were not calculated to employ one-tenth part of a person's time. If they went on multiplying officers, he said, the United States would scarcely hold them. Congress had already acted upon a similar plan to that which he proposed with respect to the Sinking Fund. The office, he said, would be a mere superintendence. But they were told that, though there was not business at present, there would be sufficient to employ an agent wholly a year or two hence. He would say that the officer he mentioned was competent to the duties. It had been said that he had not sufficient emolument. Suppose, then, they were to add to it $1,000 or $1,100 for doing this new business. To this, he said, he would pledge himself, that he would do the business well, or say he could not do it.

Mr. VAN ALLEN observed that it had been said, that though the business will not at present fully employ an agent, it will do so hereafter. He thought it never would be sufficient to employ a special agent. If the present motion did not prevail, (which he wished might not,) he read one which he intended to move in its place. He was of opinion that all money paid for land should be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and that the Secretary of State, by keeping an additional clerk, might superintend the business. He did not think there was either occasion for two officers, or for one; but that the business would be much cheaper and more regularly transacted in the way he proposed.

Mr. NICHOLAS said his only view was to prevent a special officer from being appointed. He had no objection to leave the officer a blank, so that any existing officer might be employed.

Mr. W. SMITH said his objections were stronger than before to the motion; for, if any officer was employed, he would prefer the Attorney General, but objected to the House filling the office at all—it was not their business. He would much rather agree to the proposition of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from Virginia had referred to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund as a proof of the interference of that House in the appointment of officers. There was a material difference between the two cases, though he did not approve of the practice in that instance. He understood they were to give a salary, declare who should be superintendent, and, by saving a few hundred dollars, perhaps have the business ill done. If the salary of the Attorney General was not sufficient, he would consent to give him more. But, said he, does not the present proposition lead to a species of favoritism, of selecting particular officers for duties, to increase their salaries? He wished to have the business done either in the Department of State, or appoint a special officer to do it.

Mr. FINDLEY thought the business of the Land Office ought not to be connected with that of the Attorney General; for, said he, it might happen that the Attorney General would be wanted to prosecute the agent, which, if they were united in one person, it would be seen could not be done. It would be best, he was of opinion, to lay the duty on the Treasury or Secretary of State.

Mr. W. LYMAN saw nothing inconsistent in laying the duty upon some existing officer, as there could not be sufficient business for a special agent. He mentioned several instances in which this practice had been followed. Indeed, he said, it was the first time he had ever heard of the principle being controverted. He did not know whether the business might be referred to the Commissioner of the Revenue, if the Attorney General declined it.

Mr. GALLATIN apprehended that the objection of the gentleman from South Carolina to the motion went more to the manner than the substance. His objection is, that it is an assumption of power in this House to appoint an officer. No motion, he said, had been made to strike out the first section of the bill. That section goes to the establishment of two offices. [The Chairman said that the first section of the bill had been passed over by consent, but he understood it was to undergo amendment.] Notwithstanding that, Mr. G. said, it was at present a part of the bill. It appoints officers. He believed that House had no right to create new officers, but they might lay new duties upon old officers. The President had not only the power to appoint, but to remove officers; and, therefore, if he thinks the officer incompetent to fulfil an office he may remove him. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia was not so much to appoint a new officer as to lay new duties upon some existing officer. He wished an alteration to take place in the motion so as to conform to that idea.

Mr. NICHOLAS acknowledged the justness of the last member's observations, and said, the first section remaining in the bill was the cause of his putting his motion in the form in which he brought it forward.

The motion for striking out a part of Mr. NICHOLAS's motion was put and negative; and, on the original motion being put, it was lost—there being for it 85, against it 38.

Mr. KITTERA moved the following clause to the second section: "Provided that the real, and not the magnetical points shall govern the survey."

Mr. VAN ALLEN thought that this amendment would make the survey liable to many difficulties.

Mr. KITTERA said he was not a practical surveyor. He had however conferred with men very able to give him information on the subject, and was informed that this method of surveying would be of essential service. The lines run in this way would be certain and permanent, and as easily run as magnetical ones, which were subject to the variation of particular compasses, and that other variation which takes place at different times and in different places, which has not yet been satisfactorily accounted for.

Mr. GALLATIN thought there could be no objection to the amendment. He supposed that the Surveyor General would have had this power, if it had not been provided for. He said it was impossible to survey exactly by the magnet, as they varied from each other, and from year to year.

Mr. FINDLEY hoped no one would be prevented from voting for this clause from an idea of difficulty. He said the art was so easy as to be taught to any surveyors of moderate capacity in one evening. He was, therefore, for the motion.

Mr. PAGE said, that except this plan of surveying was adopted, great confusion might be introduced into the business. He believed the plan was perfectly practicable, and would be attended with the greatest advantage. The motion was carried.

Mr. VAN ALLEN proposed a section in place of the first, which, after some discussion and alteration, finally took the following form:

"Be it enacted, &c., That a Surveyor General shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to engage a sufficient number of skilful and expert surveyors, to enable him on or before the — day of — to ascertain the outline of all that part of the land lying Northwest of the river Ohio, in which the title of the Indian tribes is extinct, and which have not already been disposed of by the United States, and to lay out the same in manner hereafter directed."

[MARCH, 1796.]

The Committee having gone through the bill, rose and reported the bill with its amendments. The House then took it up, and went through the bill and amendments, which were all agreed to, without debate, except that appointing the method of surveying, which met with considerable opposition, but which was finally agreed to.

The bill was then recommitted, and four members added to the select committee to whom it was referred.

COMPENSATION TO MEMBERS, &c.

A communication was received from the Senate, with a bill, which originated there, for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt; which was read a first time. Also, the bill for allowing compensation to members of both Houses, &c., which they had agreed to with one amendment, viz: the striking out the word next, and inserting in its place in the present year.

REGULARITY OF MAILS.

Mr. W. SMITH said frequent complaints had been made of the miscarriage of letters to and from the Southern States, and it was of considerable consequence that these miscarriages should be remedied. He believed the Eastern mails were very regular, and it was a desirable thing to have the Southern equally so. In order to inquire into these complaints, he proposed a resolution to the following effect, which he wished to be referred to the proper committee:

"Resolved, That the committee to whom is referred the business relative to Post Offices and Post Roads be directed to institute an inquiry whether any, and what, impediments exist in the conveyance of the Southern Mail, and, if any, the cause thereof."

This resolution was agreed to.

THE SON OF LAFAYETTE.

Mr. LIVINGSTON laid a resolution to the following effect on the table:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether the son of Major General Lafayette be within the United States, and also whether any, and what, provision may be necessary for his support."

A resolution was also laid on the table respecting a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes, in the Northwestern Territory.

MONDAY, March 7.

A petition of the proprietors of a glass manufactory of Boston, praying for a bounty, or such other assistance as Congress might please, for the encouragement of their manufactory, and an additional duty on all window glass imported above a certain size, was read and referred to the Committee of Manufactures and Commerce.

A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing certain statements in pursuance of resolutions of the House, prepared by the Commissioners of the Revenue, respecting the Internal Revenues of the United States, with his report explanatory thereof, was read and ordered to be printed.

The bill for making a partial appropriation for the Military Establishment of 1796, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRACY moved that several reports of the Committee of Claims on the cases of invalids, might be taken up, in preference to the unfinished business before the House.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. HARPER thought it necessary to make a correction of what he had said on the debate respecting the subject of American sailors. He had said that Mr. Cutting had never released one seaman, whereas he has since found by a report on the subject, that he obtained the release of many. He had also seen a copy of a letter from Major Pinckney, in which it is said that considerable services were done by him to American seamen. He mentioned these circumstances in order to do away any impressions that might have been made by his assertion in the late debate.

THE TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. LIVINGSTON wished, before that business was gone into, to take up the consideration of the resolution which he laid upon the table some days ago respecting the gaining of information from the President on the subject of the Treaty; but if the House did not wish immediately to take up the subject, he hoped he might be permitted to make an amendment to the resolution, which had been suggested to him as proper, by gentlemen for whose opinion he had a high respect, in order to prevent any embarrassment in the Executive on account of any papers which he might not think proper to give up as relating to some existing negotiation; he therefore proposed the following exception to follow the resolution:

"— excepting such of said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed."

After a few observations from different members on the propriety of taking up the consideration of the resolution, it was determined first to go into the business proposed by Mr. Tracy, and the amended resolution was laid on the table.

CLAIMS OF INVALIDS.

The House having formed itself into a Committee of the Whole, the report of the Committee of Claims on the cases of invalids, which allows them such a proportion of relief as their different cases appeared to merit, was read and agreed to.

Mr. TRACY said that the committee had allowed a number of claims, though claimants had not in every instance complied with the necessary regulations in every particular, being of opinion that the failures had not arisen from any intention of evading the law, but from a want of knowledge. Considering that the testimony which they had provided must have been attended with much difficulty and some expense, and that as the law soon ceased to exist no further claims could be made, they thought it best to place them on the list.

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

There was, however, one class of claimants which they could not place on the list, as the examining physician had omitted to make a return of the ratio of their disability. The committee had provided a resolution to give them an opportunity of making good their claims, and that they may not suffer by an omission of the physician, they recommended that their allowance should take place from the time they had completed the testimony on their part.

The House went through the consideration of the report, which was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to place on the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, at the several rates annexed to their names, respectively, the following persons, viz: [Here follow the names.]

And that the Secretary of War be guided by the following rules, viz:

A full pension to a commissioned officer shall be considered the one-half of his pay. And the proportions less than a full pension are to be the proportions of half-pay.

A full pension to non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, is to be five dollars per month; and the proportions less than a full pension are the proportions of five dollars per month. The pensions shall be paid in the same manner as invalid pensioners are paid, who have been heretofore placed on the list, and under such restrictions and regulations, in all respects, as are prescribed by the laws of the United States in such cases provided.

2. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of War do also cause to be placed on the pension list of the United States the following persons, at the rates annexed to their names, respectively: [Here follow the names.]

And that a full pension to a commissioned officer shall be considered the one-half of his pay at the time of being wounded, and the proportions less than a full pension are those of such half-pay. And that a full pension to a non-commissioned officer and private is five dollars per month, and the proportions less than a full pension are the proportions of five dollars per month. The pensions to be paid in the same manner as invalid pensioners are paid, who have heretofore been placed on the list, under such restrictions and regulations, in all respects, as are prescribed by the laws of the United States in such cases provided.

3. Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary for the Department of War return to the respective District Judges the names of all such persons as have been transmitted to him by the several District Judges, pursuant to the act for the regulation of claims to invalid pensions, and in whose cases the examining physicians have neglected to specify the ratio of disability, together with such defective returns of physicians.

And the said District Judges, respectively, shall forthwith cause the examining physicians to specify the several rates of disability which have been so neglected; or, in case of sickness, death, or removal of one or both such physicians, to make new appointments, and cause the several rates of disability to be specified, and by the same physicians returned to them as soon as may be; of which they shall make return to the Secretary of War, who shall, at the session of Congress holden next after, or at the time of such receipt, make return thereof, with such observations as he may think proper to subjoin, that the proper order may be taken thereon by Congress.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the first and second resolutions, and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

THE TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

[The debate on the subject of the Treaty with Great Britain, and of the Constitutional powers of the House with respect to Treaties, having occupied the time of the House nearly every day for a month, (commencing the 7th of March and ending on the 7th of April,) it is deemed preferable, and as being more acceptable to the reader, to present the whole in one body consecutively, rather than to spread it in detached parts intermixed with other subjects, through the general proceedings of each day. This debate, as here given, possesses a character for authenticity and correctness which does not belong to the Newspaper reports of the day, it having undergone the careful revision of the speakers themselves. The debate which took place on making provision for carrying the Treaty into effect, will be found subsequently, in the proceedings of each day as the subject came up before the House.]

On the second of March, Mr. LIVINGSTON, after stating that the late British Treaty must give rise in the House to some very important and Constitutional questions, to throw light upon which every information would be required, laid the following resolution upon the table:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of the instructions to the Minister of the United States, who negotiated the Treaty with the King of Great Britain, communicated by his Message of the first of March, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to the said Treaty."

MARCH 7.—Mr. LIVINGSTON said he wished to modify the resolution he had laid on the table, requesting the PRESIDENT to lay before the House sundry documents respecting the Treaty. It was calculated to meet the suggestions of gentlemen to whose opinions he paid the highest respect, and was founded in the reflection that the negotiations on the twelfth article were probably unfinished; and therefore, he said, a disclosure of papers relative to that or any other pending negotiation, might embarrass the Executive. He wished, therefore, to add, at the end of his former motion, the following words: "Excepting such of said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed."

The motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON was then taken up.

Mr. TRACY requested gentlemen in favor of the resolution to give their reasons why the application for papers was to be made. The member from New York, he said, when he laid the resolution on the table, had intimated, that probably the constitutionality of the Treaty might be questioned, and predicated his resolution upon that supposition. It was well understood, he remarked, that the Treaty had excited great sensibility; the people had formed various opinions on the subject; he conceived it, therefore, a subject of great delicacy and magnitude, and was of opinion, that members should explain fully their meanings and intentions with respect to it at an early stage of the business, to prevent any bitterness from taking place in the course of the investigation, and to preserve the harmony and dignity of the House. He asked the motives that influenced the friends of the resolution, because, if the constitutionality of the instrument was to be questioned, and the papers were called for on that ground, he thought it a bad one. This question, he conceived, should be decided by comparing the instrument with the Constitution, and that a reference to any thing else in deciding the question could not be proper.

If the papers are called for to ground an impeachment against any officer, he wished the intention declared; he wished to know whether the negotiator was to be impeached, or the PRESIDENT, who had certainly had a principal agency in the business. He wished to be possessed of the reasons which urged the motion, that he might be enabled to determine on its propriety. This was a delicate subject he said: the calling for papers appeared to bear evidence of some retrospective intention; he desired to be apprised what that was. He conceded the right of the House to pass the resolution, but they could not do it without good cause. He did not accuse the gentleman who made the motion, of making it without good cause, but was anxious to know what he would do with them. Was it intended to ascertain, he asked, whether a better Treaty might be made? He concluded by observing, that the question was of consequence, and by reminding the House, that they acted for a great people, and for posterity.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, he had no wish to conceal his intentions. The motives that impelled him to make the motion, were not such as to make him wish to conceal them, or such as he ought to blush at when discovered. The gentleman from Connecticut wished to know why he had brought this resolution before the House? He did it for the sake of information. That gentleman wished to know to what point this information was to apply? Possibly to all the points he had enumerated. It was impossible, however, to say to which or how many of these points without a recurrence to those very papers. He could not determine now, he said, that an impeachment would be deemed advisable; yet, when the papers are obtained, they may make such a step advisable. It was impossible to declare an impeachment advisable, without having the necessary lights as to the conduct of officers. The House were, on every occasion, the guardians of their country's rights. They are, by the Constitution, the accusing organ of the officers employed. The information called for they ought to possess, as it would tend to elucidate the conduct of the officers. His principal reason, however, for proposing the measure, was a firm conviction that the House were vested with a discretionary power of carrying the Treaty into effect, or refusing it their sanction. To guide them in an enlightened determination as to that point, the papers are necessary; they would certainly throw light upon the subject, and enable the House to determine whether the Treaty was such as that it ought to be carried into effect. This had been called a delicate question. He did not view it in that light. The House had a right to call for the information: if the PRESIDENT had any reasons of state that would make the information improper, he would say so.

Mr. W. LYMAN observed, that the mode of argument adopted by the gentleman from Connecticut, of inquiring into motives which influenced others, might easily be retorted. The gentleman might now be called upon to state his motives, with the objections, if he had any, to the resolution. The gentleman had done neither: he had not offered even one objection why the resolution ought not to pass. If no objections could be offered, Mr. L. said it was conclusive proof in its favor, and that those were weighty considerations why it should pass. However, he said, he was very willing to mention some which had occurred to his mind. It was a matter of great notoriety that the Treaty referred to in the resolution had excited very strong emotions of sensibility, and that the public mind had been greatly agitated; that petitions had been presented, from all parts of the Union, praying for the interposition of the House upon that subject. Perhaps if the information contained in the papers called for, was made public, the anxiety which had manifested itself would be allayed. Possibly they might throw such light as to produce a very great degree of unanimity relative to that instrument. Such circumstances might possibly be disclosed as to reconcile those now opposed to it, and who might otherwise remain irreconcilable. If the resolution tended only to this object, it was effecting a valuable purpose; but there was, he said, another consideration of vast importance, which was, whether the Treaty had not encroached upon the Legislative powers of the Constitution. As to that point, he would admit the papers could not be expected to give much light. But if the House should conceive their Constitutional powers extended to a consideration of the subject, undoubtedly they ought to be in possession of the papers in question, and all the information relative thereto. Unless some very formidable objections should be brought forward against the resolution, which, hitherto, Mr. L. said, had not been suggested to him, he should vote for it, and hoped that the House would be of the same opinion; for he contemplated that it would be productive of great utility, and, as yet, foresaw not the smallest disadvantage that could in any way accrue.

Mr. GILES acknowledged that it was a subject that had excited much sensibility, and for this very reason conceived it claimed every light that could be thrown upon it. He believed that that sensibility would be increased if information was denied, and, possibly allayed if obtained. If the resolution passed, the grounds of the proceeding would then become known; and, if they were such as comported with the interests of the United States, the dislike to the Treaty might subside. On this ground he should give the resolution his vote, unless weightier objections than those already adduced could be brought forward. If the Treaty is to be judged of by adverting to the instrument alone, there was great cause for dislike. If it is possible to throw light on it, that shall be its apology, why refuse the information? He did not wish to pass judgment on it without knowing the circumstances under which it was made. Impeachment had been mentioned: such an event was not a necessary consequence of the inquiry, though a possible one. He did not contemplate it as the probable issue, but the information might tend, perhaps to reconcile those now averse to the instrument. On this ground he hoped gentlemen would not object to the information being called for. A member conceived the friends of the resolution ought to declare what they intended to do in the business. He believed this would be a candid course of procedure. For his own part, if he was to make up his judgment definitively upon the face of the instrument alone, he was prepared to give his opinion; but he wished further information, which he hoped would not be refused by negating the present resolution. He observed, that with him information was the object of the call, and a sense of responsibility the inducement.

Treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. MURRAY said, that he was against the resolution for two reasons, which then struck his mind forcibly: The first was the want of a declared object within the acknowledged cognizance of the House; the other was because he believed it was designed as the ground-work of a very dangerous doctrine, that the House had a right to adjudge, to adopt, or to reject treaties generally. Had the gentleman stated the object for which they called for the papers to be an impeachment, or any inquiry into fraud, as a circumstance attending the making of the Treaty, the subject would be presented under an aspect very different from that which it has assumed. He considered a Treaty, constitutionally made, to be the supreme law of the land. The Treaty in view has been negotiated and ratified, he thought, agreeably to the Constitution. It has been issued, by the PRESIDENT's proclamation, as an act obligatory upon the United States. If the House mean to go into the merits of that instrument, and the information be called for with that view, he should feel himself bound by the Constitution to give it every opposition. If the PRESIDENT, by the Constitution, has the power, with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, to ratify a Treaty, the House has no right to investigate the merits of the Treaty, unless they have the right to reject it. Treaties are the supreme laws of the land. Powers are delegated to these two branches of the Government distinct from those lodged in this House. As long as they exercise these powers agreeably to the Constitution, their acts cannot be controlled by this House; for it would be a solecism to say that full powers are given to two branches upon a given subject, and yet a power is elsewhere lodged to annul the acts which proceed from these powers. He considered the resolution as unconstitutional, as it is predicated upon the right of this branch to intermeddle with the proceedings of the other branches on this point, not alleged to be unconstitutional.

If there is to be investigation on the Treaty, the inquiry must stand upon the allegation that the Treaty is contrary to the Constitution; and then, if that could be proved, it would not be the law of the land. Of the inexpediency of the resolution he was well convinced, as it affected the secrets which ought to be kept from foreign Powers. It might lead to a disclosure, to foreign nations, through this House, of certain points in our foreign relations, and in the estimate of our own domestic interests, that might do us mischief. There might be, in negotiations, transactions, which, to expose, would be a violation of good faith. He did not imagine that there were such in the negotiation of this Treaty, but the right is claimed thus over all similar cases.

Mr. M. was proceeding in some remarks respecting the powers of the Senate, when the SPEAKER interrupted him, and reminded Mr. M. that no observations respecting the independent rights of the Senate could be in order.

Mr. BUCK said: I am opposed to the resolution now under consideration, not from an apprehension that the papers referred to will not bear the public scrutiny, or from a belief that there would be the least reluctance on the part of the Executive to deliver them on account of any such apprehensions of his; but I am opposed to the resolution in point of principle, because I conceive those papers can be of no use to us, unless to gratify feelings of resentment or a vain curiosity. As I would never sacrifice principle to these motives, and thereby fix a precedent pernicious in its consequences, I hope for the indulgence of the House while I offer my sentiments upon the subject.

In order to determine the propriety of the present measure, I think it necessary to take into view the present existing state of the Treaty, and to consider what binding force, if any, it now has; what benefits can be derived from those papers to effect an alteration, and what powers we possess to call for them.

The Treaty is negotiated, assented to by the Senate, ratified by the PRESIDENT, the ratifications exchanged. It is now promulgated, communicated to us, and the PRESIDENT has made solemn proclamation, enjoining it upon all persons bearing office, civil or military, within the United States, and all other citizens or inhabitants thereof, to execute and observe the same. Was this the proclamation of GEORGE WASHINGTON, considered as a man, detached from the powers vested in him by the people, it would excite ridicule. Was it the proclamation of a King or Despot, who arrogated to himself the right of dictating laws to men without their consent, it would excite contempt; and if it is in fact the proclamation of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, who, under color of his office, has assumed powers not delegated to him, it must excite indignation. But, if it be neither of these, but is, indeed, the voice of United America, sounding through the PRESIDENT, as the only organ of the nation in this particular case, this gives it a different stamp, and in this sense, to me the sound is as heavy as thunder, majestic as Heaven, and the height of treason to disobey it.

But suffer me to solicit the attention of this House while I premise a few things, before I immediately apply my observations to the point in question. For what did America contend; for what did she endure the toils of war, and sacrifice thousands of her citizens; for what did many members within these walls endure the same fatigues of war, stem the rage of battle, and shed their own precious blood? I believe every mind will accord with me when I say, that it was to cast off the oppressive power of a nation which, being detached from us, usurped and arrogated to herself the right of dictating to us laws, contrary to our will, while we had no voice in passing those laws through the medium of our Representatives; and to gain to ourselves the important right of self-government. Our success was equal to the magnitude of the object; we gained the glorious prize; liberty and peace succeeded war; the ferocious and turbulent passions were lulled to rest; and, in 1787, free and united America, undisturbed by factions within, unawed by foes without, was seen exercising her cool, dispassionate reason, that divine gift of God to man, in concerting and framing a system to perpetuate to herself and posterity, the glorious prize she had won, the invaluable blessing of self-government, founded on the dispassionate will of the great body of the sovereign people. Three great objects met her attention; first, rules to check the licentious wickedness of individuals, and mark out their separate rights; second, intermediate Judges to apply those rules; and, thirdly, negotiations, compacts, and Treaties, with foreign nations. It being impossible for the great body of the people to collect individually to perform those necessary functions, they frame a Constitution in which they express their will in respect to each; they constitute the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary departments; mark out and assign to each their separate and distinct powers, and place them as the three great organs through which the future will of the people is to be known in respect to those great functions. The Constitution is then, emphatically, the expression of the will of the great body of the sovereign people, and while Government moves on conformably to it, we may with the utmost propriety say, that the laws dictated by the will of the people reign, and not men or kings, and this is in the strictest sense of the word self-government, so far as it can apply to a nation; but if we depart from this basis, then may it be said that men reign and not the laws; the will of the people is then abandoned, and the glorious rights for which we have contended, sacrificed and lost. Let us then take the Constitution as our only guide, and see with what authority this Treaty has been made.

In the first section of the second article of the Constitution, it is declared, that the Executive power shall be vested in a PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES of America. In another clause of the same section it is declared, that before he enters upon the execution of his office he shall take an oath, that he will faithfully execute the office of PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and will, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States; and in the second section of the same article it is declared, that he shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and that he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers, and Consuls; and in the sixth article it is declared, that all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land. By these passages I conceive that the will of the sovereign people is clearly expressed; that the PRESIDENT and Senate should stand as their Representatives, fully authorized by them to make Treaties, and are vested with every necessary requisite power for that purpose; that they are placed as the organ of the nation, through whom the will of the people is to be known in relation to all those compacts, and it is equally clear that if they have kept within the bounds prescribed by the Constitution, the Treaty now in question has become a supreme law of the land, and that agreeably to the express and dispassionate will of the great body of the sovereign people.

I will admit, that if the PRESIDENT has assumed powers not delegated to him by the people in making and proclaiming this Treaty, it is void in itself; but of what use can those papers be to us in determining that question? Are we to explain the Treaty by private and confidential papers, or by anything extraneous to the instrument itself? I conclude not. The instrument is then before us; let us compare it with the Constitution and see if there is one article, sentence, word, or syllable in the Treaty, which clashes with, or is contradictory to, the Constitution. This is an inquiry I will pledge myself not to oppose; but for this, these papers can be of no use.

But if we are to take upon ourselves the right of judging whether it was expedient to make the Treaty or not; whether it is as good a one as might have been obtained or not; and if we are to assume the power of judging upon the merits as well as the constitutionality of it, then those papers may be necessary, and if we possess the power of thus judging, then we equally possess the right to call for those papers. But from whence do we derive this right and power? Have the people when coolly deliberating upon and forming the Constitution, which is the expression of their dispassionate will, in that Constitution, given us this right? No, not a syllable in the Constitution that even intimates the idea. Do we possess the right merely because we are the Representatives of the people? No, that cannot be for we are their Representatives only for particular purposes, and the Constitution has prescribed to us our bounds, and assigned to us the limits of our powers as well as to the Executive. Are we to derive this right from popular opposition to the Treaty, and from thence say, that it is the will of the nation that we should exercise this right of inquiry? Is then popular clamor, which originates in discontent, is fostered in violence and passion, and stimulated by the intrigues of interested and ambitious individuals, to be taken as the dispassionate will of the nation? If so, how are we to designate and mark out the numbers of the discontented? Are we to learn it from inflammatory newspaper publications, teeming with invectives against Government and its measures, and not carrying even the appearance of reason with them? These can furnish no data by which to determine whether it is one-tenth or even one-thousandth part of the nation that are dissatisfied. Are we to learn it from the petitions now before us? If so, the petitioners do not constitute one-thousandth part of the nation; and I presume, as those petitions have all one stamp, the petitioners are all in unison of sentiment; if so, I have a specimen of their ideas: the resolution of Bennington County Convention, transmitted to me, goes no farther than to request the Representatives of that State to use their best endeavors to bring on a discussion of the constitutionality of the Treaty; it does not even suggest the idea that we have or should exercise the power to call for those papers, or judge upon the expediency or merits of the Treaty. Shall we then assume the power, and go even beyond the wishes of the discontented? If so, where shall we stop? If we, by an assumption of power, may invade the prerogatives of the people vested in the PRESIDENT, as their representative in making Treaties, and may rifle the sacred deposit of their confidential correspondence with foreign nations, and judge upon the merits of a Treaty, then may we reverse the judgment of the PRESIDENT and Senate, and annul the Treaty. Who is, then, to make the next? Is it supposable that the PRESIDENT will again attempt it, when the principle is fixed, that he and the Senate are not the ultimate judges of its merits? No; to me this is absurd. We must, then, take the whole business to ourselves, and become the negotiators as well as the ratifiers of a Treaty; and if we may do this, upon the same principle, whenever there shall be a popular clamor raised against the persons appointed to the Judiciary department, we may interpose, call on the PRESIDENT for the reasons of his making the appointment, declare it injudicious, withhold appropriations for the salaries, and engross all the Judiciary powers to ourselves. Upon the same principle we may ultimately determine upon our own adjournments, declare our sittings perpetual, constitute ourselves the judges and executioners of the law, and become the accusers, judges, and executioners of our fellow citizens. This would be forming an aristocracy with a witness; and where, then, would be the boasted rights of America, for which she fought and bled? These are the consequences to which the principle involved in this resolution would lead.

But suffer me to reverse the tables, and consider this subject in another point of light. Let us suppose every word in the Constitution which now applies to the PRESIDENT making Treaties applied to us, and that all the powers which now apply to us, as a Legislature, applied to the PRESIDENT. This, I think, is a fair way of examining the subject; for when, in imagination only, we consider ourselves as clothed with those powers, it cannot be supposed we shall instantly attach to the idea those prejudices which, after a long exercise of those powers, we might possess. Then, considering ourselves as having those Constitutional powers, let us suppose that we had made and ratified the present Treaty, and made the same Proclamation the PRESIDENT has done, and which had been signed by the Speaker of this House; and had called on the PRESIDENT to pass the necessary laws to fulfil the stipulations, and then suppose he had done as we are now about to do—called on us for the instructions we gave our agent, and the correspondence held while the Treaty was negotiating. Let every member now present reflect and determine for himself what our feelings would then be upon the subject. Would not our keen sensibility be as much raised as when our virtue was assailed by the contaminating breath of Randall? Should not we consider it as an insult to the majesty of the people, which so conspicuously shone through us as their Representatives? Should not we then say he was assuming powers not delegated to him; that he was invading the prerogatives of the people vested in us, and rifling the deposits of their national correspondences? Should not we embrace every idea which I have suggested upon this subject as now applying to the PRESIDENT? Would it not be said, he was aiming to engross all the powers of Government, and to set himself up as a despot? Would not his insolence, resound from every side of these walls, be bandied about from one end of the Continent to the other, and wafted even into distant climes? Nay, should we not go further, and say, that as the Constitution had vested in us the power to make Treaties, it had also necessarily given us the sole right of judging, not only of the merits, but also of the constitutionality of them? Should we not say, the people, by giving us the power, had thereby decided the point, and determined us as being the best and ultimate judges; and that it was not for the PRESIDENT to impeach our judgment, nor implicate us as having violated the oath we had taken? By what rule of reason do we now calculate, then, to suppose the PRESIDENT does not possess the same feelings, and embrace the same ideas, as now apply to him, standing as the representatives of the people in making Treaties? And how can we suppose it would not be a violation of the Constitution, and an assumption of power in us, to adopt this measure? Is it not clear, that if the will of the people is not expressed in the Constitution, nor the will of the nation in the opposition to the Treaty, that we should exercise this power; that our exercising it would be a departure from the will of the people, and that our Government would then no longer rest on that basis? And would it not then be equally clear, that we had abandoned the inestimable rights for which we had contended? This would be to overturn our Constitution, and demonstrate to the world that a free people were not capable of self-government, and hold out but poor encouragement to those nations now struggling for freedom. In this point of view, I consider the question all-important; on this step, and the present crisis, depend the great and important question whether we are to enjoy the reign of laws dictated by the dispassionate will of the people, or whether men must content themselves to be subject to the reign of popular frenzy, anarchy, and confusion, on the one hand, or the insolent reign of despotism on the other.

As I consider the passing of this resolution a direct step towards the abolition of those sacred rights for which we have fought and bled, should I give my consent to it, the blood which I have shed, and my own mutilated frame, would reproach me.

Mr. BALDWIN thought the resolution so unexceptionable that he had expected it would have been agreed to without debate. The PRESIDENT has sent the House the Treaty; petitions have come forward on the subject; the House must act in the business. It is yet unaccompanied with any documents to throw light upon it. No person concerned in the negotiation has a seat on the floor of the House; so that no oral information can be expected. Implicit faith was not to be reposed, he imagined, in public officers. It would be unfair to take up the subject naked and unexplained.

He believed the resolution far from looking like hostility towards the Executive—was a measure which the Executive must wish for, as it affords him an opportunity of submitting to the House his grounds of proceeding in the business, which he could not do without it, except by rendering himself liable to the charge of officiousness. As to the objection that these papers were secrets of the Executive Department, he thought it more plausible than solid. The Executive might communicate them confidentially to the House, as was often done, or might keep back such as there was any temporary impropriety in communicating, on account of other transactions now depending. He thought the importance of having many Governmental secrets was diminishing. The doctrine of publicity, he said, had been daily gaining ground in public transactions in general, and he confessed his opinions had every day more and more a greater tendency that way. The passion for mystery was exploded, and what experience he had had in public matters confirmed him in the opinion that the greater the publicity of measures the greater the success. He had seen the doors of the House frequently shut, and had rarely known any good to arise from it. In a free Government, he wished the arguments for and against measures to be known to the people: this would reconcile them to those founded on sound reason and policy. This he had ever found the case in the part of the country he represented. Whenever he had had an opportunity of stating the reasons that had influenced his vote on any particular question, he found those reasons had weight, and reconciled his constituents to the measure.

He again dwelt on the importance of accompanying the law with the motives of it. Upon this principle the House publish their Journals, and he had always found publicity produced a good effect. He should vote for the resolution, unless more valid objections to it than those hitherto brought forward against it could be adduced.

Mr. GALLATIN said, no member had a higher opinion than himself of the talents and patriotism of the member from Vermont, but he could not help expressing his astonishment at what had dropped from that gentleman. From what he had said, no one could have imagined that the motion before the House was merely a call for papers, but would have supposed that it was in contemplation to disorganize the Government, and to erect the House into a National Convention. It was too much to be feared that on a discussion of the Treaty the alarm would be sounded. We are scarcely on the threshold, and the cry of confusion and anarchy is already raised. He little expected to hear this in a debate on the present motion, which did not necessarily involve a Constitutional question. If he thought it did, he would have advised the mover to withdraw it, as he wished every Constitutional question to be discussed in a direct way.

What, he asked, is the state of the present question? The PRESIDENT tells the House that he has made a Treaty, and lays it before them: it is referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for some purpose. What shape the discussion may take in that Committee cannot now be decided; but whether, when we take up the question of the Treaty, it be agreed that we have an agency and a discretion in carrying it into effect, or whether it be intended only to express our opinion, by means of a declaratory resolution, of that instrument, the information called for will be useful, by showing the reasons which induced the adoption of the Treaty. It had been allowed that the Treaty had excited much discontent, but it was supposed that the PRESIDENT and the Senate were the best judges, because they possessed the best information: to render this information public, must then answer a valuable purpose. The exception annexed to the resolution rendered it, in his mind, totally unexceptionable. The motion does not lay claim to the secrets of the Executive, but only asks. If the PRESIDENT thinks proper not to give the information, he will tell the House so; then a question may arise whether they shall get at those secrets whether he will or no: but that is not the question now.

In another view information would be of use: it would enable the House to form a just opinion of the meaning of any doubtful article of the Treaty. A member had expressed the opinion that the House had no discretionary power relative to the Treaty. This was taking for granted what remained to be proved; this would be a point to be discussed.

Mr. MURRAY explained, that what he asserted was, that if the Treaty was the supreme law of the land, then there was no discretionary power in the House, except on the question of its constitutionality.

MARCH, 1796.]

Mr. GALLATIN said he should not now enter into the merits of the question, but merely state that certain powers are delegated by the Constitution to Congress. They possess the authority of regulating trade. The Treaty-making power delegated to the Executive may be considered as clashing with that. The question may arise whether a Treaty made by the PRESIDENT and Senate containing regulations touching objects delegated to Congress, can be considered binding without Congress passing laws to carry it into effect. A difference of opinion may exist as to the proper construction of the several articles of the Constitution, so as to reconcile those apparently contradictory provisions. But all those questions would occur in future discussions. What is now wanted is information on the subject, to elucidate the different views which may be taken of the Treaty. It must do good to obtain it, and could do no harm to ask for it. If it would be improper to communicate any part of the information on the subject, the PRESIDENT will say so. He had hoped, he said, that the resolution would have passed without objection. He concluded by observing, that the House were the grand inquest of the nation, and that they had the right to call for papers on which to ground an impeachment; but he believed, that if this was intended, it would be proper that the resolution should be predicated upon a declaration of that intention. At present, he did not contemplate the exercise of that right.

Mr. GILBERT was opposed to the resolution. He had heard no satisfactory reason given why the information should be asked for. He considered it as an attempt to encroach on the powers of the Executive Department. He insisted on the necessity of secrecy as long as there are despotic Governments to be negotiated with. If the PRESIDENT was to refuse the information, in which he conceived he would be justified, it might create discontents and heart-burnings. He was against the resolution as unconstitutional, unprecedented, inexpedient, improper, and dangerous to the peace and prosperity of the Government.

Mr. MADISON admitted that every proposition however distantly related to a question on the Treaty drew from the importance of that subject considerable importance to itself. In a discussion of this subject, he felt strongly the obligation of proceeding with the utmost respect to the decorum and dignity of the House, with a proper delicacy to the other departments of Government, and, at the same time, with fidelity, and responsibility for our constituents. The proposition now before the House, he conceived, might be considered as closely connected with this important question. It was to be decided whether the general power of making Treaties supersedes the powers of the House of Representatives, particularly specified in the Constitution, so as to take to the Executive all deliberative will, and leave the House only an executive and ministerial instrumental agency? He was not satisfied whether it was expedient at this time to go into a consideration of this very important question. If gentlemen were not disposed to press it, he would attempt to throw the resolution into such form as not to bear even the appearance of encroaching on the Constitutional rights of the Executive. The resolution, in the form in which it was first presented was liable to objection; the mover had removed that objection in great measure, by adding an exception to the papers requested. He wished to submit, whether the resolution would not be further improved by introducing the following words in lieu of the amendment proposed by the member from New York: "Except so much of said papers as, in his judgment, it may not be consistent with the interest of the United States, at this time, to disclose." He moved these words as an amendment, after striking out those brought forward by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CRAB, though against the measure, expressed his intention of ameliorating the resolution as much as possible: he should therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. SEDGWICK conceived the business assumed a new aspect. The subject was important; he wished to deliberate on it attentively, and hoped time would be given him to make up his mind. He moved to adjourn, and the House did adjourn.

MARCH 8.—The House took up Mr. LIVINGSTON's resolution; the amendment proposed yesterday by Mr. MADISON being immediately before the Committee,

A question was immediately taken upon that amendment, and lost —37 to 47.

The original resolution then came into consideration.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) said, that he had listened attentively to the reasons advanced in favor of this resolution, and that he had heard nothing to convince him of its propriety. The PRESIDENT and Senate have, by the Constitution, the power of making Treaties, and the House have no agency in them except to make laws necessary to carry them into operation; he considered the House as bound, in common with their fellow-citizens, to do everything in their power to carry them into full execution. He recognized but one exception to this rule, and that was, when the instrument was clearly unconstitutional. In this case, he remarked, it had not been said that the Treaty was unconstitutional. When the resolution was first brought forward, it had indeed been observed, that the discussion might involve certain Constitutional points, and therefore the papers called for by the resolution were necessary: but it was obvious, the question of constitutionality should be determined from the face of the instrument, and that a knowledge of the preparatory steps which led to its adoption, could throw no light upon it; that ground was therefore abandoned even by the friends of the resolution, and others were resorted to.

A member from New York had said, the information called for was wanted, as it might apply to all the possible views of the Treaty question; that he could not declare the particular point now, but that when the papers were before the House, they would then be enabled to judge. He differed in opinion from that member; when the House were about to call for papers, he conceived they should state for what purpose they wanted them; whether they wished to examine the question of constitutionality, or whether they intended an impeachment. In the latter case, a member from Pennsylvania, in favor of the resolution, had conceded, that the resolution should be expressly predicated on a declaration of the intention. All the gentlemen who had expressed their sentiments on the subject had renounced the ground of impeachment; the question of constitutionality was renounced, and the papers are finally to be called for in order to give general information. The member from New York wished for information as to the whole transaction to be before the House, that they might be enabled to judge of the propriety of carrying the Treaty into effect. This ground, he conceived, not tenable under the Constitution; the House were bound to carry it into effect, unless unconstitutional. They have no right to investigate the merits of the Treaty; it is the law of the land, and they are bound to carry it into effect, unless they intended to resist the constituted authorities.

A member from Massachusetts had, yesterday intimated that it was possible a knowledge of these papers might allay the sensibility which had been evinced on the subject of the Treaty. For his own part, he would not pretend to say what effect it might produce; but this argument was a severe reflection on the proceedings of the various associations, who had given their opinions of the Treaty, without thinking a sight of these papers necessary; it was also a censure on those Legislative bodies who had formed their opinions of it, without this necessary light. They thought themselves able to form an opinion of the instrument without the aid of these papers. If the public meetings which denounced the Treaty had thought them necessary to forming their opinion, they would have suspended it till these papers came to light. The gentleman from Massachusetts, had also said, that the papers might develop circumstances which would show the impropriety of carrying the instrument into effect. He, for his part, knew of no such circumstances; if there were any, they must go to the characters of the persons concerned in the transaction; and if the gentleman knew of any such, it was his duty to state them as a ground of impeachment; but from all quarters the intention of impeachment was disavowed. If the gentleman meant merely to allude to the circumstances which had been necessarily incidental to the negotiation, they were not, in his opinion, the proper subjects for the consideration of the House. With as much propriety might the PRESIDENT, when about to execute a law, wish to examine the Journals of the House, the instructions to committees, to determine whether it was improper or not. The PRESIDENT, in executing a law, examined its constitutionality on the face of it only. If the PRESIDENT and Senate have alone the Legislative power with respect to a Treaty, the House had no right to inquire into the subject of negotiation that led to it. The House are surely not to enter into the merits of the proceeding, and determine whether the instrument should be negotiated over again. This was not a right given by the Constitution, and if attempted to be exercised, it could be done only by arrogating it. By the Constitution the powers of Government are distributed; to Congress the Legislative power is given, the Executive to the PRESIDENT, and under the head of the Executive, the power of making treaties is comprised; but they must be, for greater security, approved by two-thirds of the Senate. All Treaties are the supreme law of the land, and the House cannot meddle with the Treaty-making power, without being guilty of usurpation.

A member from Virginia had said, that the information called for by the resolution might allay the ferment in the public mind, that it might form an apology for the Treaty. If the PRESIDENT, he replied, had thought so, he would have been glad to have laid it before the House; but he believed, he thought it did not need an apology, and that when tested with proper information by due consideration, that it required none.

When compared with the Constitution, and with other instruments of the same nature; when recourse was had to the books calculated to throw light upon it, it would be found that it required no justification from the correspondence and instructions.

He was surprised that gentlemen who displayed such zeal for the Constitution should support a proposition, the tendency of which went indirectly to break down the Constitutional limits between the Executive and Legislative Departments. The Constitution had assigned to the Executive the business of negotiation with foreign Powers; this House can claim no right by the Constitution to interfere in such negotiations; every movement of the kind must be considered as an attempt to usurp powers not delegated, and will be resisted by the Executive; for a concession would be a surrender of the powers specially delegated to him, and a violation of his trust. The proposition calls upon the PRESIDENT to lay before the House the instructions given to Mr. Jay, and the correspondence between him and Lord Grenville; and for what purpose? Is this House to negotiate the Treaty over again? Has the Constitution made this House a diplomatic body, invested with the powers of negotiation? Is not this House excluded? for, if the maxim that "the expression of one is the exclusion of another," applies to this case the assignment of the Treaty-making power to the PRESIDENT and Senate, is a manifest exclusion of this House. This call then on the PRESIDENT is an attempt to obtain indirectly what the Constitution has expressly assigned to others. Are these papers necessary to enable us to judge whether the Treaty is Constitutional or not? If the Treaty be unconstitutional, it must sufficiently appear so on the face of it; if the articles of the instrument be Constitutional, can the preparatory steps make them not so? Gentlemen complain of want of information. Admitting their complaint to be well founded, let them resort to the proper sources of information. What are those sources? If information be wanted to enable them to judge of the constitutionality of the instrument, let them take the Constitution in one hand and the Treaty in the other, compare them, and then decide; if from such comparison, they find no grounds for declaring the Treaty unconstitutional, their decision must be in favor of its constitutionality. Mr. S. referred to the proceedings of the Supreme Court in the case lately argued of the carriage tax and just decided; how did the Court proceed? Did they call for the Journals of the two Houses, or the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in which the law originated, or the debates of the House on passing the law? What impression would such call have made on the public mind? Would it have enhanced in the public opinion either the dignity or wisdom of that tribunal? They took the Constitution in their hand, and tested the act by that standard, and by that alone has their decision been governed.

Treaty with Great Britain.

Is the object in calling for this information to discover whether the negotiator has conformed to his instructions? If so Mr. S. was at a loss to discern how that would affect the question. Such a circumstance might be important as it related to the PRESIDENT, and might prevent his laying a Treaty, not conformable to his instructions, before the Senate; but, being ratified by the PRESIDENT and Senate, all was done which the Constitution required. The Constitution does not require the intervention of a negotiator; it only requires the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, and the sanction of the PRESIDENT; the PRESIDENT is not bound to employ an agent, he may in person conclude the Treaty with the foreign Minister or he may employ the Secretary of State; the instructions are private directions from him to his agent; and whether those instructions be pursued, or departed from, is a question only between the PRESIDENT and his agent. By adopting the Treaty, he sanctions the conduct of his agent; by laying it before the Senate, he manifests his approbation of a departure from his instructions, if any such there were; which, however, in the present case, is not admitted. To return to the case already referred to, of the carriage tax; would it be a material ingredient in the inquiry respecting the constitutionality of that tax, whether or not, the Committee of Ways and Means had conformed to the instructions of the House, in recommending such a tax? Undoubtedly not; the ultimate act, as passed by the different branches, would alone be looked into.

Mr. S. next adverted to the consequences of such a measure. Diplomatic transactions are in all countries of a secret nature; in the progress of negotiation, many things are necessarily suggested, the publication of which may involve serious inconvenience and disadvantage to the parties negotiating. Our Constitution has, therefore, wisely assigned this duty to the Executive. The precedent attempted to be established is, then, a dangerous one; for it not only tends to alter the nature of the Government, but to endanger the interests of the country. This is the first instance of the kind since the establishment of the Constitution. The Executive has, indeed, of his own accord, communicated to us such papers relative to negotiations, as appeared to him proper to lay before us, and as might show the public he was pursuing the requisite steps for obtaining redress. But there is not one solitary instance on the Journals, of a movement on our side, to obtain such papers, where he has not deemed it proper on his part, to transmit them. In this case, the PRESIDENT has communicated the Treaty, without any papers accompanying it. This is an evidence of his sentiments. Had he thought it his duty to have communicated the instructions and correspondence, he would unquestionably have done it. It has been said that he would refuse a compliance with such call, if he thought it improper; but this was no reason for making a wanton call; his having withheld these papers is an evidence that he thought it improper to send them; if, after this they are requested, and he sends them, it will be an avowal, on his part, that he committed an error in not sending them at first, or that they have been extorted from him. This call is then calculated to place him in a painful dilemma; he must either resist the application of this House, or surrender essential Executive rights. Is it expedient, is it generous or candid, to place him in this situation, without a more urgent necessity than has been stated? Mr. S. deprecated that clashing of authorities, which he was convinced this call would produce. This House, said he, is the representative of the people, for Legislative purposes; but the PRESIDENT is likewise their representative, for Executive purposes. It was not necessary, on this occasion, to pre-judge the extent of the right of interference, in a case of impeachment of the PRESIDENT by the House; because that case is, at this time, avowed to be out of the question. On any other ground, this House in its Legislative capacity, ought to be extremely cautious of encroaching on the rights which the PRESIDENT has derived from the people, as their representative, and which he exercises for their benefit. In the business of Treaties, the Constitution has provided no other check than the requisite concurrence of the Senate, and the right of impeachment by this House; unless, therefore, this call is predicated on an intention to impeach, and so stated and understood, it is an encroachment on the Executive, and will be attended with serious consequences.

A gentleman from Virginia had said that, when the papers are laid before the House, they would see upon what principle the Treaty had been made. He answered, that the PRESIDENT and Senate had a right to make Treaties; that they were the law of the land; that, in the present case, the British Treaty had been proclaimed as such. If it was not the law of the land, an impeachment should be brought forward against the PRESIDENT for declaring it so. But there was no motion for impeachment. If it is the law of the land, what could the House do to prevent its being in force? why call for papers to see whether it was properly made? Can the House set it aside? They may resist it, and so may individuals resist the law, at the risk of consequences. The House have taken an oath to maintain the Constitution, and carry the laws into effect. It was a doctrine he had heard before now, on the floor of the House, and a sound one, that a law must be repealed or obeyed: if it is not repealed, it must be obeyed, or the Government dissolved. Can the House repeal the Treaty? No; then they must obey it.

The gentleman from Georgia had reprobated all secrets in Republican Governments, though he admitted there might evils arise by divulging papers whilst a negotiation was yet pending. With respect to secrets, Mr. S. thought them unavoidable in all Governments; it was a standing rule in that House, when confidential communications were made from the PRESIDENT, to clear the galleries, and even to exclude some of the officers of the House. He referred to the practice of the Old Congress on the subject of secrecy; and alluded to the case of a member who had been censured for divulging secret correspondence. It had been said by the member from Georgia, also, that the Treaty carried no explanation with it, and if the House acted upon it, they must take it up unexplained. He thought nothing more was necessary than to see that it was a law. What explanation did that gentleman want? What necessity for information with respect to the negotiation? It was a matter with which they had no concern. It belonged to another authority. That gentleman had also said, that he did not suppose the request would be painful to the PRESIDENT, but that it would give him pleasure. Was not the PRESIDENT himself the best judge of this? He had not given the papers to the House, and on former occasions, when he wished papers to be made known, he had done so.

A member from Pennsylvania had said, why refer the Treaty to a Committee of the Whole, if they did not mean to do something with it? It was sent there, Mr. S. observed, in order to make the proper appropriations for carrying it into effect. Now, this reference was made the ground of calling for the papers; and when the papers are produced, he supposed they would say, why have these papers, except we go into an examination of the merits of the Treaty? It was also said by the same gentleman, that these papers would enable them to understand the articles of the Treaty. He believed they were to understand the Treaty from the face of it, as judges expound the law, by examining the law itself. That gentleman further observed, that, as the Treaty contained commercial regulations, the information asked for, would enable them to decide with respect to legislating on the subject; but, said Mr. S., the Constitution will decide that better than instructions or correspondence.

Mr. S. said he believed he had examined all the reasons assigned for calling for this information. He thought before the House made such calls, it should have good grounds for them, especially, when the PRESIDENT had shown his opinion by not sending the papers with the Treaty. Mr. S. took a brief review of his arguments, paid a compliment to the member from Vermont, on account of his speech of yesterday, and concluded by saying, that that House had no more right to send to the PRESIDENT for the papers in question, than the printer of a newspaper had; he might communicate them to either voluntarily, but neither had a right to demand them. He apologized for having trespassed so long on the time of the House, and expressed his hope that the resolution would not pass.

After Mr. S. had sat down, it was moved by Mr. GILES, to take the resolution up in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of more ample discussion.

This motion was agreed to; sixty-one members rising in the affirmative.

The House immediately resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution.

Mr. NICHOLAS remarked, that the member from Connecticut, first up, when inquiring for the reason of a call for papers, had suggested two. The one, relating to the merits of the instrument; the other, an inquiry into the conduct of officers concerned. On the latter ground, gentlemen conceded that the House had a right to require the papers, and yet seemed willing to adhere to that, on which they conceive a call could not be, with propriety, grounded, as the one that influenced the conduct of the friends to the resolution. All gentlemen admitted that the House had the superintendence over the officers of Government, as the grand inquest of the nation; but persisted that the resolution calling for papers, if intended for the purpose of exercising that authority, must be predicated on an expression of the intention. How, he asked, could this intention be properly made up, without a previous sight of those very papers; would the House risk their own credit in the business, without seeing clearly the ground they went upon by having before them the information now called for? The right, he contended, of superintendence over the officers of Government, gave a right to demand a sight of those papers, that should throw light upon their conduct.

He took a view of the prominent features of the arguments of the members up before him. It had been said that, if the power of the PRESIDENT and Senate, as to Treaties, was complete, then the House had no right to claim a participation; this could not be denied; but the question was, whether the Executive had that right, unqualifiedly, in all cases. In the present case, he contended, the House had a voice. To elucidate: Suppose that, in the Constitution of the United States, which has been so guarded about the expenditure of money, a clause had been inserted, positively declaring that the House have a control over the money matters stipulated in a Treaty; would not this constitute a qualification of the powers of the

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

PRESIDENT and Senate with respect to Treaties? The Constitution, on this head, he contended, though less explicit than his supposed case would make it, was not the less positive, if tested by all the fair rules of construction; and if compared with the practice of the Government, from which we had borrowed, with many other matters, this part of our Constitution. In England, the country alluded to, their House of Parliament had exercised a control over the moneyed articles of Treaties; and he contended, the House of Representatives had an equal authority here, as chief guardians of the purse-strings. It was unnecessary, at this time, he said, to touch on the other parts of the Treaty which clashed with the Constitutional powers of the House.

The member had said that the Treaty being concluded, and being a law, the House were, as subject to the law, obliged to pass the necessary provisions to carry it into effect. He did not suppose for his own part, he said, that he was sent here to pay implicit obedience to any department of Government, and receive a decision on what was to come before the House at their hands; but to use his discretion to the best of his knowledge and abilities.

He again adverted to the power of control that the House of Commons have over Treaties; and contended, that that provision of the British Constitution had been accurately copied in our own with this deviation only, that the Senate have the power of making amendments to money bills here, which the House of Lords there have not. He could show from the best authority, the acknowledgment of the British Crown officers themselves, that the Parliament has a right to discuss and decide on Treaties which involved moneyed stipulations.

The same power, he argued, resided in the House here; for shall it be said, that we have borrowed only the form from Great Britain, and not touched the substance? Shall it be said, that the House have a discretion as to appropriations, and yet they must make them as directed by a Treaty? If the House have no discretion to use in the business, they are the most unfit body to regulate money-matters; for complete regularity in so large a body must be one of the least of their valuable properties. But, with the power of appropriating money, the House have certainly the right to judge of the propriety of the appropriation. The Constitution explains itself fully on this head. He instanced the specific power in the Constitution, with respect to appropriations for the Army, to explain from that instrument its meaning in other parts.

The Constitution says, that no appropriations for the support of armies shall be for more than two years; this is, no doubt, that the House may periodically have before them the question of the propriety of supporting an armed force, with all its consequences, and that they may, by refusing or granting an appropriation, determine on its existence. The power thus cautiously lodged must have been for some purpose, and that he had suggested could alone explain this clause of the Constitution. This will show what was expected of this House in appropriating money; that they should judge of the usefulness of the expenditure. In the case of the Army, the Constitution does not say that we may disband an Army by withholding money; but for the purpose of investing us with the same power, only requires that the appropriation should recur every two years; taking it for granted, that in this as well as in every other Legislative act, we will duly weigh every consequence.

Having thus explained from the Constitution itself the true meaning of this power of appropriation, he proceeded to elucidate it by a reference to the practice of the Government. He found an instance in the permanent appropriations made for the payment of the Public Debt. If the House in this and analogous cases, could exercise no discretion as to appropriations, why this permanent provision, in preference to an annual appropriation? The permanency of the provision took its rise from the idea, that the House possessed a discretionary power as to appropriations. Thus, he had shown, that the practice of the Government, the provisions of the Constitution, and the example of the British, from whom we had exactly copied the control over money transactions, all proved a discretion in the House as to appropriations. This must be considered as a sufficient answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, when he said, that the PRESIDENT and Senate possessed the Treaty-making power; for they possessed it with qualifications, in matters of money; and unless the House chose to grant that money, it was so far no Treaty.

The member from South Carolina said, that the idea of impeachment was renounced. He was mistaken; no member in the House could now with propriety declare that when the papers are produced there may not be found ground for impeachment.

Another ground stated as a motive with the friends of the resolution for the call for papers, was to throw light in a discussion of the merits of the Treaty. The right of the House to view the instrument in this light was contested, and doubts had been raised; but if the House had a discretion as to appropriations, must they not take a view of the merits of the Treaty? But even if these doubts were not removed, even if the House had not a right, or did not want the papers to discuss the merits of the Treaty, still another motive existed acknowledged sufficient, which would cover the requisition, viz: the power of impeachment. It was said, that the precise use these papers are meant to be put to, should be stated; he repeated that they must be seen before it could be known what proceeding might be most properly grounded on them. It was said, that the PRESIDENT may refuse the papers asked for if he thinks proper, and that if he has a right to refuse, the House cannot have the right to ask. The House ask for particular papers, assert their right to them, under a broad qualifying reservation, dictated by their own discretion, which prevents any embarrassment arising in pending negotiations from it.

H. of R.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[MARCH, 1796.]

It had been said that the PRESIDENT would have sent the papers if it had been proper they should be communicated. In one point of view the PRESIDENT must have supposed they could not have been wanted. Acting from pure intentions it could not occur to him, that the conduct of the negotiators of the Treaty deserved a criminal investigation. In the other view it was no argument, for the House should not deviate from the road of their duty, by the belief, opinion, or conception, of any man.

It was said, that by supposing papers necessary to elucidate the subject of the Treaty, it was virtually accusing those who had passed their judgment on that instrument with hastiness. If the House, who can claim a right to a sight of the papers, should decide without them, they, with justice, might be reflected on for precipitation; but the people could only act on the information given them, and on the general impressions the instrument made. Besides, their judgment on it was not final, it was not to annul, it was only an expression of their sentiments; a Treaty also may be so bad, as to impress a strong belief, that no circumstances leading to it can exist to prove it tolerable.

The PRESIDENT's power over the laws had been mentioned by the member from South Carolina, as analogous to that which the House had a right to exercise on the present occasion. But that gentleman had insisted, that he had only their constitutionality to consult. Mr. N. differed in opinion; he conceived his right extended to the examination of their policy in all its relations, before he gave them his sanction. He may hitherto, from his confidence in the Houses, never have questioned the policy of their laws, but his not having used the power did not deprive him of exercising it in future.

It had been said that the Minister who negotiated a Treaty was a private agent of the Executive, and not answerable to the House. This was a strange doctrine indeed: Surely a Minister is a Constitutional officer, and as such impeachable. It has been said, that even if a Minister had deviated from his instructions, if his principal approved and sanctioned the deviation, the agent was no longer responsible. The doctrine he considered as very dangerous. A Minister might violate his instructions in a point not justified by existing circumstances; the change produced by the negotiation might justify the principal in accepting the Treaty; but though the latter might be justifiable, the first could not. The conduct of the agent might improperly bring the principal, without good cause, into such a dilemma as to oblige him in a manner to accept the Treaty he had made; but its ratification could not be a cloak to the conduct of the Minister.

It was said, that if the Treaty was not the law of the land, the PRESIDENT should be impeached for declaring it as such. Parts of the Treaty the PRESIDENT and Senate had, no doubt, a right to make without any control of the House—those parts he might be considered as proclaiming; he proclaims it, limited as his authority, and under the qualifications provided by the Constitution. It was said, that no instance of such a call as that now contemplated could be produced. No; nor of such a Treaty, he answered.

He concluded by a short recapitulation.

Mr. HEATH spoke as follows: I always feel a peculiar diffidence whenever I deliver my sentiments on any important occasion in this House, for fear they may not be sufficiently matured by deliberation. But it appears to me the resolution under consideration, is essentially important for two considerations: first, that the request or call for those papers contained in the resolution, is a Constitutional right of this House to exercise now, and at all times, founded upon a principle of publicity essentially necessary in this, our Republic, which has never been opposed, that I have either heard or read of, since the first organization or operation of this Government; and, secondly, because, at this particular conjuncture of our affairs, more especially since the Treaty lately negotiated with Great Britain has created so much uneasiness and solicitude in the public mind, we therefore ought to pursue every method in our power to allay their sensibility. It is more than probable, when those papers are exhibited to public view, it may have so agreeable an effect as to reconcile fully the feelings of the people to the propriety of the negotiation as well as the instrument itself. I am sorry, Mr. SPEAKER, while we are only on the threshold of the Treaty in point of discussion, that some gentlemen (alluding to one or more of their colleagues) should express so much prejudice against the Treaty itself, before a full and mature investigation of the subject. Mr. H. called the attention of the House to the PRESIDENT's Speech at the opening of the session. The PRESIDENT, he observed, in that Speech, on the subject of the British Treaty, says, that when the resolution of the King of Great Britain should be known, he would lay the subject before Congress. When he spoke of the Indian, he only intimates that he will lay the articles of the Treaty before them. He deduced from this striking difference in the language of the PRESIDENT, when speaking of the different Treaties, this conclusion, that the PRESIDENT wished, himself, to lay the whole business before them for the satisfaction of the House, and of the people, which could not be done without a surrender of those papers of correspondences and documents had and used in the late negotiation. Mr. H. cited the article of the Constitution, showing all money-bills and appropriations to belong to this House; and that the money of the people should not be voted out of their pockets without giving them the utmost satisfaction, for passing the laws to this effect. So that, upon the whole, I have no doubt in my mind of the right, policy, and propriety, of this House in calling for the papers; and therefore, I trust, the resolution will obtain.

Mr. SWANWICK expressed his sense of the importance of the subject before the House, and the pleasure which he experienced at observing the calmness and temper with which the discussion had been carried on. He did not conceive, however, that the decision of the present question involved the sense of the House as to the merits of the Treaty; the object of the resolution was only to obtain that knowledge necessary for an enlightened decision; it had been observed, that the Treaty had been censured by assemblages of people with precipitancy, and without proper information. They did this on the best information that could by them be obtained. But if the House should go into a Committee of the Whole, to take into consideration the Treaty, without obtaining all the information in their power, they would be justly to blame.

In the course of the debate, it was generally urged against calling for the information, that the House had nothing to do with the subject; that the Treaty being the law of the land, the House had nothing to do but to acquiesce. Even if that were the case, he saw no impropriety in calling for the information, which the PRESIDENT could withhold if not proper to be given. The House were daily in the habit of calling for information in this way. On the subject of the Naval Equipment the other day, information was called for. The present is an important subject, involving all the great commercial interests of the country, grants of money, regulations concerning our Territory. If information is called for on matters of lesser moment, should it be denied on objects of the utmost importance? Some gentlemen had contended that Treaties were laws, with which the House had nothing to do. He believed, that all the members of the House felt an equal zeal for the public welfare, and to act under the Constitution, according to its true import; but it was unfortunate, that a Constitution, however carefully framed, would contain parts liable to different constructions; even the Bible was not free from this: different deductions were made from the same texts by different theologians.

He adverted to the Constitution; according to that instrument, the Legislative power is completely vested in Congress. By the 8th section of the 1st article, not only a certain specification of powers are granted to Congress, to lay and collect taxes, regulate commerce, &c., but the very extensive further power, not only to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, but, also, all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. If, then, Congress have the power to pass laws to carry into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof, how is it possible that there can be any authority out of the purview of this general and extensive Legislative control? Is the Treaty-making power not a power vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in a department or officer thereof? If it is, is the conclusion not obvious, that Congress have power to pass laws for carrying these powers into effect? But in the power to pass laws, discretion is necessarily implied; of course, this House must judge when it is to act; whether it will, or will not, carry into effect the object in question. It is a power, it is true, of great delicacy and responsibility, but it is not less a power constitutionally given.

The member from South Carolina construed this part of the Constitution in a different way, and insisted that, as the PRESIDENT and Senate had the power of making Treaties, the House were divested of the right of exercising their judgment upon the subject. If this doctrine prevails, to what a situation would the Representatives of a free people be reduced? The Constitution especially gives them the power of originating money bills; but to what purpose would this power be granted, if another authority may make a contract, compelling the House to raise money? Suppose that authority were in this way to grant millions upon millions, must the House, at all events, be compelled to provide for their payment? In this case the House become mere automatons, mere Mandarin members, like those who nod on a chimney-piece, as directed by a power foreign to themselves.

Great stress is laid upon the Constitution declaring Treaties laws of the land. This article has often been quoted partially, but not at large. It is in these words: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." Had the clause stopped here, there might have been some plea for the gentlemen's doctrine; but, unfortunately for them, the article goes on to say: "And the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State, to the contrary notwithstanding." Hence, it is obvious, that the supremacy of the law is over the Constitution and laws of the separate States, which was necessary to prevent these interfering with those. But it does not affect the powers of this House, as a component part of the General Legislature, and authority of the United States. It is also worth while to notice the gradation in the article.

First. This Constitution.

Secondly. The laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof, clothed with the highest sanction of the nation, the consent of the three branches.

Thirdly. Treaties. How absurd the doctrine, then, that these last, third in order, can repeal the second: at that rate, all power whatever would remain vested in two branches only of the Government: the third, with all its powers of originating bills for raising revenue, would be dwindled into a mere board of assessors.

The gentleman from Vermont said, yesterday that if the PRESIDENT and Senate were to make a Treaty, and that House were to refuse to make due appropriations for carrying it into effect, it would become a nullity, and no foreign nation would in future treat with such an uncertain Government. Mr. S. observed, that that gentleman would probably be surprised, when he was told, that the British House of Commons possesses the same power which he reprobates in the Legislative Assembly of the United States. This, Mr. S. proved, by reading the King's speech to both Houses of Parliament, in which he informs them of this Treaty, and promises to lay it before them when ratified, in order that they might judge of the propriety of making provision to carry it into effect. What, judge of the propriety of passing laws to carry into effect a Treaty ratified! And shall it be said, exclaimed he, that the Representative Assembly of the United States does not possess a privilege enjoyed by an English House of Commons! He hoped not. As this power of deliberation, with respect to appropriations, might be considered a new doctrine, Mr. S. proposed to read two extracts from a work entitled "The Federalist," from pages 101 and 103.

Treaty with Great Britain.

[MARCH, 1796.]

Mr. WILLIAMS objected to the extracts being read, but the House overruled the objection.

The extracts are these:

"A branch of knowledge which belongs to the acquisitions of a Federal Representative, and which has not been mentioned, is that of foreign affairs. In regulating our own commerce, he ought to be not only acquainted with the Treaties between the United States and other nations, but also with the commercial policy and laws of other nations. He ought not to be altogether ignorant of the law of nations, for that, as far as it is a proper object of Municipal Legislation, is submitted to the Federal Government. And, although the House of Representatives is not immediately to participate in foreign negotiations and arrangements, yet from the necessary connexion between the several branches of public affairs, those particular branches will frequently deserve attention in the ordinary course of legislation, and will sometimes demand particular Legislative sanction and co-operation."—Page 103.

Here the doctrine of Legislative sanction and co-operation is plainly admitted.

"It is agreed on all hands, that the powers properly belonging to one of the departments, ought not to be directly and completely administered by either of the other departments. It is equally evident, that neither of them ought to possess, directly or indirectly, an overruling influence over the others in the administration of their respective powers."—Page 101.

If neither of the powers ought to possess, directly or indirectly, an overruling influence over the others, whence is the power to be deduced of the PRESIDENT and Senate, by Treaty, to make laws possessing this very overruling influence over this House?

In the course of this debate, Mr. S. remarked, he had heard some observations which he was sorry to hear, and which he thought irrelevant. It was said that encroachments on the Constitution were more likely to be made by that House, than by any other branch of the Government. Whence, said he, arises this charge? How long since this House hath become such a bug-bear—such a scare-crow? What motives can it be supposed, this House possesses, thus to encroach: of all the branches of the Government, the most transient and short-lived, elected but for two years, then returning to the mass of citizens, what interest have they in encroachments? Besides ought we to be the first to find this fault with ourselves? Are the other branches unable to defend themselves, that we must suggest this to them? All this is truly surprising. But, said he, is there no danger from encroachments in other quarters? When gentlemen talk of that House being bound to make appropriations without inquiry, it was time for them, at least, to beware of encroachments. What the House now wanted was information; they wanted to know for what purpose they were about to grant money, before they granted. He trusted that House would always be cautious how they parted with the money of the public. In no instance, he said, had they been charged with being too scrupulous in that respect.

One gentleman from Vermont called upon the House to beware of encroachments, lest they overturned their Republican Government; he said we were now to show how far we possessed the power of self-government; why, what other Government would the gentleman have? Are the thrones of despots more secure than Republics? Alas! all Governments have been tried, and have succeeded each other; but still the imperfection of man himself must be shared by his Government, be it what it may. But was not this Government, he said, as likely to be administered wisely, as any other existing Government? There may, and will be differences of opinion on this and almost every other subject; but he trusted there was sufficient information and uprightness of heart in the country, to prevent any danger to their Government. He wished every subject which came before the House, to be freely and fully discussed; and whilst the same good temper was observed which had been so conspicuous in the present debate, he trusted that no evil, but the greatest good, would arise from such discussion.

MARCH 9.—In Committee of the Whole, on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolution, Mr. MUNTLENBERG in the Chair—

Mr. N. SMITH said, he agreed with gentlemen who asserted, that there was no Constitutional question included in the resolution on the table. He believed it perfectly accorded with the Constitution to ask the PRESIDENT for papers, when they could be of any use to them, and that the PRESIDENT had the same privilege to ask for information from the House. Indeed, he believed, whenever any one of the departments of Government wanted information from any other department, to enable them to perform their Constitutional functions, it was highly proper to call for it. But he did not believe they ought to pass the resolution, unless some specific object was pointed out, to which the papers could be applied, and for which they might be of use to them. That they could do no harm, in his opinion, was a very poor reason for the interposition of the House. He wished never to pass a resolution on idle and ridiculous grounds, but because it was founded in solid reason and propriety. Such reasons, in his opinion, had not been offered in favor of calling for the papers. When he admitted, that in calling for papers, distinctly considered, there was no unconstitutionality, he did not mean to be understood

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

to say that there was not a Constitutional question involved in the discussion. He thought there was one, of the highest magnitude; no less than whether the House of Representatives have a right to judge over the heads of the PRESIDENT and Senate on the subject of Treaties. But this was not a necessary consequence of the resolution, and if gentlemen would show any other sufficient cause for calling for the papers, he would agree it ought to pass; and although he could see no other sufficient cause for passing the resolution, yet if gentlemen would declare, they did not want them to judge of the Treaty, they would at least save him the trouble of opposing it. But while the advocates of the resolution assign it as a reason for the call, that we want them to enable us to make up our minds on the merits of the Treaty, can they blame gentlemen for attempting to prove that the House of Representatives have no right to judge on a Treaty? The advocates of the resolution had, since the introduction of it, several times changed their grounds; assigning, at different times, very different reasons in favor of calling for the papers in question. What were their reasons for thus changing and shifting was to him a matter of no consequence, since all the reasons which had been offered in its favor, were, in his opinion, capable of conclusive answers. He should endeavor, he said, in answering what had fallen from different members in favor of the measure, not to travel over the ground which had been taken by gentlemen who had gone before him, on the same side of the question. It had been said, that information would tend to allay the sensibility of the public mind, and that nothing was more desirable than publicity in all Governmental proceedings. But, he presumed, it would be admitted that there was a great difference in that respect between the business of an Executive and the Legislative. He believed it must also be admitted, that each department of Government ought to be the sole judge when to make any part of its proceedings public. Besides, if the object is to publish them, in that case there ought to be an act passed regularly, directing them to be published. What, said he, is the language of this resolution? If it went to the PRESIDENT, would he not suppose the papers asked for were wanted to assist the House in legislation? He would never conjecture they were wanted to be published, and it would be wrong to publish them. It was said, by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the papers were wanted to explain doubtful parts of the Treaty. He had wondered the gentleman could say this, when on a former occasion, on discussing the subject of the Federal City, the same gentleman had declared, that a law must be construed from the face of it, and that nothing extraneous to it could be admitted. The sentiments of the gentleman, delivered on that occasion, exactly accorded with his. Indeed, he said, it would be absurd to oblige people to obey an instrument according to the face of it, and yet suffer that instrument to be essentially altered and changed from extraneous circumstances; and to say it is not to be obeyed, according to the manifest construction from the face of the law itself, is saying that it amounts to nothing at all.

It has been said, that these papers are wanted for the purpose of impeaching the negotiator, or PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. This, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had acknowledged could not be considered as an object of the call, unless it had been mentioned in the resolution itself. He was quite willing, however, that any gentleman who wished for an impeachment should vote for the resolution. He believed the number would be very small. But he hoped gentlemen would not pretend they wanted them for an impeachment, when in fact they had no such idea. He hoped they would not make that the ground of their vote, when in fact they wanted them for a different purpose. He extremely regretted, that the friends to the resolution had not pointed out the specific object to which they meant to apply the information, when it was obtained. Had this been done in the resolution, it would have prevented much confusion and embarrassment. He believed, however, that the great object was to obtain the information, for the purpose of enabling the House to judge on the merits of the Treaty. He should, therefore, take the liberty to answer gentlemen on that ground. It has been said, the PRESIDENT and Senate have not the power to make commercial Treaties. If this is the case the Treaty is absolutely void. Then why want papers? Whether the PRESIDENT and Senate have the power to make commercial Treaties or not, it must be extremely clear, by recurring to the Constitution, that the House of Representatives have no right to make Treaties of any kind. But it is said the Treaty contains commercial regulations, and therefore is subject of their inquiry. He said they had a right to legislate with respect to commerce, but not to make Treaties on that head. If they had, he asked, from whence do they derive the power? Let the Constitution be searched from beginning to end, and not a syllable will be found which bears an appearance of design to give the House of Representatives a participation in the power of forming contracts with foreign nations. Besides, if they had a right to judge of it, they ought to have had a hand in making it. It has been said, that in England the House of Commons claim a right to judge of the merits of Treaties, and withhold their aid whenever they think proper; this is not peculiar to the House of Commons, it is in Parliament at large. But why introduce this by way of precedent to guide us in construing our own Constitution? They have no such written Constitution as we have; their Constitution is entirely made up of usages and laws. Whenever you prove, therefore, that they have an usage like the one that is mentioned, of judging on Treaties, you have then proved that such is their Constitution, and if our Constitution expressed in terms what theirs expresses by their usages, there could be no doubt but that the House should have the right. In construing a written Constitution, to introduce the practice in a country who have no written Constitution, can have no effect but to mislead. If gentlemen could show us a written

[MARCH, 1796]

Constitution in England wherein the Treaty-making power is exclusively vested in the King, with the advice of the House of Lords, and under such Constitution the House of Commons claiming a right to interfere in the subject, their precedent would then apply; unless, indeed, it were too absurd to be considered as a precedent. He said the two Governments were perfectly dissimilar; why, then, introduce the practice of that Government as a guide for this? He was well suited with the Constitution of America, and wished not to assimilate it to any foreign Constitution, and he hoped it would not be warped and twisted to become like them. Were they about to form a Constitution, it might be desirable to take whatever was found good in any other; but when the Constitution was already formed and marked out by direct boundaries, in a manner too plain to be mistaken, could it be of any use to inquire what was the Constitution of other countries? He said the Convention who formed our Constitution had avoided that part of the British Constitution, as absurd. In England, the King has the sole power of making Treaties; but, after the Treaty is made, Parliament claim a right, in certain cases, to judge of their merits. In this country, the Convention, in framing their Constitution, had seen fit to add the Senate to the PRESIDENT, in the business of making Treaties; and, still further to guard the matter, required that two-thirds of the Senate should concur; and then, as if to completely shut the door against all further investigation of their merits, or any cavilling on the subject, declared that a Treaty thus made should become the law of the land. The Convention must be supposed to be thoroughly acquainted with the usages in England at the time of framing our Constitution, and appear to have studiously avoided that part of their Constitution. He said the time this usage found its way into the English Government could not be important, nor could the cause of it; this much, however, appeared very clear, that Parliament had no limits to their power; they could even change the Constitution of the Kingdom; a power which no man will pretend is in the Legislature of this country. But it is said, Congress have power to make the necessary appropriations or withhold them, and that for the purpose of guiding their discretion in this business, they must have a right to judge of the Treaty. The whole fallacy of this argument, he said, consisted in supposing they had a right to judge of the merits of a Treaty. Let gentlemen look at the Constitution, they will find no such power given; and if that instrument does not give it, how do we come by the power? The Constitution, he said, had assigned the business of making Treaties to the PRESIDENT, with the advice of the Senate; whenever, therefore, a Treaty came incidentally before them, they were bound to consider it as well done, having been done by a department constitutionally authorized for the purpose. As a citizen, he had an opinion on the Treaty; and, in determining whether the PRESIDENT and Senate had deserved well of their country, he was ready on all occasions to call it into exercise; but as a member of the Legislature he had no opinion; he would form none: because the Constitution, which his constituents had given him as a guide to his conduct had given him no right to form an opinion on the merits of a Treaty. It was obvious, therefore, the papers could be of no service to him. But, say gentlemen, are we to sit down here and vote for a law which we believe a bad one? And one gentleman had inquired what he should inform his constituents, when they made inquiries of him on the subject? He would answer both the inquiries: He thought the gentleman might justly inform his constituents, that they, by their Constitution, had given the PRESIDENT, with the advice of the Senate, the power of making Treaties; and, having had no hand in making it, he was entitled to no share of credit or blame on account of its merits. As to the former inquiry, he would first see how far the gentleman's doctrine would lead them, and would then give his own ideas on the subject. The principle, if pursued, would carry its advocates too far; for, on the same principles, they had a right to judge whether a PRESIDENT was a proper person to fill that office, every time the question arose whether they should appropriate for his salary. Again, suppose the House were about to appropriate for the salary of a Judge, it might with equal propriety be asked, are we to pass a law which we believe a bad one?—and thence inquire into the merits of the Judge, and see whether the PRESIDENT and Senate had appointed a proper person or not. But pursue this doctrine and it will be found to affect some of the dearest rights of the people themselves; for suppose the House should conclude the electors had elected a very improper person as a Representative; on inquiry, into the merits of the member, they might, on finding this in their opinion to be the fact, withhold an appropriation for his salary. But the true answer, he conceived, to all these cases was, that these were subjects on which the Constitution had given them no right to judge; they were, therefore, to consider all as well done, being done by the proper persons for the purpose. The PRESIDENT, the Judge, and the Member, so far as it respects us, in our appropriations, are to be considered as the most proper persons, however our private sentiments may be. Just so respecting a Treaty: the Constitution has made it the duty of the PRESIDENT and Senate to make Treaties, in as full a manner as it has to appoint Judges, and we are equally bound to consider all as well done, and have no more right to judge of its merits, than in that case to form an opinion of the merits of a Judge.

He observed, that as to the question, whether they had a right to withhold appropriations to carry into effect a law of the Legislature, he wished at that time not to controvert, as that would place him on ground much weaker than the true ground of discussion. But, he asked, is a Treaty a law, simply considered, and have the Legislature a right to repeal it, as they may their own laws? No; it is a contract, binding them to a foreign nation, and when once it is formed they have no longer any power over it. He would state the true ground of the business as it appeared to him. The discretion of that House was limited by the Constitution, by Treaties, and ultimately by the law of right and of justice, and when he had said this, he thought he had completely defined it; for although the House had a discretionary power, yet that by no means implied that they could exercise such discretion on subjects placed by the Constitution in other hands. He considered Treaties, as they respected that House, the same in point of principle as laws were respecting Judges of a Court. If it should be asked whether a Judge had not a perfect discretion on all the judgments he rendered, no man would hesitate to say he had, and yet no man in his senses would say that because he had such discretion he must therefore have a right to judge whether a law was a good one or not. But having no hand in making the law, he is bound to consider it a good one, being made by the proper Constitutional department of Government for that purpose. He said the House in all their appropriations ought to exercise a sound discretion in as ample a manner as any gentleman pleased, provided they did not leap the bounds of the Constitution, and undertake to judge on subjects which they had no right to judge upon by the Constitution. He said, he considered the PRESIDENT and Senate as agents for the people of the United States in forming contracts for them with foreign nations; and when contracts were thus formed, they were binding on the nation who were to be considered as the principal. That the Legislature were to be considered as another set of agents bound to carry the contract so made into effect; and when they found a contract already formed by the people in a manner pointed out by them in their Constitution, shall the Legislature be quibbling and cavilling about carrying it into effect? Shall they be calling for papers, and questioning whether the people have made a good bargain or a bad one, when the people have not seen fit to intrust the subject to their discretion? Such a piece of conduct, he conceived, would be usurping powers which they did not possess, and highly disgraceful to the nation. Lest he should tire the patience of the Committee too much, he would proceed no farther, except just to remark, that it had been said the PRESIDENT might be pleased with an opportunity to send the papers. But could not the PRESIDENT have sent them if he had wished, without the interposition of the House? If the call was made, the PRESIDENT must either send them or refuse, and to do either would be embarrassing to him. It would be placing him in a situation which it was to be hoped the Executive would not be placed in; for if he sent them it was explicitly saying, he had been negligent of his duty in not communicating them before; if he refused, it was setting up department against department, a situation of all others to be regretted. He hoped the resolution would not pass.

Treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. HARPER said, that it had not been his intention to trouble the Committee, in this stage of the debate at least; nor should he now depart from his resolution on that head, had he not observed that the discussion was turning more and more on points, which it appeared to him unnecessary to decide. He did not conceive that the powers of the House respecting Treaties were necessary to be considered; the question appeared capable of a satisfactory decision on different grounds.

When the motion was first proposed, he thought it innocent at least, and was in doubt whether it might not be proper, because he was in doubt how far these papers might be necessary for enabling the House to exercise that discretion on the subject of Treaties, which he admitted it to possess; but on a more accurate and extensive view of the subject, and after carefully attending to the discussion which had already taken place, he was thoroughly persuaded that these papers were no way necessary, and, that being unnecessary, to call for them was an improper and unconstitutional interference with the Executive department. Could it be made to appear that these papers are necessary for directing or informing the House on any of those Legislative questions respecting the Treaty which came within its powers, he should propose to change the milk-and-water style of the present resolution. The House, in that case, would have a right to the papers; and he had no idea of requesting as a favor what should be demanded as a right. He would demand them, and insist on the demand. But, being persuaded that no discretion hitherto contended for, even by the supporters of the resolution themselves, made these papers necessary to the House, to call for them would be an unconstitutional intermeddling with the proper business of the Executive.

This, it would be remembered, was no new doctrine to him. It would be remembered, that, in the last session, very soon after he took a seat in that House, he had opposed a motion, the object of which was to request the Executive not to suffer a Treaty with the Indians to be held for a particular purpose, and had opposed it, because making Treaties being the proper business of the Executive department, for that House to interfere on the subject, to request the Executive to treat or not to treat, was an interference with his duties, unwarranted by the Constitution, and tending to embarrass his operations, and lessen his responsibility. On the same ground he should oppose the present resolution.

It had been said, that this motion was of little consequence; that it was only a request which might be refused, and that the privileges of that House were narrow indeed, if it could not request information from the Executive department. But it would be observed, he said, that requests from bodies like that, carry the force of demands, and imply a right to receive. Legislative bodies often make the most formidable expressions of their will in the shape of requests. It would be further observed, that an honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALLATIN] after declaring that this indeed was only a request which might be refused, had added, that in case it were refused, it would then be proper to consider how far we ought to make the demand, and insist on receiving these papers as a matter of right. After this avowal of the system, after this notice that the present request is no more than a preliminary measure, a preparatory step, and in case of a refusal, is to be followed up by a demand, could it be wondered that they who think the measure improper, should oppose it in the threshold?

Much astonishment, he said, had been expressed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. GILES] that the amendment proposed the day before yesterday, had not been agreed to. His astonishment would have been lessened had that honorable member adverted to what fell from another honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS] who yesterday supported this motion with great ability and eloquence. He had avowed, and the avowal did honor to his candor and spirit, that the amendment in question did not alter the principle of the resolution. For that reason, he declared he had voted for the amendment, because the resolution, under any possible modification, would carry with it the same meaning. I am also of this opinion, said Mr. H., and for that reason I voted against the amendment; I voted against it, because I thought the principle of the resolution wrong, and that after the amendment the principle still remained. My high respect for the mover of the amendment, my confidence in his candor, forbid me to doubt that the amendment was intended to produce the effect pointed out by him, to take away from the resolution all those properties which he regarded as objectionable. But he will pardon me for saying that the resolution, as amended, appeared to me a masked battery, a sap instead of a storm, an ambuscade instead of an open attack, a pill, whose gilding renders it fairer to the eye, and more pleasant to the taste, but leaves all its poison lurking within. With this view of the subject, and because he liked those measures best which were the least disguised, which carry their tendency most plainly on the face of them, Mr. H. had voted against the amendment, that those who disliked the principle of the resolution might meet it in all its strength.

When this motion for calling on the PRESIDENT for the instructions and papers relative to the British Treaty was first brought forward, an honorable member from Connecticut, [Mr. TRACY] had risen in his place, and with great propriety requested the mover and supporters of the resolution to state the precise use intended to be made of these papers. Did they comply with this request? No, they could not. Mr. H.'s reliance on their candor forbid him to suppose that they could, but would not. The fact was, that they did not; and he therefore supposed that it was not in their power. They had talked much of the necessity of understanding fully the course of the negotiation; of the benefits of information on all Legislative subjects; of the propriety of publicity in all the acts of Government.

A gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BALDWIN] had observed, that publicity was always desirable in Governmental proceedings; more especially in the proceedings of Republican Governments. He had informed the House, that his mind had for a long time inclined more and more to this opinion, and he had at length become completely convinced that nothing was more important, nothing more desirable, than publicity in all our public transactions. Mr. H. thought it much to be regretted that the honorable member from Georgia had not arrived at this state of complete conviction previously to the last motion in that House for clearing the galleries. He would then, no doubt, have opposed the motion. He would have argued with his usual ingenuity on the advantages of publicity, and would probably have succeeded in convincing the House that its galleries ought always to be kept open, that none of its proceedings ought to be hidden from the public eye. But still it would have remained for him to prove, that because we chose to adopt publicity in our proceedings, we have a right to direct the Executive on the subject, and require him to publish his proceedings also. Information about the Executive proceedings would no doubt be agreeable to the people, from whom the PRESIDENT derives his authority, and not from the House. To the people he is accountable; and if he should think fit to withhold from them information, by receiving which they would be gratified, he was the proper judge of the propriety of doing so, and must answer for his conduct. The House had no right to direct him. If the House had such a right over the Executive, he being also a representative of the people, equally bound to consult their interests, their rights, and their wishes, must have the same right over the House, and might in his turn direct them how far they ought to make their proceedings public for general information. A motion had for some time been laid on the table, by an honorable member from Virginia, tending to exclude printers from the House. There could be no doubt about the power of adopting such a measure, though its expediency would probably have been found liable to very strong objections. Suppose it had been adopted, and that the PRESIDENT had sent a Message informing the House, that publicity in the proceedings of Government was a very desirable and necessary thing, that he wished to know the grounds and reasons of measures that might be adopted, and that the resolution ought to be rescinded. How would such a Message be received? Yet it would be perfectly justifiable on all the reasons of general publicity which had been urged in favor of the present resolution. If the House had a right to direct the Executive on this subject, it must, by the same principles, have a right also to direct the Senate. The deliberations which led to the ratification of a Treaty in the Senate are as important to be publicly known, as the negotiation which led to its being signed by the Minister. We ought, therefore, if we act consistently, to request the Senate to let their gallery remain open for general information, while they discuss Executive subjects. The Senate must have the same right to make this request of the House. Suppose the Senate should send us a resolution, requesting us not to shut our galleries, or not to exclude printers from the Hall? How would it be received? Certainly with great indignation; and yet on the principles contended for, it would be perfectly right.

These being the objections to the principle of calling for papers for general information, Mr. H. presumed, that it was not on this ground these papers were to be requested, but for some precise specific purpose, to enable the House to exercise some Legislative function. What were these functions? First—To institute an inquiry into the conduct of those who had been concerned in making the Treaty. Second—To take up the Treaty itself, and judge how far, and in what manner, it should be carried into effect. These were the only possible functions which the House could exercise on the subject of a Treaty; and they were functions entirely distinct. It had been rightly observed by a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] that if an inquiry into the conduct of those who made the Treaty were the object, it ought to have been stated in the preamble of the resolution. But this is so far from being done, that its advocates declare the PRESIDENT to be far removed above suspicion, and intimate no intention of calling any other person to account. But it was asked, how could members know what use would be made of evidence till it was produced? He asked, in his turn, whether this evidence had been kept secret. Far otherwise. The mover of this resolution, as Chairman of the Committee on American Seamen, together with the whole committee, had been allowed access to these papers, and had inspected them. The same privilege, he doubted not, would be given to any member of that House who would request it. As the papers, then, had been seen, as their contents were known, gentlemen might state the precise use intended to be made of them, and ought to do so. Should a motion be made for the production of these papers, for the purpose of instituting an inquiry into the conduct of the negotiator, or any of those concerned in making the Treaty, he would second and support the motion. If this object was intended, it might and ought to be stated, and till that was done, the motion ought not to be agreed to on that ground.

It had been alleged that publicity in this business was avoided—that the light was shunned. Far otherwise. He wished the papers in question were laid on the table; it would be gratifying to him, and he believed much to the credit of all concerned; but he could not consent to call for them, because that implied a right to possess them, which he could never admit.

The second use, he observed, that might be made of these papers, was to give the House information on some of those Legislative questions which it might be called to decide respecting the Treaty. Much difference of opinion had arisen about the Legislative powers and discretion of the House on the subject of Treaties. Some gentlemen extended this discretion very far; others confined it within very narrow limits. This question had been very ably discussed; but if it had not, he should not now enter into it, because he thought it unnecessary to the present decision. The question was, Are these papers necessary for enabling the House to exercise such discretion as it possesses on the subject? He believed, that taking this discretion in the utmost latitude that had been contended for, the papers were not necessary for its full exercise. What was the discretion contended for? It was threefold. 1. To judge about the constitutionality of the Treaty; 2. To discuss the meaning of doubtful passages; and, 3. To consider of the propriety of making appropriations, or passing laws for carrying it into effect. As to its constitutionality, it must be decided by the instrument itself; it must be compared with the Constitution, and judged by the result. If Constitutional, on the face of it, none of the previous negotiations by which it was brought about, none of the instructions under which it was framed, could make it otherwise. So, on the other hand, if unconstitutional in itself, the defect cannot be cured by the instructions or previous correspondence. So, as to doubtful passages, it was a constant and invariable maxim that every deed, every law, every written instrument of any sort, was to be judged of and explained by itself, and not by recurrence to other matter. This was the universal practice of the Courts of Law, who, when called on to expound an act of the Legislature, never resorted to the debates which preceded it—to the opinions of members about its signification—but inspected the act itself, and decided by its own evidence. Should this rule be departed from, the basis of law and of right would be removed; all the advantages of written records would be lost, and we should wander into the wide fields of uncertainty and opinion.

It had been remarked, by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, that, in the dispute between our Government and Britain, about the meaning of the sixth article of the Treaty of Peace, the correspondence, and even the journals of the negotiators, had been resorted to. This was highly proper, Mr. H. said, when the parties themselves to a contract enter into a discussion about its meaning, because they may explain it as they can mutually agree. But the Treaty presented itself to that House as a law, and it must of course be expounded according to the rule for expounding laws. Besides, one party to a contract had no power to alter it, and consequently must take it up and act upon it, not as it might have been intended to be, but as it is on the face of it. Two Ministers, moreover, engaged in a diplomatic contest, like lawyers defending a cause, would resort to every topic by which they hoped to strengthen their argument; but the House acted judicially, and, instead of following them in these excursions, must confine its view to the instrument itself, and explain its provisions by its strict letter. If they departed from the instrument itself, they might go not only into correspondences, but into the deliberations of the Senate, and the consultations of the PRESIDENT; nor would there be any further limit by which they could be stopped.

As to appropriations, Mr. H. had no doubt that the House might withhold them in the same manner that they might withhold appropriations for any other law, or that the PRESIDENT might refuse to appoint officers under a law which he should deem totally subversive of the public good. Every branch of the Government, in extreme cases, has a right to oppose itself to the other branches, and arrest the progress of destructive measures. The Judicial power might make a stand, and refuse to execute a law. This discretion, he trusted, would never be used. It must, indeed, be a desperate case which would justify its use. This discretion of the House to refuse appropriations being admitted, how were the papers in question necessary to its exercise? A Treaty is made, and we are called upon to carry it into effect. What, then, is the question which this discretion enables us to ask? Not whether the Treaty be good or bad; not whether it was proper to make a Treaty at all, or whether a better one might have been made: all these considerations belong to the Treaty-making power, which is vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate. But the question was, whether the Treaty be so bad that the public welfare requires it to be broken; whether it is a less evil to abandon our national faith—to destroy the respectability of our Government in the eyes of foreign nations—to hazard disunion and contest between the different departments of the Government—or to execute the Treaty as it stands. This was the question, and the only one; and how were these papers necessary in deciding this question? If the Treaty were so bad that it ought to be broken, that would sufficiently appear on the face of it. Its provisions would speak for themselves, and nothing in the correspondence or instructions could be necessary to show their deformity. They might show that the Treaty was unskillfully negotiated; that it was unwisely agreed to; that better terms might then, or might now, be obtained—but all this, if fully established, would not authorize us to break it: otherwise it would follow, that either party to a contract might violate it whenever he should happen to think it disadvantageous.

Mr. HARPER illustrated his position by the following simile: If a man attempt my life, I have a right to kill him for my own preservation. I could not inquire whether he were a good or a bad man; whether his disposition towards me was hostile or friendly; but solely whether self preservation required his death. If my life were not in immediate danger from his attempts, however criminal his intentions or his conduct might have been, it would be murder to kill him.

The House, he said, passed an annual appropriation for the Military Establishment. Could they refuse this appropriation merely because they disliked the establishment, and wished it to be reduced? Surely no one would say so. But if they should be convinced that the Military Establishment was about to become highly mischievous and dangerous, they could destroy it by withholding the appropriation. This would be an extreme case. And in like manner an appropriation for carrying a Treaty into effect might in extreme cases be refused. The question in all such cases would be, which is the greatest evil, to break the Treaty, at the risk of public faith, of national honor, or to carry it into effect? And this question, he would once more repeat, must be decided by the provisions themselves as they appear on the face of the instrument. The papers could be in no wise necessary to the decision. To call for them, implied a right to rejudge the wisdom, the expediency of the Treaty, after those points had been decided by the proper authorities—a right destructive of the principles of the Constitution. The harmony of the Government, he said, depended on keeping the business of each department separate from the other. If one branch encroached on the rest, destruction to the whole must be the consequence. The Constitution had defined the powers, had limited the sphere, of each department. The Constitution is the will of the people, in whom the sovereign power resides, and we are bound to obey it. We are as much bound to preserve it from our own encroachments as from those of the other branches. It was his love of the Constitution, his love of the people, his respect for their rights, and his belief in their sovereignty, which induced him to propose this motion. If the Constitution was infringed, whether by the House or the other departments, the rights, the sovereignty of the people were equally trampled on, and it would be no consolation to them that it was done by one hundred and five men, rather than by thirty, or rather than by one.

Mr. GALLATIN conceived that, whether the House had a discretionary power with respect to Treaties, or whether they were absolutely bound by those instruments, and were obliged to pass laws to carry them fully into effect, still there was no impropriety in calling for the papers. Under the first view of the subject, if the House has a discretionary power, then no doubt could exist that the information called for is proper; and, under the second, if bound to pass laws, they must have a complete knowledge of the subject, to learn what laws ought to be passed. This latter view of the subject, even, must introduce a discussion of the Treaty, to know whether any law ought to be repealed, or to see what laws ought to be passed. If any article in the instrument should be found of doubtful import, the House would most naturally search for an explanation, in the documents which related to the steps which led to the Treaty. If one article of the Treaty only be doubtful, the House would not know how to legislate without the doubt being removed, and its explanation could certainly be found nowhere with so much propriety as in the correspondence between the negotiating parties. He incidentally answered a reference made in a former part of the debate, to something that had dropped from him on the Federal City Loan Bill. He on that occasion insisted that the law for the permanent establishment of the Seat of Government should not be looked on as a bargain; that whatever might have been the views of the members who framed it, that could not derogate from the nature of the law; and because the law was no bargain, he was of the opinion he then expressed; whereas a Treaty is a bargain. But even, he insisted, if the House was not to legislate upon the Treaty, they still have a right to express an opinion on any important subject, and this they could not do understandingly without information, and in this case without an examination of the instructions and correspondence that led to the Treaty, and of the other documents that related to the subject.

Gentlemen had gone into an examination of an important Constitutional question upon this motion. He hoped this would have been avoided in the present stage of the business; but as they had come forward on that ground he had no objection to follow them in it, and to rest the decision of the Constitutional powers of Congress on the fate of the present question. He would, therefore, state his opinion, that the House had a right to ask for the papers proposed to be called for, because their co-operation and sanction was necessary to carry the Treaty into full effect, to render it a binding instrument, and to make it, properly speaking, a law of the land; because they have a full discretion either to give or to refuse that co-operation; because they must be guided, in the exercise of that discretion, by the merits and expediency of the Treaty itself, and therefore had a right to ask for every information which could assist them in deciding that question.

One argument repeatedly used by every gentleman opposed to the present motion was, "That the Treaty was unconstitutional or not; if not the House had no agency in the business, but must carry it into full effect; and if unconstitutional, the question could only be decided from the face of the instrument, and no papers could throw light upon the question." He wished gentlemen had defined what they understood by a Constitutional Treaty; for, if the scope of their arguments was referred to, it would not be found possible to make an unconstitutional Treaty. He would say what he conceived constituted the unconstitutionality of a Treaty. A Treaty is unconstitutional if it provides for doing such things, the doing of which is forbidden by the Constitution; but if a Treaty embraces objects within the sphere of the general powers delegated to the Federal Government, but which have been exclusively and specially granted to a particular branch of Government, say to the Legislative department, such a Treaty, though not unconstitutional, does not become the law of the land until it has obtained the sanction of that branch. In this case, and to this end, the Legislature have a right to demand the documents relative to the negotiation of the Treaty, because that Treaty operates on objects specially delegated to the Legislature. He turned to the Constitution. It says, that the PRESIDENT shall have the power to make Treaties, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate. It does not say what Treaties. If the clause be taken by itself, then it grants an authority altogether undefined. But the gentlemen quote another clause of the Constitution, where it is said that the Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all Treaties, are the supreme law of the land; and thence, they insist that Treaties made by the PRESIDENT and Senate are the supreme law of the land, and that the Power of making Treaties is undefined and unlimited. He proceeded to controvert this opinion, and contended that it was limited by other parts of the Constitution.

That general power of making Treaties, undefined as it is by the clause which grants it, may either be expressly limited by some other positive clauses of the Constitution, or it may be checked by some powers vested in other branches of the Government, which, although not diminishing, may control the Treaty-making power. Mr. G. was of opinion that both positions would be supported by the Constitution; that the specific Legislative powers delegated to Congress were limitations of the undefined power of making Treaties vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate, and that the general power of granting money, also vested in Congress, would at all events be used, if necessary, as a check upon, and as controlling the exercise of the powers claimed by the PRESIDENT and Senate.

The Treaty-making power is limited by the Constitution, when in the first section it is said that all Legislative power is granted to Congress. To construe the Constitution consistently, we must attend to all the sections of it. If it is attempted to be construed by referring to particular portions, and not attending to the whole, absurdities must arise. So in the present case, by the mode of construction advanced by the gentlemen opposed to the motion. By one section it is declared that a Treaty is the supreme law of the land, that it operates as a law; yet it is to be made by the PRESIDENT and Senate only. Here will be an apparent contradiction; for the Constitution declares that the Legislative power shall be vested in the three branches. By this construction there would appear to be two distinct Legislatures. How shall this apparent contradiction be reconciled? Some gentlemen, to solve the difficulty, had declared the Treaty-making power to be an Executive power; but a power of making laws cannot be termed Executive without involving an absurdity; the power of making Treaties, although called an Executive power, is transformed into a Legislative one by those gentlemen.

The power of making Treaties is contended to be undefined, then it might extend to all subjects which may properly become the subjects of national compacts. But, he contended, if any other specific powers were given to a different branch of the Government, they must limit the general powers; and, to make the compact valid, it was necessary that, as far as those powers clashed with the general, that the branch holding the specific should concur and give its sanction. If still it is insisted that Treaties are the supreme law of the land, the Constitution and laws are also; and, it may be asked, which shall have the preference? Shall a Treaty repeal a law or a law a Treaty? Neither can a law repeal a Treaty, because a Treaty is made with the concurrence of another party—a foreign nation—that has no participation in framing the law; nor can a Treaty made by the PRESIDENT and Senate repeal a law, for the same reason, because the House of Representatives have a participation in making the law. It is a sound maxim in Government, that it requires the same

Treaty with Great Britain.

power to repeal a law that enacted it. If so, then it follows that laws and Treaties are not of the same nature; that both operate as the law of the land, but under certain limitations; both are subject to the control of the Constitution; they are made not only by different powers, but those powers are distributed, under different modifications, among the several branches of the Government. Thus no law could be made by the Legislature giving themselves power to execute it; and no Treaty by the Executive, embracing objects specifically assigned to the Legislature without their assent.

To what, he asked, would a contrary doctrine lead? If the power of making Treaties is to reside in the PRESIDENT and Senate unlimitedly; in other words, if, in the exercise of this power, the PRESIDENT and Senate are to be restrained by no other branch of the Government, the PRESIDENT and Senate may absorb all Legislative power—the Executive has, then, nothing to do but to substitute a foreign nation for the House of Representatives, and they may legislate to any extent. If the Treaty-making power is unlimited and undefined, it may extend to every object of legislation. Under it money may be borrowed, as well as commerce regulated; and why not money appropriated? For, arguing as the gentlemen do, they might say the Constitution says that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. But Treaties, whatever provisions they may contain, are law; appropriations, therefore, may be made by Treaties. Then it would have been the shortest way to have carried the late Treaty into effect by the instrument itself, by adding to it another article, appropriating the necessary sums. By what provision of the Constitution is the Treaty-making power, agreeably to the construction of the gentlemen, limited? Is it limited by the provisions with respect to appropriations? Not more so than by the other specific powers granted to the Legislature. Is it limited by any law past? If not, it must embrace every thing, and all the objects of legislation. If not limited by existing laws, or if it repeals the laws that clash with it, or if the Legislature is obliged to repeal the laws so clashing, then the Legislative power in fact resides in the PRESIDENT and Senate, and they can, by employing an Indian tribe, pass any law under the color of Treaty. Unless it is allowed that either the power of the House over the purse-strings is a check, or the existing laws cannot be repealed by a Treaty, or that the special powers granted to Congress limit the general power of Treaty-making, there are no bounds to it, it must absorb all others, repeal all laws in contravention to it, and act without control.

To the construction he had given to this part of the Constitution, no such formidable objections could be raised. He did not claim for the House a power of making Treaties, but a check upon the Treaty-making power—a mere negative power; whilst those who are in favor of a different construction advocate a positive and unlimited power.

Since this is the striking difference between the doctrine held by the friends and by the opposers of the present motion, why, added Mr. G., with some warmth, are the first endeavored to be stigmatized as rebellious, disorganizers, as traitors against the Constitution? Do they claim a dangerous active power? No, they only claim the right of checking the exercise of a general power when clashing with the special powers expressly vested in Congress by the Constitution.

He should not say that the Treaty is unconstitutional, but he would say that it was not the supreme law of the land until it received the sanction of the Legislature. He turned to the Constitution. That instrument declares, that the Constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, and Treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land. The words are “under the authority of the United States,” not signed and ratified by the PRESIDENT: so that a Treaty, clashing in any of its provisions with the express powers of Congress, until it has so far obtained the sanction of Congress, is not a Treaty made under the authority of the United States.

Gentlemen had dwelt much on that part of the Constitution which had declared the Constitution, Laws, and Treaties, laws of the land; but they had avoided reading the whole of the clause, and had not given to it its obvious meaning. Why should the Constitution barely declare the Constitution the law of the land, the laws the law of the land, or Treaties the law of the land? All know that they are so. In all countries they are so, because made by the supreme authority, but, by adverting to the latter part of the clause, the meaning of the former must immediately become obvious. It runs as follows: “And the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby; any thing in the Constitution or laws of the individual State to the contrary notwithstanding.” It would have been childish if the Constitution had confined itself to expressing the first part of the clause; because no doubt could arise whether the Constitution, laws, and Treaties, were the supreme law of the land. But, as the General Government sprung out of a confederation of States, it was necessary to give that Government sufficient authority to provide for the general welfare, that the laws of the Union should supersede those of the particular States. There was thus a valuable purpose to be obtained by the latter part of the clause, viz: a positive provision declaring which authority should be supreme in case of clashing powers.

But the clause does not compare a Treaty with the law of the United States, or either of them with the Constitution; it only compares all the acts of the Federal Government with the acts of the individual States, and declares that either of the first whether under the name of Constitution, law, or Treaty, shall be paramount to and supersede the Constitution and laws of the individual States. In that point of view are Treaties said to be the supreme law, to wit: when standing in competition against acts of the several States;

Treaty with Great Britain.

but the clause by no means expresses that Treaties are equal or superior to the laws of the Union, or that they shall be supreme law when clashing with any of them.

To illustrate: He supposed that the Pennsylvania Legislature were to pass an act incorporating the city of Philadelphia, granting to certain bodies the power to make regulations which should be the supreme law of the land; this would mean only that they were so within their proper sphere, and not that they were paramount to the laws of the State or of the Union. The same of Treaties: they are declared to be the supreme law of the land, within the provisions of the Constitution, and agreeably to the modifications therein provided; but they are not declared to be supreme when compared, or paramount to the laws of the United States. The Constitution is paramount to both laws and Treaties; and, when gentlemen ground their arguments on the position that Treaties are superior or equal to the laws of the Union, they take for granted the very thing which is to be proved. The natural construction of the Treaty-making power, was this, he contended, that, as far as a Treaty negotiated by the Executive embraced Legislative objects, so far it required the sanction of the Legislature.

To give some additional weight to this construction of the Constitution, the practice of the British Government had been quoted. It was certainly proper, when about to construe our own Constitution, to compare it with the operation of the Constitutions of other countries that resemble ours in those parts to the construction of which doubts are raised. Whether there is a similarity in general between the British Constitution and ours, is not the question: he hoped they would not be assimilated more than they really were. But, he contended, as to the Treaty-making power, they were in fact, perfectly similar. Both nations give the power of negotiating Treaties to their Executives: there the King exercises it; here the Senate, being a part of the Executive, exercises it in conjunction with the PRESIDENT. The only difference here is, that two-thirds of the Senate are necessary to their formation. In other respects the power is the same in the two countries. There the Executive authority has enjoyed this power from time immemorial; and here the PRESIDENT and Senate possess it by the letter of the Constitution. It may be said that Great Britain has no written Constitution: true, but the force of immemorial custom forms their Constitution.

He read a quotation from Blackstone, page 257, vol. i., to show that the power of Treaty-making in England is as extensively vested in the King, as it can possibly be said to be here in our Executive.

The following is the passage alluded to:

"II. It is also the King's prerogative to make Treaties, leagues, and alliances with foreign States and Princes. For it is, by the Law of Nations, essential to the goodness of a league, that it be made by the sovereign power, and then it is binding upon the whole community: and, in England, the sovereign power, quo ad hoc, is vested in the person of the King. Whatever contracts, therefore, he engages in, no other power in the Kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul."

After such a latitude as this clause gives, it would be supposed that there could be no check reserved upon this power; yet it will be found that Parliament have a participation in it. And the apparent inconsistency is easily reconciled by observing that the power given generally to the Executive of making contracts with other nations, does not imply that of making Legislative regulations, but that when the contract happens to embrace Legislative objects, the assistance of the Legislature becomes necessary to give it effect.

He proceeded to show the operation of this limitation of the Treaty-making power in England by the practice of Parliament. It was always considered as discretionary with Parliament to grant money to carry Treaties into effect or not, and to repeal or not to repeal laws that interfere with them. In citing instances of the exercise of this power, he should not go further back than their Revolution.

He then read several extracts from Anderson's History of Commerce, vol. iii., pages 269, '70, '71, '72. They are so much in point that we transcribe the most material passages:

"But we could not omit our animadversions on the eighth and ninth articles, as they were so extraordinary in themselves, and as they occasioned so great a stir and uneasiness at that time, as to have brought the whole Treaty of Commerce to miscarry then and ever since.

"ART. IX. That within the space of two months after a law shall be made in Great Britain, whereby it shall be sufficiently provided that not more customs or duties be paid for goods and merchandise brought from France into Great Britain than what are payable for goods and merchandise of the like nature, imported into Great Britain from any other country in Europe; and that all laws made in Great Britain since the year 1664 for prohibiting the importation of any goods or merchandise coming from France, which were not prohibited before that time, be repealed, the general tariff in France, on the 18th of September, in the said year 1664, shall take place there again, and the duties payable in France by the subjects of Great Britain for goods imported and exported, shall be paid according to the tenor of the tariff above mentioned.

"When the said two articles came to be known by the merchants of Great Britain, they were received with the utmost surprise and indignation, and the clamor was loud and universal.

"That the complying with those two articles would effectually ruin the commerce we carried on to Portugal—the very best branch of all our European commerce. That the said eight articles did, in general terms, put France on an equal footing with Portugal or any other of our best allies, in point of commerce.

"This is, in brief, the sum of this mercantile controversy, which, when brought into Parliament, it was so apparent that our trade to France had ever been a ruinous one, and that if, in consequence of accepting the said eighth and ninth articles, the British Parliament should consent to reduce the high duties and take off the prohibitions so prudently laid on French commodities it would effectually ruin the very best branches of our commerce, and would thereby deprive many hundred thousand manufacturers of their subsistence; which was also supported by petitions from many parts of the Kingdom: That, although a great majority of that House of Commons was in other respects closely attached to the ministry, the bill for agreeing to the purport of the said two articles was rejected by a majority of nine voices, after the most eminent merchants had been heard at the bar of that House, to the great joy of the whole trading part of the nation, and of all other impartial people."

Thus it must be clearly seen, that the consent of Parliament was not only deemed necessary to the completion of the Treaty, but that that consent was refused, and that in consequence the Treaty fell to the ground, and was not revived for a period of near eighty years, and all notwithstanding the plenitude of the Treaty-making power, said by the best English authority, Blackstone, to be vested in the King; which was, however, he repeated, necessarily checked by the special powers vested in Parliament; for none but they could grant money, or repeal the laws clashing with the provisions of Treaties.

He cited another instance of the exercise of this controlling power in Parliament of even a later date, viz: in the year 1739, in the case of a Treaty between Spain and Great Britain, which was sanctioned by a very small majority indeed in Parliament. He cited a third example from Anderson, Vol. VI., page 828, in the case of the Treaty of Commerce between France and Great Britain, to show, that the practice of the Parliament's interfering in Treaties is not obsolete.

The following is an article of the said Treaty, which Mr. GALLATIN read:

"XIV. The advantages granted by the present Treaty to the subjects of his Britannic Majesty shall take effect, as far as relates to the Kingdom of Great Britain, as soon as laws shall be passed there, for securing to the subjects of His Most Christian Majesty, the reciprocal enjoyment of the advantages which are granted to them by the Treaty.

"And the advantages by all these articles, except the tariff, shall take effect with regard to the Kingdom of Ireland, as soon as laws shall be passed there, for securing to the subjects of His Most Christian Majesty, the reciprocal enjoyment of the advantages which are granted to them by this Treaty; And, in like manner, the advantages granted by the tariff shall take effect in what relates to the said Kingdom, as soon as laws shall be passed there for giving effect to the said tariff."

Upon this principle, founded on almost immemorial practice in Great Britain, did the Minister of that Kingdom, when introducing the late Treaty with Prussia into Parliament, tell the House that they will have to consider the Treaty and make provision for carrying it into effect. On the same principle, when the debate took place on that instrument, it was moved to strike out the sum proposed to be voted, which would have defeated it, and afterwards to strike out the appropriation clause, which would have rendered the bill a mere vote of credit, and would also have caused the Treaty to fall to the ground. On the same principle, the King of Great Britain, when he mentioned the American Treaty, promised to lay it before them in proper season, that they might judge of the propriety of enacting the necessary provisions to carry it into effect.

It remains to be examined, said Mr. G., whether we are to be in a worse situation than Great Britain; whether the House of Representatives of the United States, the substantial and immediate representatives of the American people, shall be ranked below the British House of Commons; whether the Legislative power shall be swallowed up by the Treaty-making authority, as contended for here, though never claimed even in Great Britain?

In Great Britain, he remarked, the Treaty-making power is as undefined as in America. The Constitution here, declares that the President and Senate shall make Treaties; there, custom says as loudly, that the King shall make them. In Great Britain, however, the power is limited, by immemorial custom, by the exercise of the Legislative authority by a branch distinct from the regal; in the same manner is it limited here, not however merely by custom and tradition, but by the words of the Constitution, which gives specifically the Legislative power to Congress; and he hoped this authority would be exercised by the House with as much spirit and independence as anywhere.

He had at first imagined, that the doctrine contended for by the gentlemen, viz: that the House had no discretion in the business; but that, like machines, they were bound to pass the necessary provisions to carry into effect the Treaty, was quite new. He had, however, after much search, found a precedent to keep this strange doctrine in countenance here; at least as far as the right of granting money was concerned. Under the old Government of France, the Courts of Justice, nicknamed Parliaments, had a nominal control over the purse-strings, such as that here contended for. If the King laid a tax, they were to register it; but if they refused, they were either forced to comply, or the King raised the money without them. Thus here, though the House have by the Constitution, a particular and express control over the purse, yet they are told they must register; or that, if they do not, it is treason against the Government.

A gentleman from Connecticut up to-day, had asked, whether the advocates for the doctrine of free agency would refuse appropriating money for a salary fixed by law, in obedience to the Constitution, urging, that if they did, they would commit a breach of the Constitution, and if they did not think themselves authorized to refuse, they must abandon their doctrine.

Mr. G. observed, that the power of raising revenue and appropriating money is vested in Congress, and they are to exercise their discretion in the business; yet as a special clause of the Constitution says, that the salaries of certain officers shall not be increased or diminished during their term of service, so far this operates as a restricting exception upon the general powers; but was this the case as to the Treaty-making power?

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

Does any clause of the Constitution direct that money shall be appropriated to carry into execution any Treaty made by the President and Senate, however clashing with the special powers of the House? Before the two cases can be considered parallel, it must be proved that Treaties are paramount to the Constitution; for on that supposition alone rests the arguments that they, like the Constitutional clauses relative to the salaries of the President and Judges, are special exceptions to that general discretion which the House has a right to exercise on all Legislative subjects, and especially on all money matters.

But if, as it was said, the powers specifically delegated to the House, are not to operate as a limitation of the general powers granted to the President and Senate; if these powers are contended to be as unlimited as they are undefined, then the necessity of a check must strike as doubly necessary. The power of granting money should be exercised as a check on the Treaty-making power. The more unlimited the Treaty-making power is contended to be, the more dangerous it is, and the more should the House consider the power of originating grants of money exclusively vested in them as a precious deposit.

He maintained, that the Treaty with Great Britain, or any other in similar circumstances, was not, until the necessary appropriations were made, and until the existing laws that stood in its way were repealed, and the requisite laws enacted, the supreme law of the land. Existing laws declare, that goods shall not be imported by land into the United States, except in certain districts; the third article of the Treaty allows a general importation; the laws declare that foreign vessels trading with us shall pay an additional ten per cent. upon the duties paid by our own vessels, the same article again interferes here; in other particulars, also, but these are sufficient to illustrate. Now, if the doctrine of gentlemen be sanctioned, and the House have no discretion left to use on the Treaty, but are bound thereby, specific and explicit clauses in the Constitution notwithstanding, the power of granting money becomes nugatory, and a Treaty, made by the Executive, may repeal a law. If a Treaty can repeal a law, then the act of the President and Senate can repeal the act of the three branches; and although all Legislative powers be vested in Congress by the Constitution, yet Congress are controlled by two of its branches; those clauses of the Constitution vesting the Legislative powers in Congress are annihilated, and the President and Senate, by substituting a foreign nation for the House of Representatives, assume, in fact, an unlimited Legislative power; since, under color of making Treaties, they may repeal laws, and may enact laws.

If this doctrine is sanctioned, if it is allowed, that Treaties may regulate appropriations and repeal existing laws, and the House, by rejecting the present resolution declare, that they give up all control, all right to the exercise of discretion, it is tantamount to saying, that they abandon their share in legislation, and that they consent the whole power should be concentrated in the other branches. He did not believe such a doctrine could be countenanced by the House. If gentlemen should insist upon maintaining this doctrine, should deny the free agency of the House, and their right to judge of the expediency of carrying the Treaty into effect, the friends to the independence of the House will be driven to the necessity to reject the Treaty, whether good or bad, to assert the contested right. If the gentlemen abandoned this ground, then the policy of the measure could be weighed on fair ground, and the Treaty carried into effect, if reconcilable to the interests of the United States. He concluded by observing, that even if the right did not exist in the House to judge of the expediency of carrying the Treaty into effect, yet as they were to be made agents in the business, at least in form, they could not be denied the papers, to see the reasons which led to the formation of the Treaty; and even on that ground it had been said, that we had nothing to do either with the merits of the Treaty, or with the motives of those who made it. He recollected but one late instance of a precedent for sentiments he had lately heard, with so much surprise, on the floor of the House, and that was the sentiment expressed by a Reverend Bishop in England lately, who contended, that the people had nothing to do with the laws but obey them. The gentlemen here, however, carry the doctrine still farther; for they insist, that even the Representatives of the People have not a right to consult their discretion when about exercising powers positively delegated to them by the Constitution.

He hoped this dangerous doctrine would receive a death-blow, and that the Committee would adopt the resolution.

The Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House then adjourned.

MARCH 10.—In Committee of the Whole, on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolution Mr. HARTLEY delivered his sentiments as follows:

As I was not present when this subject was first introduced, it cannot be expected that I should take any great share in the debate; but some observations I have heard, chiefly from the gentleman last up yesterday from Pennsylvania, have induced me to show a few grounds for my vote.

That gentleman has strongly combined this resolution with the Treaty, and wishes that every one who holds that there should be a co-operation of this House respecting that instrument, should vote for the resolution. I think differently.

The gentlemen who contend for the mighty power of the Executive and Senate, as well as those who argue for the great authority of this House, perhaps are on extremes; but the Treaty ought not now to be so largely under consideration. I am willing, if it is thought proper, to take it up at an early day, and, after a full hearing, will vote as I hold right.

The gentleman I referred to, from Pennsylvania, argued most strenuously that the laws and customs of Great Britain and the Constitution of the United States were analogous—nay, that the powers were precisely the same.

The gentlemen who hold this doctrine have made researches, and have quoted several authorities; but why have not those ingenious gentlemen discovered a single instance where the British House of Commons have had the instructions given by the Executive to the negotiating Minister laid before them. If there was such a power, no doubt that body would at some period have exercised it; for no men on earth have extended the power of privileges which they had further than the members of the House of Commons of Britain.

As those gentlemen who contend for the likeness—indeed, sameness of the Treaty-making powers of both countries—can show no precedent, it may be fairly contended, that no such right exists as is contemplated by the resolution.

Treaties are made under the Executive in almost all countries, and when the Ministers have gone through their part of the business, the Treaty is commonly laid before the nation. If any national act is further necessary, it would pass in conformity to the principles of good faith; if anything is necessary (consistent with the Constitution) on the part of the House, it will be the discussion of another day.

Instructions to Ministers to treat are most frequently of two kinds—public and private; the former are sometimes shown to the opposite party, the latter not.

In Executive acts there may be, in some cases, a necessity for secrecy.

There was a misunderstanding between this country and Great Britain; there were charges of infraction and misconstruction of a former Treaty; then, is it not to be supposed there were secret instructions given to our Plenipotentiary in the late Treaty? Our negotiations with Britain, it seems, are not yet at an end: any new articles agreed to, and ratified, are to be added to the Treaty.

Besides, I believe we have other negotiations going on elsewhere. The disclosure of any of the instructions, being connected with others, might put us in the power of other nations without producing any good to us.

The constitutionality of the resolution may be denied; at any rate, I consider it as highly impolitic and improper.

I hope that those gentlemen who do not think that the resolution must be combined with the Treaty, whatever their ideas may be with regard to the Treaty, will vote against the motion.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, that the resolution on the table appeared at first view to be perfectly innocent, and, he might add, of very little importance. It amounted to no more than a request to the PRESIDENT to furnish the House with papers relating to the negotiation with Great Britain, which he might either satisfy or reject. But the discussion which had taken place in the Committee had given the subject a very serious aspect, and involved a question of the first importance; and although some gentlemen had thought that the Committee had prematurely involved itself in the examination of the question, he could not see how the discussion could have been avoided. For gentlemen would not say that any resolution—more particularly a resolution calling on the PRESIDENT for documents belonging to the Executive Department—was to pass the House without a conclusive reason, much less without any reason for its passing. On this principle gentlemen had been called on at an early period for the reasons on which they grounded the resolution. They had attempted to assign reasons, but those reasons had been generally abandoned; and it could not at that time be seriously contended that the objects of general information or publicity, which had been first mentioned, could justify the House in calling on the PRESIDENT for papers relating to the British Treaty, or that those papers were necessary to enable the House to judge of the constitutionality of the Treaty. The friends of the resolution, aware of this, had at last come forward and assigned a new and a very important reason. It had been now said, that the House of Representatives have a right to judge over the heads of the PRESIDENT and Senate on the subject of Treaties; that no Treaty can become a law until sanctioned by the House; and, in fine, that the House of Representatives is a Constitutional part of the Treaty-making power.

If these facts and the principles which grow out of them are true, he could not say that the resolution was improper; and although he did not know to what part of the Treaty the papers would particularly apply, yet, if the House were to take this extensive view of the Treaty, and ultimately to sanction or reject it, it would seem that the papers relating to the negotiation ought to be laid before them. But if these facts are not true, and the House is not a Constitutional part of the Treaty-making power, and the Treaty is already a law without its sanction, then the reason falls to the ground, and the resolution ought to be rejected.

This inquiry into the powers of the House of Representatives must be confined, and the question arising out of it must be decided by a fair construction of the Constitution. The powers of each branch of the Government are there limited and defined, and an accurate understanding of that instrument would enable gentlemen to decide the question?

In comparing these questions with the Constitution, gentlemen were not, however, to inquire whether that Constitution was a good or a bad one: whether too much power had been given to this or to that branch of the Government. The question will only be, what powers has the Constitution given, and to what departments have the same been distributed?

To render the subject as clear and distinct as possible, he thought it would not be improper to take an abstract view of those two powers in all Governments having foreign relations which are immediately connected with the inquiry, viz: the Legislative and the Treaty-making power. And if gentlemen can clearly fix in their minds the limits of each, they will become better enabled to see their operation, and to decide on the powers of the House in the exercise of them.

Treaty with Great Britain.

The Legislative power in all Governments is extremely broad; it occupies the most extensive ground; it extends to every object which relates to the internal concerns of the nation; it regulates the life, the liberty, and the property of every individual living within its jurisdiction; it can control commerce within its jurisdiction; govern the conduct of the nation towards aliens, in whatever capacity they may appear; and, in short, as certain English writers have said of the British Government, its power is almost omnipotent. Thus broad and extensive are the general powers of legislation, subject, however, to such particular restrictions as are prescribed by forms of Government, or which occasionally arise from the nature of Government itself, and limit the objects of its operation.

It is easy to see, that in the exercise of these Legislative powers it will frequently happen that laws are enacted, which, in their operation, will embarrass the intercourse of two nations. Such are always the effect of retaliating laws, and aliens within the limits of a foreign jurisdiction are frequently, by those regulations, subjected to great and unreasonable embarrassments.

The Treaty-making power operates in a very different manner: its power is limited and confined to the forming of Treaties with foreign nations; its objects are to facilitate the intercourse between nations; to remove by contract, those impediments which embarrass that intercourse, and to place the same on a fair and just foundation. In the exercise of this power, it will unavoidably happen that the laws of the Legislature are sometimes infringed. The Legislature, for certain causes—perhaps to compel a foreign nation to form a Treaty on terms of reciprocity—may prohibit all intercourse, or embarrass that intercourse with regulations so burdensome as to produce the same effect: the foreign nation finally becomes willing to treat, and to establish an intercourse on equitable terms. If, in this case, the Treaty power can not touch the laws of the Legislature, the object which gave rise to those very laws can never be attained; no Treaty can be formed, because it will oppose existing laws; those laws cannot be repealed, because the object for which they were enacted has not been attained. Such a construction of the Treaty power would defeat every object for which that power was established; and instead of possessing an authority to remove embarrassments in a foreign intercourse, it cannot touch them; and, although expressly created for the attainment of a single object, it can never attain it.

The principle might be elucidated by the following case: Two nations who have no existing Treaties with each other are induced by their respective Legislatures to enact countervailing and retaliating laws, and ultimately to carry these laws to such an extent as to render all intercourse impracticable: what is to be done? It will not do for either nation to repeal her laws, because neither can begin the measure. The Treaty power can alone interfere, and the two nations must do that by compact which never could have been done by legislation. Mutual concessions must be made, and the embarrassing restrictions of countervailing laws must be taken away by Treaty.

Another case may be put down from a principle in the Constitution of the United States. The Legislative power of this Government declares war against a foreign nation; the war proceeds until every object is accomplished. How is this war to be terminated? It will not do for the Legislature to repeal the law which gave existence to the war: such a measure would disarm the nation, and leave the frontier unprotected; and if the Treaty power should interfere, and obtain a peace by negotiation, such a measure would be directly opposed to the law which created the war; and if peace was established by Treaty, the law which declared war would thereby be repealed. He asked, again, what is to be done? Is the war to be perpetual? Every gentleman in the Committee would say that the war is not to be perpetual, but that the Treaty power is alone competent to put an end to the war, by negotiation and by Treaty. And yet it is apparent, that in the exercise of this power a Legislative act is directly repealed.

From these considerations, he contended that, in the exercise of that power which related to the intercourse with foreign nations, the Treaty-making was paramount to the Legislative power; and that the positive institutions of the Legislature must give place to compact.

On this construction a perfect harmony is introduced into the departments of Government. Both the Legislative and the Treaty power are necessary, on many occasions, to accomplish the same objects. The Legislative power to establish regulations, or declare war, for the purpose of compelling a nation to agree to a reasonable compact; and the Treaty power, when that nation is compelled to agree to such reasonable compact, to remove by Treaty those very regulations, and the war itself, on fair and equitable terms.

A different construction would be productive of endless confusion and disorder. As these powers operate on the same objects, if the one is not subordinate to the other, they are thrown into the same field, to combat for power; and placed in a state of perpetual war with each other.

And why is not this construction right? What evil or violation of principle is to arise from it? All laws originate from the people. The laws enacted by the Legislature are nothing more than the expression of their will. And shall not the people have the power to annul, by one agent, those laws, which they have established by other agents? The hands of the people are not tied; the same right which gave them the power to make statutes by a Legislature, gives them the power of repealing those statutes by Treaty, whenever they find it useful so to repeal them.

These general remarks are not made to prove any particular distribution of the powers of this Government. They are made to evince that, from the nature of things in all Governments, the Treaty power must, on certain subjects, be paramount to the Legislative. It cannot be doubted, but that the people have a right to deposite their power wherever they please; but wherever the power is placed, it must possess all that authority which is necessary to answer the objects for which it exists.

The next inquiry will be, where have the people of the United States, by their Constitution, placed these two powers? And where they are placed, there let them remain.

By recurring to the Constitution, this question is easily answered: The first article in the Constitution declares, that the Legislative power therein granted, shall be vested in a Congress. In other parts of the Constitution, the particular objects of the Legislative power are detailed: Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations; to lay taxes; to declare war, &c. But it is to be remarked, that this power of regulating commerce, &c., is a Legislative power, and, of course, subject to all those checks and restrictions, which a Legislative power must experience in all Governments, and which arise from the nature of things. The same Constitution declares, in words equally explicit, that the PRESIDENT shall have power, with the consent of the Senate, two-thirds agreeing, to make Treaties; and to leave no doubt as to the effect of a Treaty then made, the Constitution likewise declares, that all Treaties, made under the authority of the United States, shall be the law of the land. He said that this part of the subject did not admit of much elucidation; it gave rise to one of those self-evident propositions, which can only be obscured by reasoning. It was sufficient to say, that the people had, by their Constitution, in express words, deposited the Treaty power with the PRESIDENT and Senate, and as the House did not sit to make a Constitution, but to execute one, it was of no consequence whether the deposite was judicious, or otherwise.

Viewing the question in these points of light, he could not see any difficulty in their solution. The power of making Treaties has been given to the PRESIDENT and Senate. The Treaty in question has been completed by those constituted authorities; the faith of the nation is pledged. It has become a law, and the House of Representatives have nothing to do with it, but provide for its execution.

It had been, however, said, that if this extensive power is given to the PRESIDENT and Senate, they may repeal half of the existing laws. Allowing this to be the case, what follows? This consequence only results, that the people have clothed the PRESIDENT and Senate with a very important power. But this power must be placed somewhere; no Treaty can be made without it; the people have thought proper to place it there, and the House must submit; and it could be no objection to a distribution of necessary powers, that it might be altered. All power might be abused. The PRESIDENT is intrusted with the execution of the laws; he may abuse that power. The Legislature have the power to lay unlimited taxes, and to create unnumbered offices; this power may be abused. The people knew this when they gave the power; but they likewise knew that the measure was necessary, and that if no power was to be given, because power might be abused, all Government was at an end.

In opposition to these opinions, a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] had said, that a law could not repeal a Treaty, nor a Treaty repeal a law, and had assigned this reason for it: that no law could be repealed, but by consent of the parties to the law. The reason is perfectly just, and applies conclusively to the case of a Treaty. But how does the reason apply to a statute? Is the House of Representatives a party to a statute? He believed not. The laws were the laws of the people, and not the laws of the House of Representatives. And shall not the people who made the laws by one set of agents, repeal them, if they please, by another?

But it was said, that there is a power given the Legislature by the Constitution to check the Treaty power; he could not find that check in the Constitution. The power of making Treaties was complete, in the PRESIDENT and Senate; and a Treaty once made, is not only binding on the nation, but becomes a law; and although the Legislature may defeat the execution of a Treaty, as it may every other law, yet it can never release the nation from its obligation.

It had been likewise said, that the power of appropriating money, given to the Legislature, created a check on the Treaty power, wherever money was wanted to carry a Treaty into effect; he could not admit this doctrine. It had been already shown, that the discretion of the Legislature was in certain cases limited in the business of appropriation. The compensation to the PRESIDENT, and the salary to the Judges, had been mentioned; and it could not be said that the Legislature possessed a broad discretion in these cases. The Constitution declares, that these compensations shall be paid; and yet they cannot be paid without Legislative appropriation. It therefore becomes the duty of the Legislature to make the necessary appropriations for those objects; they are bound to do it. The obligation of the Legislature to appropriate money is equally strong in every case, where a debt becomes due, a contract is made, or a law is to be executed; whether that debt, contract, or law, arises from the Constitution itself, the law made in pursuance of it, or Treaties made under its authority. It was the duty of the Legislature to do in all those cases, what the same gentleman from Pennsylvania had said, on a former occasion, on the subject of the Federal City: They must execute the law, or repeal it; for they could not refuse an appropriation, because they may think the law a bad one.

The Legislature, with respect to appropriation, might be considered as Treasurers of the United States; they command the Treasury of the Union; no money could issue from its coffers without an appropriation. But this power was not given, to enable the Legislature to defeat the contracts of the people, made by their authorized agents; but to fulfill them. It was true that they must examine the claim, inquire whether the debt was due, the contract regularly made, or the law required Legislative aid. When these facts were ascertained, it became their duty and their business to make the necessary appropriations, provided money could be obtained for the purpose. This was a trust committed to the Legislature by the people; and if they did not execute it, they violated the trust reposed in them.

But it had been asserted, that the British House of Commons exercise the right of examining Treaties. But does it follow from thence, that the House of Representatives of the United States have the same power? Has Great Britain a similar Constitution? It was not pretended that she had; her Constitution had been justly said to have been made up of usages. Of course, proving that the British Commons exercise this power, proves nothing more than that such is the custom in that Government. But if the Parliament of Great Britain was to pass a law, vesting this power exclusively in the King and House of Lords, would the Commons then claim the right of ratifying Treaties?

But still gentlemen ask, have not the House as much power as the British House of Commons? He would answer this question by saying, that the House had as much, and no more power, than the Constitution had given it. And if gentlemen required a further answer, he would say that the Legislature of the United States did not possess as extensive power as the Parliament of Britain. That body can change the Constitution, alter the religion of the country, and, in short, its power is really omnipotent; such unbounded powers are not claimed here. But whether the British House of Commons have the power or not, is a question of no consequence; the inquiry was not into the powers of British Parliaments or Houses of Commons, but into the powers of that House, and those powers were found only in the Constitution.

The same gentleman from Pennsylvania said, that, if the Treaty is a law, it must be carried into effect. He asked, why was not this Treaty a law? It is certainly a Treaty; it had been made; it had been made under the authority of the United States; having been ratified by the PRESIDENT, with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate. What other requisite was wanting to make it a law? The Constitution points out no other: it therefore must be a law, and as a law, must be carried into effect. The gentleman had said, that a law could not repeal a Treaty; and if the House could not repeal it, why discuss it? It would be doing what the people had not employed them to do.

In the course of the debate, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] had compared the opinions of those who opposed the resolution, to the saying of an English Bishop, who had said, "that the people had nothing to do with the law, but to obey it;" and their conduct, to the servile obedience of a Parliament of Paris, under the old order of things. Such remarks deserved no answer; he only wished to impress the recollection of them on the minds of gentlemen, that they might remain a perpetual monument of that gentleman's candor.

If he had been right in the doctrines he had advanced, that the business of ratifying the Treaty did not belong to the House, and that the Treaty was in fact a law without Legislative sanction, then the resolve on the table was improper and inexpedient, and ought not to pass.

Mr. HAVENS observed, that it appeared rather unfortunate, that a great Constitutional question should be discussed on a proposition that expressed no opinion relative to that subject; but as the right of the House to request the PRESIDENT to lay papers before them that related to the subject of the Treaty, had been denied, on the Constitutional ground, it appeared necessary to debate the Constitutional question; which, when stated in as concise terms as possible, and yet so as to express it with clearness and precision, appeared to be this: Is there not such an apparent interference between the Treaty-making power, vested by the Constitution in the PRESIDENT and Senate, and the Legislative power vested in Congress, that it becomes necessary to adopt such a principle of construction as will give both these powers full operation and effect, and that therefore it ought to be concluded, that whenever any Treaty shall contain any stipulation that may be comprehended under the Legislative powers of Congress, it ought not to be considered as the supreme law of the land, until it shall have received the assent of the House of Representatives to carry it into effect? In discussing this question it would be necessary to make some preliminary observations on the nature of power generally, without reference to any particular Constitution, that a better judgment might be formed of the nature and extent of the respective distributions of power contemplated in the Constitution of the United States. Power, as it relates to Government, has been considered to be of three kinds: Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. It would, in the course of this discussion, be admitted, as he presumed, that it would be a good definition of the Legislative power to say, that it was a power to prescribe rules that shall be binding on the community; and that it would likewise be admitted that it was a precise definition of the Executive power to say, that it was confined merely to the execution of the laws; and that the judicial power was nothing more than the power of determining what the law is; but, notwithstanding these respective definitions were sufficient to give a precise idea of the nature of each of these respective species of power, yet it must be acknowledged as an undoubted principle, that they do so shade into each other, that it is impossible in many cases to draw any line of distinction between them. The Executive will, for instance, in many cases exercise a Legislative power in the form of discretion, or in acting in cases where in fact the law is silent; and in like manner the judicial is rather in its nature Executive, as having united with it a power to execute the laws, and at the same time exercises in a great measure Legislative powers under the form of adjudications; but of these three kinds of power, the Legislative must be the most extensive and indefinite, for being in its nature supreme, it cannot be limited in going into details. But if the boundaries between these respective powers are somewhat undefinable, when considered without reference to any particular form of Government, they are much more so when viewed as they are intended to be distributed in the several forms of Government or Constitutions now existing in the world. He knew of no Government or Constitution in which those three powers were perfectly separated, unless it had been effected in the present Constitution of France, but he doubted whether it had been effected there in the sense that he understood it; but if recourse were to be had to the Constitutions in the United States, we should not find one in which these powers were not in some measure blended among the several departments of the Government; this was the case, at least so far as his knowledge on that subject extended. He had not seen one in which it appeared to him that this was not the case. They were certainly blended in the Constitution of the United States: The first article of it determines what branches of the Government shall exercise the Legislative powers; and the second creates the Executive power; but, at the same time, the Chief Executive is vested by the first article with a right to examine bills and object to them before they are passed into laws; this power could not be pretended to be Executive in its nature; and by the second article he is vested with the power of making Treaties with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate; but this does not make this power in its nature Executive, because that when we take into consideration the nature of this power, we shall find that it is in fact Legislative; for it comes precisely within the definition of Legislative power, as being a rule or law, binding on two or more independent nations by their mutual consent; the idea of a contract is no further connected with it than as it is necessary that two or more independent nations should ask each other's consent that this law should be binding on each of them. When, therefore, this is said to be a power founded on conventions, compacts, or agreements, it does not follow that the power is not in its nature Legislative; such words and phrases as these cannot alter the nature of the power; and when considered without reference to any particular Constitution, it must be considered as unlimited in its extent; because any conceivable stipulation, whether of a Legislative, Executive, or Judicial nature, may be comprehended under the form of a Treaty or contract with a foreign nation, and therefore it must follow as a necessary consequence evidently deducible from the indefinite extent of this power, that there never can be any precise boundary line marked out between what has been usually called internal and external relations. If the power of making Treaties as vested by the Constitution in the PRESIDENT and Senate, is in any sense limited, it must be by other parts of the Constitution than that in which it is expressly delegated; for it is there expressed without any limitation; and the only question seems to be, by what other parts or clauses is it limited? The first clause in the Constitution declares that all Legislative power therein granted shall be vested in Congress, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives; there is no reason can be assigned why these words, all Legislative power, in this clause, should not be considered in as unlimited a sense with respect to all the objects of legislation specified in the Constitution, as the words to make Treaties, in another clause; there must, therefore, be a manifest inconsistency between these two powers, according to the doctrine of those who contend, that a Treaty ought to be considered as supreme law without the assent of the House of Representatives, because it would be the same thing as to say, that no Legislative power granted by the Constitution could be exercised without the assent of the House of Representatives, and yet the PRESIDENT and Senate might exercise whatever Legislative power they thought proper, without their assent, under the form of a Treaty. The universal principle of construction, that all parts of any written law ought to be so construed as to be consistent with itself, so far as the same may be practicable, ought therefore to be applied in this case; which can easily be done by supposing that it must be a principle necessarily resulting from the two clauses in the Constitution, that whenever any Treaty shall contain any stipulations that may be comprehended under the Legislative power granted to Congress, it ought not to be considered as law until it has received in some form or other the assent of the House of Representatives. He observed that it had been admitted by those who were opposed to what he conceived to be the Constitutional right of the House, that it was necessary that the House should have some agency in passing an appropriation law to carry it into effect; this, he conceived, could only be necessary on their ground, because that the Treaty was unprovisional in that respect; if it had contained a clause stipulating that the necessary appropriations should be made, it would, according to their principles, have been unnecessary to have laid it before the House: but at the same time that they admitted this, they insisted that the House had no discretion in the business, but that they were bound by the Constitution to carry it into effect, because that the Constitution had said, that Treaties made under the authority of the United States, should be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding; and in confirmation of their doctrine, they had compared it to a case in which they suppose that the Legislature can, by the Constitution, exercise no discretion in determining whether it will make the appropriations—that is, in the case for the support of Government generally, or of some of its particular branches, as for instance the Judiciary. But he could even suppose a case in which it might be necessary to exercise some discretion about the appropriation of moneys in the strongest case that had been stated; as, for instance, it might be necessary in some time of extraordinary danger or difficulty, to apply the very moneys that would, in an ordinary way, be applied to the support of Government, to such a purpose as would prevent the impending danger; but even admitting that Congress could exercise no discretion about legislating in many cases that might be pointed out in the Constitution, it does not follow that they would have no discretionary power about legislating in this particular case. Congress must be supposed generally to have a discretionary power to determine whether they will continue any existing law in force, and consequently may exercise a discretion in appropriating any moneys, if any should be necessary, to carry it into effect; and, besides, the question would still remain to be determined, whether a Treaty containing Legislative regulations ought not to receive the sanction of the House before it became the supreme law of the land, in the sense in which that expression in the Constitution ought to be understood. He observed, that gentlemen had not been sufficiently explicit in determining in what sense Treaties ought to be considered as the supreme law of the land; some appeared to consider Treaty law of so transcendent a nature as almost to form a part of the Constitution itself; they appeared, however, at the same time, to admit, that if a Treaty was contrary to the Constitution, it would, in that respect, be null; they appeared, however, very generally to place it in a grade or sphere a little below the Constitution, but far above any Congressional law, so that no act of Congress could touch or affect it—notwithstanding that the Constitution has declared the Congressional law shall be the supreme law of the land as well as Treaty law.

It appeared of great importance to him in discussing the question, to determine whether there did not necessarily exist in the Government of the United States, power to break a Treaty as well as to make it; this was a power necessarily inherent in all independent Governments, and it was frequently necessary to exercise it, because that a Treaty being in its nature nothing more than a law, mutually binding on two or more independent Sovereignities by their mutual consent, it must follow as a consequence, that whenever either of the parties do not in the opinion of the other observe this law, then the parties entertaining this opinion will consider themselves as discharged from the obligation of observing it on their part; and it was frequently the case, that there was no other practicable method of compelling an observance of a Treaty on one part, but by a refusal to observe it on the other. It did not appear to him, that in such a case there was vested in the President and Senate alone any power to break a Treaty; the Constitution was wholly silent on that point; it must therefore be supposed to be vested in Congress as exercising supreme Legislative power; and, therefore, it must be concluded, that an act of Congress contravening any existing Treaty, would in effect repeal it; and this must be more evident when it is recollected, that acts of Congress are, by the Constitution, declared to be the supreme law of the land as well as Treaties.

Mr. H. said he had not paid very great attention to precedents in considering the question under consideration, because that he laid it down as an incontrovertible maxim, that neither of the branches of the Government could, rightfully or constitutionally, divest itself of any powers by precedent, or by a neglect to exercise those powers that were granted to it by the Constitution; the great danger that was generally to be apprehended from precedents was this; that they might make the Government different in practice from what it was in theory or on paper. He observed, that it was a very remarkable circumstance, that those who had been stigmatized by gentlemen as disorganizers of the Government, or as rebels against the constituted authorities, should be very strenuously contending for such a construction of the Constitution of the United States as would render all its parts harmonious, and give them full operation and effect; and that those who assumed to themselves the peculiar style of being defenders of the Constitution and supporters of the Government, should be contending for such a construction of the Constitution as must render it inconsistent, and which must have a tendency to transfer the powers of the House of Representatives over into the hands of the President and Senate, by giving them an indefinite right to make laws without the consent of the House, under the form of Treaties. In order to avoid this inconsistency it had been said, that so was the Constitution; the will of the people had been expressed in that way, and that therefore we ought to submit to it; but such an assertion did not remove the difficulty, or clear up the inconsistency on the side of those who brought it forward; because it would still remain to be determined what the people had said when they expressed their will in the Constitution, and whether they did not intend that a Treaty containing Legislative regulations should receive the assent of the House of Representatives before it was carried into effect. It had been attempted to represent these powers as operating co-ordinately; but co-ordinate supreme powers could not operate in any government so as to be consistent with themselves, and therefore this would not remove the difficulty or clear up the inconsistency that arose from their construction. It had likewise been said that we were not necessarily to presume that these powers would be abused; but, in examining the principles of a Constitution we ought not to reason from what will be done in the exercise of power, but from what may be done. It had likewise been asserted that the popular branches of a government were apt to assume powers; this did not appear to him to be generally the case; if recourse were had to history or to the experience of mankind, it would be found that popular assemblies had been more frequently disposed to render themselves subservient to the views and interests of those who were in power, and who did not form a part of the body, but might notwithstanding have a great influence over them as individuals, than to assume unnecessary powers to themselves. This had been the case for many years in England; the popular branch of the Government in that country, had been subservient to the views of the administration, and this was the principal cause of all the miseries that the nation now endured. It had not been the case in the Government of the United States, since it had been established; it rather appeared from the laws of Congress that they had been at all times sufficiently disposed to place large and indefinite powers in the hands of the Administration under the form of discretion. He said, that this was no new question; it had been agitated when the Constitution of the United States was under consideration; it was then said, that the power of making Treaties vested in the President and Senate, would be inconsistent with the Legislative powers of Congress, unless the House of Representatives were to give their assent to Treaties as well as to other laws, before they were carried into effect; but the people had rather chosen to adopt the Constitution, and to trust to time and experience to procure amendments, than to reject it on account of this or other objections; but he did not recollect that he had ever heard the difficulty cleared up in any other manner than by supposing, that the House of Representatives ought, in some mode or other, to give their assent to Treaties, as well as to other laws. He concluded with observing, that he thought he had clearly shown that, on one ground, there would be an inconsistency between the Legislative power vested in Congress, and the power of making Treaties vested in the President and Senate; and that, on the other ground, they would be perfectly reconcilable, and all parts of the Constitution would have full operation and effect; and he therefore thought it was his duty to adopt this principle of construction; he therefore supposed there could be no good objection to the proposition under the consideration of the House, on the ground of the Constitutional right of the House to determine whether they would or would not carry a Treaty into effect.

Mr. MADISON said, that the direct proposition before the House, had been so absorbed by the incidental question which had grown out of it, concerning the Constitutional authority of Congress in the case of Treaties, that he should confine his present observations to the latter.

On some points, there could be no difference of opinion; and these need not, consequently, any discussion. All are agreed that the sovereignty resides in the people. That the Constitution, as the expression of their will, is the guide and the rule to the Government; that the distribution of the powers made by the Constitution ought to be sacredly observed by the respective departments. That the House of Representatives ought to be equally careful to avoid encroachments on the authority given to the other departments, and to guard their own authority against encroachments from the other departments. These principles are as evident as they are vital and essential to our political system.

The true question, therefore, before the Committee, was, not whether the will of the people expressed in the Constitution was to be obeyed, but how that will was to be understood; in what manner it had actually divided the powers delegated to the Government; and what construction would best reconcile the several parts of the instrument with each other, and be most consistent with its general spirit and object.

On comparing the several passages in the Constitution, which had been already cited to the Committee, it appeared, that if taken literally, and without limit, they must necessarily clash with each other. Certain powers to regulate commerce, to declare war, to raise armies, to borrow money, &c., are first specially vested in Congress. The power of making Treaties, which may relate to the same subjects, is afterwards vested in the President and two-thirds of the Senate; and it is declared in another place, that the Constitution and the laws of the United States, made in pursuance thereof, and Treaties made, or to be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land. And the Judges, in every State, shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The term supreme, as applied to Treaties, evidently meant a supremacy over the State Constitution and laws, and not over the Constitution and Laws of the United States. And it was observable that the judicial authority, and the existing laws, alone of the States fell within the supremacy expressly enjoined. The injunction was not extended to the Legislative authority of the States, or to laws requisite to be passed by the States for giving effect to Treaties; and it might be a problem worthy of the consideration, though not needing the decision of the Committee, in what manner the requisite provisions were to be obtained from the States.

It was to be regretted, he observed, that on a question of such magnitude as the present, there should be any apparent inconsistency, or inexplicitness in the Constitution, that could leave room for different constructions. As the case, however, had happened, all that could be done was to examine the different constructions with accuracy and fairness, according to the rules established therefor, and to adhere to that which should be found most rational, consistent and satisfactory.

He stated the five following as all the constructions worthy of notice, that had either been contended for, or were likely to occur.

I. The Treaty power, and the Congressional power, might be regarded as moving in such separate orbits, and operating on such separate objects, as to be incapable of interfering with, or touching each other.

II. As concurrent powers relating to the same objects; and operating like the power of Congress, and the power of the State Legislatures, in relation to taxes on the same articles.

III. As each of them supreme over the other, as it may be the last exercised; like the different assemblies of the people, under the Roman Government, in the form of centuries, and in the form of tribes.

IV. The Treaty power may be viewed, according to the doctrine maintained by the opponents of the proposition before the Committee, as both unlimited in its objects, and completely paramount in its authority.

MARCH, 1796.]

V. The Congressional power may be viewed as co-operative with the Treaty-power, on the Legislative subjects submitted to Congress by the Constitution, in the manner explained by the member from Pennsylvania [MR. GALLATIN] and exemplified in the British Government.

The objection to the first construction is, that it would narrow too much the Treaty power to exclude from Treaties altogether the enumerated subjects submitted to the power of Congress; some or other of this class of regulations being generally comprised in the important compacts which take place between nations.

The objection to the second is, that a concurrent exercise of the Treaty and Legislative powers, on the same objects, would be evidently impracticable. In the case of taxes laid both by Congress and by the State Legislatures on the same articles, the Constitution presumed, that the concurrent authorities might be exercised with such prudence and moderation as would avoid an interference between their respective regulations. But it was manifest that such an interference would be unavoidable between the Treaty power and the power of Congress. A Treaty of Commerce, for example, would rarely be made, that would not trench on existing legal regulations, as well as be a bar to future ones.

To the third, the objection was equally fatal. That it involved the absurdity of an imperium in imperio, of two powers both of them supreme, yet each of them liable to be superseded by the other. There was, indeed, an instance of this kind found in the Government of ancient Rome, where the two authorities of the comitia curiata, or meetings by centuries, and the comitia tributa, or meetings by tribes, were each possessed of the supreme legislative power, and could each annul the proceedings of the other. For, although the people composed the body of the meetings in both cases, yet, as they voted in one according to wealth, and in the other according to numbers, the organizations were so distinct as to create, in fact, two distinct authorities. But it was not necessary to dwell on this political phenomenon, which had been celebrated as a subject of curious speculation only, and not as a model for the institutions of any other country.

The fourth construction, is that which is contended for by the opponents of the proposition depending; and which gives to the Treaty-power all the latitude which is not necessarily prohibited by a regard to the general form and fundamental principles of the Constitution.

In order to smooth the way for this doctrine, it has been said that the power to make Treaties was laid down in the most indefinite terms; and that the power to make laws, was no limitation to it, because the two powers were essentially different in their nature. If there was ingenuity in this distinction, it was all the merit it could have; for it must be obvious that it could neither be reduced to practice, nor be reconciled to principles. Treaties and laws, whatever the nature of them may be, must, in their operation, be often the same. Regulations by Treaty, if carried into effect, are laws. If Congress pass acts relating to provisions in a Treaty, so as to become incorporated with the Treaty, they are not the less laws on that account. A Legislative act is the same whether performed by this or that body, or whether it be grounded on the consideration, that a foreign nation agrees to pass a like act, or on any other consideration.

It must be objected to this construction, therefore, that it extends the power of the PRESIDENT and Senate too far, and cramps the powers of Congress too much.

He did not admit that the term "Treaty" had the extensive and unlimited meaning which some seemed to claim for it. It was to be considered as a technical term, and its meaning was to be sought for in the use of it, particularly in Governments which bore most analogy to our own. In absolute Governments, where the whole power of the nation is usurped by the Government, and all the departments of power are united in the same person, the Treaty power has no bounds; because the power of the sovereign to execute it has none. In limited Governments, the case is different; the Treaty power, if undefined, is not understood to be unlimited. In Great Britain, it is positively restrained on the subjects of money and dismembering the empire. Nor could the Executive there, if his recollection was right, make an alien subject by means of a Treaty.

But the question immediately under consideration, and which the context and spirit of the Constitution must decide, turned on the extent of the Treaty power in relation to the objects specifically and expressly submitted to the Legislative power of Congress.

It was an important, and appeared to him to be a decisive, view of the subject, that if the Treaty power alone could perform any one act for which the authority of Congress is required by the Constitution, it may perform every act for which the authority of that part of the Government is required. Congress have power to regulate trade, to declare war, to raise armies, to levy, to borrow and appropriate money, &c. If, by Treaty, therefore, as paramount to the Legislative power, the PRESIDENT and Senate can regulate trade, they can also declare war, they can raise armies to carry on war, and they can procure money to support armies. These powers, however different in their nature or importance, are on the same footing in the Constitution, and must share the same fate. A member from Connecticut [MR. GRISWOLD] had admitted that the power of war was exclusively vested in Congress; but he had not attempted, nor did it seem possible, to draw any line between that and the other enumerated powers. If any line could be drawn, it ought to be presented to the Committee; and he should, for one, be ready to give it the most impartial consideration. He had not, however, any expectation that such an attempt could succeed; and, therefore, should submit to the serious consideration of the Committee, that although the Constitution had carefully and jealously lodged the power of war, of armies, of the purse, &c., in Congress, of which the immediate Representatives of the people formed an integral part, yet, according to the construction maintained on the other side, the PRESIDENT and Senate, by means of a Treaty of Alliance with a nation at war, might make the United States parties in the war. They might stipulate subsidies, and even borrow money to pay them; they might furnish troops to be carried to Europe, Asia, or Africa; they might even attempt to keep up a Standing Army in time of peace, for the purpose of co-operating, on given contingencies, with an ally, for mutual safety, or other common objects. Under this aspect the Treaty power would be tremendous indeed.

The force of this reasoning is not obviated by saying, that the PRESIDENT and Senate would only pledge the public faith, and that the agency of Congress would be necessary to carry it into operation. For, what difference does this make, if the obligation imposed be, as is alleged, a Constitutional one; if Congress have no will but to obey, and if to disobey be treason and rebellion against the constituted authorities? Under a Constitutional obligation with such sanctions to it, Congress, in case the PRESIDENT and Senate should enter into an alliance for war, would be nothing more than the mere heralds for proclaiming it. In fact, it had been said, that they must obey the injunctions of a Treaty as implicitly as a subordinate officer, in the Executive line, was bound to obey the Chief Magistrate; or as the Judges are bound to decide according to the laws.

As a further objection to the doctrine contended for, he called the attention of the Committee to another very serious consequence from it. The specific powers, as vested in Congress by the Constitution, are qualified by sundry exceptions, deemed of great importance to the safe exercise of them. Those restrictions are contained in section 9 of the Constitution, and in the articles of amendment which have been added to it. Thus, "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress." He referred to several of the other restrictive paragraphs which followed, particularly the 5th, which says, that no tax shall be laid on exports, no preference given to ports of one State over those of another, &c. It was Congress, also, he observed, which was to make no law respecting an establishment of Religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble, &c. Now, if the Legislative powers, specifically vested in Congress, are to be no limitation or check to the Treaty power, it was evident that the exceptions to those powers, could be no limitation or check to the Treaty power.

Returning to the powers particularly lodged in Congress, he took notice of those relating to war and money, or the sword and the purse, as requiring a few additional observations, in order to show that the Treaty power could not be paramount over them.

It was well known that, with respect to the regulation of commerce, it had long remained under the jurisdiction of the States; and that in the establishment of the present Government the question was, whether, and how far, it should be transferred to the general jurisdiction. But with respect to the power of making war, it had, from the commencement of the Revolution, been judged and exercised as a branch of the general authority essential to the public safety. The only question, therefore, that could arise, was whether the power should be lodged in this or that department of the Federal Government. And we find it expressly vested in the Legislative, and not in the Executive department; with a view, no doubt, to guard it against the abuses, which might be apprehended, from placing the power of declaring war in those hands which would conduct it when declared; and which, therefore, in the ordinary course of things, would be most tempted to go into war. But, according to the doctrine now maintained, the United States, by means of an alliance with a foreign Power, might be driven into a state of war by the PRESIDENT and Senate, contrary both to the sense of the Legislature, and to the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

On the subject, also, of appropriating money, particularly to a military establishment, the provision of the Constitution demanded the most severe attention. To prevent the continuance of a military force for a longer term than might be indispensable, it is expressly declared, that no appropriation for the support of armies shall be made for more than two years. So that, at the end of every two years, the question, whether a military force ought to be continued or not, must be open for consideration; and can be decided in the negative, by either the House of Representatives or the Senate's refusing to concur in the requisite appropriations. This is a most important check and security against the danger of standing armies, and against the prosecution of a war beyond its rational objects; and the efficacy of the precaution is the greater, as, at the end of every two years, a re-election of the House of Representatives gives the people an opportunity of judging on the occasion for themselves. But, if, as is contended, the House of Representatives have no right to deliberate on appropriations pledged by the PRESIDENT and Senate, and cannot refuse them without a breach of the Constitution and of their oaths, the case is precisely the same, and the same effects would follow, as if the appropriation were not limited to two years, but made for the whole period contemplated, at once. Where would be the check of a biennial appropriation for a military establishment raised for four years, if, at the end of two years, the appropriation was to be continued by a Constitutional necessity for two years more? It is evident that no real difference can exist between an appropriation for four years at once, and two appropriations for two years each, the second of which, the two Houses would be constitutionally obliged to make.

It had been said that, in all cases, a law must either be repealed, or its execution provided for.

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

Whatever respect might be due to this principle in general, he denied that it could be applicable to the case in question. By the provision of the Constitution, limiting appropriations to two years, it was clearly intended to enable either branch of the Legislature to discontinue a military force at the end of every two years. If the law establishing it must be necessarily repealed before an appropriation could be withheld, it would be in the power of either branch to keep up an establishment by refusing to concur in repeal. The construction and reasoning, therefore, opposed to the rights of the House, would evidently defeat an essential provision of the Constitution.

The Constitution of the United States is a Constitution of limitations and checks. The powers given up by the people for the purposes of Government, had been divided into two great classes. One of these formed the State Governments; the other, the Federal Government. The powers of the Government had been further divided into three great departments; and the Legislative department again subdivided into two independent branches. Around each of these portions of power were seen also exceptions and qualifications, as additional guards against the abuses to which power is liable. With a view to this policy of the Constitution, it could not be unreasonable, if the clauses under discussion were thought doubtful, to lean towards a construction that would limit and control the Treaty-making power, rather than towards one that would make it omnipotent.

He came next to the fifth construction, which left with the PRESIDENT and Senate the power of making Treaties, but required at the same time the Legislative sanction and co-operation, in those cases where the Constitution had given express and specific powers to the Legislature. It was to be presumed, that in all such cases the Legislature would exercise its authority with discretion, allowing due weight to the reasons which led to the Treaty, and to the circumstances of the existence of the Treaty. Still, however, this House, in its Legislative capacity, must exercise its reason; it must deliberate; for deliberation is implied in legislation. If it must carry all Treaties into effect, it would no longer exercise a Legislative power; it would be the mere instrument of the will of another department, and would have no will of its own. Where the Constitution contains a specific and peremptory injunction on Congress to do a particular act, Congress must, of course, do the act, because the Constitution, which is paramount over all the departments, has expressly taken away the Legislative discretion of Congress. The case is essentially different where the act of one department of Government interferes with a power expressly vested in another, and no where expressly taken away: here the latter power must be exercised according to its nature; and if it be a Legislative power, it must be exercised with that deliberation and discretion which is essential to the nature of Legislative power.

It was said, yesterday, that a Treaty was paramount to all other acts of Government, because all power resided in the people; and the PRESIDENT and Senate, in making a Treaty, being the Constitutional organs of the people for that purpose, a Treaty, when made, was the act of the people. The argument was as strong the other way. Congress are as much the organs of the people, in making laws, as the PRESIDENT and Senate can be in making Treaties; and laws, when made, are as much the acts of the people, as any acts whatever can be.

It had been objected, that the Treaty power would be in fact frustrated, if Treaties were to depend, in any degree, on the Legislature. He thought there was no such danger. The several powers vested in the several departments, form but one Government; and the will of the nation may be expressed through one Government, operating under certain checks on the subject of Treaties, as well as under other checks on other subjects. The objection would have weight, if the voluntary co-operation of the different States was to be obtained.

Another objection was, that no Treaty could be made at all, if the agency of Congress were to concur; because Congress could not treat, and their agency would not be of a Treaty nature. He would not stop to inquire how far a loan of money from a foreign Government, under a law of Congress, was or was not of the nature of a public contract or Treaty. It was more proper to observe, that the practice in Great Britain was an evidence that a Legislative agency did not vitiate a Treaty. Nay, if the objection were solid, it was evident that the Treaty lately entered into with that nation, could never be binding on this; because it had been laid before the Parliament for its Legislative agency, as necessary to effectuate the Treaty: and if that agency was to vitiate and destroy the nature of the Treaty on that side, the obligation, on the principle of all contracts, would be dissolved on both sides.

He did not see the utility in this case of urging as had been done, a particular distrust of the House of Representatives. He thought the PRESIDENT and Senate would be as likely to make a bad Treaty, as this branch of the Government would be to throw obstructions in the way of a good one, after it was made.

No construction might be perfectly free from difficulties; that which he had espoused was subject to the least, as it gave signification to every part of the Constitution; was most consistent with its general spirit, and was most likely, in practice, to promote the great object of it, the public good. The construction which made the Treaty power in a manner omnipotent, he thought utterly inadmissible in a Constitution marked throughout with limitations and checks.

He should not enter any further into the subject. It had been brought before the House rather earlier than he had expected, or than was perhaps necessary; and his observations, therefore, might not have been as full, or as well digested, as they ought to have been. Such as they were, he submitted them to the candid attention of the Committee.

Mr. W. SMITH (of South Carolina) said, he would not at that time go into an extensive review of the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON,] but would only notice some points which he had dwelt on. Before he went into a consideration of the subject, he would call the attention of the Committee to the true question now before them; for though it was originally only a call for papers, it had now assumed a very important shape, and was nothing less than this, Whether that House had a concurrent power with the PRESIDENT and Senate in making Treaties? The gentleman last up had followed others in referring to the practice under the British Constitution; but had concluded his remarks on that argument with allowing, that, after all, our own Constitution must be our sole guide. He heartily joined in that sentiment, and was satisfied that the merits of the question should be tested by that alone. In order to show that the Treaty power was solely delegated to the PRESIDENT and Senate by the Constitution, Mr. S. said, he should not confine himself to a mere recital of the words, but he should appeal to the general sense of the whole nation at the time the Constitution was formed, before any Treaty was made under it, which could, by exciting passion and discontent, warp the mind from a just and natural construction of the Constitution. By referring to the contemporaneous expositions of that instrument, when the subject was viewed only in relation to the abstract power, and not to a particular Treaty, we should come at the truth. He would then confidently appeal to the opinions of those who, when the Constitution was promulgated, were alarmed at the Treaty power, because it was by the Constitution vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate, and to its advocates, who vindicated it by proving that the power was safely deposited with these branches of the Government. The discussions which took place at the time of its adoption by the Convention of the several States, proved, beyond a doubt, that the full extent of the power was then well understood, and thought by those who approved of the Constitution to be sufficiently guarded. He would further appeal to the amendments which had been proposed by the discontented. The Convention of Virginia had proposed an amendment, which of itself overturned all the reasonings of the gentleman. It was, "that no commercial Treaty should be valid, unless ratified by two-thirds of all the Senators." This was the only check which that State required, and was a conclusive evidence of their opinions: had that State conceived that the check which is now contended for existed in the Constitution, they could not have been guilty of such an absurdity as the amendment would involve. All the possible dangers which might ensue from the unlimited nature of the Treaty power were well considered before the Constitution was adopted, and Virginia required no further check than the one above recited. All therefore, that they required had, in the present case, been done, for the Treaty was ratified by two-thirds of all the Senators.

Mr. S. said, he could refer to many further proofs derived from a similar source. He would not, however, fatigue the Committee at this time with reading them. He would only recal the recollection of some gentlemen present to the protest of the Pennsylvania minority, where the same ideas and amendments were contained, and to the proceedings of a meeting at Harrisburg, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] must well remember (having been one of the meeting) where, after stating objections to the extensive powers delegated by the Constitution, the following amendment was proposed, as necessary to limit and restrain the powers: "Provided always, that no Treaty which shall hereafter be made, shall be deemed or construed to alter or affect any law of the United States, or of any particular State, until such Treaty shall have been laid before and assented to by the House of Representatives in Congress." This amendment was the most satisfactory evidence that the proposers of it did then believe that, without that amendment, such Treaty would be valid and binding, although not assented to by this House, and that they had, at that day, no idea that there existed in the Constitution the check which is now discovered by this ex post facto construction.

Having stated the general opinion of the public, as manifested by the friends as well as the enemies of the Constitution, Mr. S. said he would proceed to show that the practice of Congress had, from the commencement of its existence, been conformable to that opinion. Several Treaties had been concluded with Indian tribes under the present Constitution. These Treaties embraced all the points which were now made a subject of contest—settlement of boundaries, grants of money, &c.; when ratified by the PRESIDENT and Senate, they had been proclaimed by the Executive as the law of the land; they had not even been communicated to the House; but the House, considering them as laws, had made the appropriations as matters of course, and as they did in respect to other laws. The Treaties were never discussed, but the requisite sums, as reported in the annual estimates, were included, as matters of course, in the general mass of moneys voted for the War Establishment in the item of Indian department. It was not pretended that the Constitution made any distinction between Treaties with foreign nations and Indian tribes; and the clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power of regulating commerce with foreign nations, and on which the modern doctrine is founded, includes as well Indian tribes as foreign nations.

That this House considered a Treaty, when ratified by the PRESIDENT and Senate, as the law of the land, was further evident from a resolve of the House, of the 4th of June, 1790, in these words:

"Resolved, That all Treaties made, or which shall be made and promulged under the authority of the United States, shall from time to time be published and annexed to their code of laws, by the Secretary of State."

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

In consequence of this resolution, the several Secretaries of State had annexed the Treaties which had been made, to the code of laws, as soon as they were ratified by the PRESIDENT and Senate, and promulged by the PRESIDENT.

Mr. S. then drew the attention of the Committee to the various applications to the PRESIDENT last Summer, requesting him to withhold his signature from the Treaty, all of which proceeded on the idea (and the generally received idea throughout the Union) that the Treaty would be the law of the land, as soon as sanctioned by the PRESIDENT. Was the language, then, that this House might interfere and defeat the Treaty? No, the language then was, "We look up to the PRESIDENT alone for preservation from the fatal instrument; if he signs it, nothing can save us from it but war—we are left without resource." The idea of applying to this House was never dreamt of; it was an after-thought, devised by the ingenious subtlety of the few, and considered almost universally as a desperate attempt. In the language of the New York meeting, the proceedings of which were drawn up by men supposed to understand the Constitution, the Treaty-making power is called altogether an Executive power; they did not then suppose that this House could at all interfere. To come still nearer to the present period, Mr. S. referred to the late act of Virginia, proposing an alteration to the Constitution on this subject. This amendment was a conclusive proof that the Legislature of that State did not conceive that this House possessed any power in relation to Treaties, for it expressly proposes to change the existing Constitution, by vesting such a power in this House. The fate of that amendment was demonstration no less conclusive, that the public sentiment was opposed to such a change; for in every Legislature in which that amendment had been discussed, notwithstanding the prejudices excited against the Treaty, it had been rejected; and the arguments which had appeared on those occasions, show the ideas of the several Legislatures to have been, that the PRESIDENT and Senate now possess exclusively the Treaty power; those in favor of the amendment having advocated it, on the ground that it was dangerous to leave such power with those two branches alone; and those against it having opposed it on the ground that the power was properly and safely lodged, and that this House was illy qualified to participate in a power of that nature.

Mr. S. repeated his former assertion, that there were cases where that House had not the right of withholding appropriations; if they had the power, indeed they might stop the proceedings of Government altogether; and so, individuals had the power of resisting the laws. Gentlemen had said, that if this doctrine prevailed, the House would lose its capacity of judging. He denied it; they would still retain, in such cases, a discretion, guided by morality, good faith, and the Constitution; the members were as much bound by the laws in their Legislative, as in their individual capacity; if an existing law (or Treaty, which was a law of the highest nature) prescribed a certain duty, they were bound to perform it, and their discretion could only be called in to regulate the mode and circumstances of discharging that duty; it could not be a matter of discretion whether or not they should perform that duty. Thus, unless they intended to arrest the operations of Government, their discretion could not be requisite to determine whether they should appropriate the moneys necessary for its support; but out of what fund, and when the moneys shall be paid, and other matters of detail. So, when a Treaty was concluded, and became a compact binding the nation, the discretion of the House (unless it was intended to violate our faith) could not determine whether the moneys contracted for should be paid, but the mode, the fund, and such questions of detail, would alone be considered. The distinction, which was an obvious one, between power and right, had not been attended to. The House had certainly the power to do many things which they had not the right to do; they had the power to do wrong, but they certainly had not the right to do wrong; and whether the wrong was committed by acting where they ought not to act, or refusing to act where they ought, was immaterial; both were equally reprehensible. It had been boldly said, that there was no case which could possibly come before them, where they would not be at liberty to answer aye or no: he would produce a case—by the Constitution, on the application of a certain number of States, wishing for amendments, Congress must call a Convention; where is this boasted discretion, of which so much had been said? Could the House, in this case, exercise its discretion, whether or no a Convention should be called? Why not? Because the Constitution says it must call a Convention: and does not the Constitution say, "Treaties made by the PRESIDENT and Senate are laws, and that laws must be obeyed?" The same injunctions of the Constitution are imposed in both cases; and as in the first, all this House could do, would be to regulate the time and place of holding the Convention, so, in the latter, their discretion would be limited to the mode, and fund, and other details. The gentleman had mentioned the article in the Constitution respecting appropriations for military services—they were to be limited to two years; this article proved itself that appropriations might be unlimited in every other case. When a Military Establishment was instituted, it was known that an appropriation law for that purpose could not be in force more than two years; no inconveniences, then, could result. But there was no such limitation in respect to any other branch of expenditure; from custom, appropriations for the support of Government were annual; appropriations even for pensions were annual, and yet no one doubted that, as the pension was a contract, the appropriation for it was always a thing of course; no discretion could be exercised, in respect to the payment, without a breach of faith.

The gentleman from Virginia had said, that this House might repeal a law by withholding the necessary appropriation. But this was a new doctrine; he had always understood it to be a fundamental principle in legislation, that it requires the same power to repeal a law, as to make one; to say that one branch could, by refusing to act, repeal a law which had received the sanction of the three, was a solecism in Government; as well might it be said, that the refusal of an officer to execute, or of a citizen to obey, a law, would be a repeal of such law. Much had been said of the power of this House, in originating money bills; this House alone, it was true, could, by the Constitution, originate bills for raising revenue, but the Senate could originate bills for appropriating money; the necessary appropriations for carrying the Treaty into effect may originate in the Senate as well as in this House; the Senate may alter or reject any appropriation bill which does not contain such appropriations as they may deem necessary for the public service. From the observations of some gentlemen, it would be supposed that this House had a general censorship over all the other parts of the Government, and an exclusive control over all their proceedings; but this control was reciprocal; this House was only a part of the Legislative power, and possessed none of the Executive. In Great Britain, the House of Lords could not alter in the least any bill, even for appropriating moneys; he could not see with what view the practice of that country had been resorted to, for there was not the smallest analogy between the two countries in this respect. A gentleman had said, that we might repeal a Treaty by law; but other gentlemen on that side of the question had been of a contrary opinion; the fact was, that a Treaty could only be annulled by the consent of the contracting parties, by a breach of faith, or by war. It had been admitted, that the PRESIDENT was justifiable in issuing his proclamation respecting the Treaty, because a part of the Treaty was binding; but what that part was, gentlemen had not been pleased to designate; the citizens were, therefore, left to disobey it at their peril; the PRESIDENT had made no such distinction; he had proclaimed the whole instrument as a binding compact; the public are now, however, told, that a part of it remained to be sanctioned by Congress. This novel doctrine was, that certain parts had no binding force till acts of Congress were passed, giving them efficacy; but even here gentlemen were not agreed among themselves what those parts were. Their idea of making parts of the Treaty over again by act of Congress was a very extraordinary one indeed; it involved a curious inconsistency, he had almost said, an absurdity. By the Constitution the PRESIDENT negotiates a Treaty, and lays it before the Senate, two-thirds of which approve. By the Constitution, a law is made by a majority of both Houses, and the approbation of the PRESIDENT, but two-thirds of both Houses may make a law, without the PRESIDENT. Thus, according to this new doctrine, a law, giving a binding force to a compact with a foreign Power, might be made without the intervention of the PRESIDENT, and yet, by the Constitution, the Treaty-making power is classed with the Executive powers, and is expressly delegated to the PRESIDENT and Senate. Again, two-thirds of the Senate must sanction a Treaty, but a majority may pass a law; hence, it would follow, that, after it had been necessary that two-thirds should, in the first instance, ratify a Treaty, a majority would be sufficient in the second instance to give validity to the instrument. Further, the PRESIDENT concludes the Treaty, submits it to the Senate, who approves, and then it is laid before the House for information; but, according to the new doctrine, the act giving validity to the Treaty must pursue an inverted course; it must be commenced in the House, go to the Senate, and from thence to the PRESIDENT. By adhering to the Constitutional distinction, all these inconveniences are avoided; the PRESIDENT and Senate made the compact; Congress are to execute it.

Mr. S. said, he would conclude his observations on this important subject, by recalling the recollection of the House to a law, which fully confirmed the doctrine he had contended for.

It must be remembered, that, in March, 1794, a law passed, laying a general embargo on all vessels. After the law had taken effect, and all vessels had been detained in pursuance of it, our Treaty with Sweden was construed by the Executive to exempt the vessels of that nation from the embargo; orders were accordingly issued to the Collectors to suffer them to depart; and they did depart, notwithstanding the act of Congress, which laid a general embargo, and under which those vessels had been detained. In that case, no law was deemed requisite to repeal the existing act, in respect to Swedish ships; the Executive alone construed the Treaty, and finding that, by Treaty, such vessels were not liable to embargo, ordered their release, although the act of Congress expressly included all foreign vessels; this circumstance was known at the time to Congress, and the conduct of the PRESIDENT considered as consistent with his duty. He saw no material distinction between this case and the question now in discussion; here was an act of the Executive, without the intervention of Congress, in relation to a commercial regulation, in which a Treaty was deemed paramount to an existing law; the only difference between the cases was, that the Treaty with Sweden was made under the Old Confederation: but that could not weaken the principle, for it would not be denied, that the present Constitution meant to give the PRESIDENT and Senate at least as much power in relation to Treaties, as had been possessed by Congress under the Old Government.

MARCH 11.—In Committee of the Whole, on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolution.

Mr. GILES said, he expected, when the present motion was made, that it would not be opposed. The expected agency of the House respecting the Treaty, or some subjects relating to it, made him imagine that the propriety of having the papers called for could not be denied. The Treaty has been referred to a Committee of the Whole, surely in order to act on it in some shape or other. Indeed, the PRESIDENT, in his Speech at the opening of the session, expressly says, that he will lay the subject before them. This he considered as full evidence, that the PRESIDENT conceived it must come under the notice of the House. If the papers could serve to explain any point relative to that instrument, surely the possession of them was desirable. He declared that he felt unfavorably towards the Treaty from the face of it; and that he believed the House had a right, and, if it was a right, it must also be their duty to oppose its execution by all the Constitutional means in their power as legislators, if they found it, upon mature deliberation, contrary to the interest of the people and the honor of the nation. He was sensible of the great responsibility which rested upon the House, and himself as a member of it, at the present important crisis. Under the weight of that responsibility, he felt it necessary to shape his conduct under the fullest information that could be obtained. But while he acknowledged the importance of the final issue of the present question, he should not be induced by the weight of responsibility to swerve from his opinion; but he wished to form that opinion on the best information, and on the most mature consideration. This was the general motive that weighed on his mind in favor of the proposed call.

Treaty with Great Britain.

The right of the House to the papers called for had not been denied by most of the gentlemen who opposed the present motion. They admit that the proposition, on the face of it, is not unconstitutional, if the House were about to exercise the powers in a Judicial capacity, to deliberate respecting an impeachment. The powers of the House, he insisted, did not vary with the different shapes they might constitutionally assume, whether they were exercising their functions as a Legislature or in a Judicial capacity. If the right to call for the papers was conceded to the House in one capacity, how could it be denied to them in another?

The right of the House to consider the expediency of Treaties, so far as the provisions of them clash with their specific powers, had been indirectly brought in in considering the present motion. He regretted that this important Constitutional question should be about to be decided indirectly; but, this being the situation of the debate, he should state his reasons why he conceived the argument on this ground ought not to be considered as of sufficient strength to cause a negative of the motion before the Committee.

The question is, whether there be any provisions in the Constitution by which this House can in any case check the Treaty-making power; and of consequence, whether it can question the merits of Treaties under any circumstances?

Various considerations had been advanced to show that the House cannot question the merits of a Treaty. Some of these considerations had grown out of the subject extrinsically, others from the provisions of the Constitution. Though at first he had intended to have stated simply his own opinion of the Constitution on the important question now in view, yet, as gentlemen had gone fully into the question in that shape, and others had stated a variety of objections to the construction the friends of the motion contended for, he should proceed to answer them, and suffer his opinion of the meaning of the Constitution to be incidental.

The gentleman from South Carolina had referred to the opinions of the Conventions of the States at the time of adopting the Constitution. As to Virginia, the gentleman had stated that that State had considered the checks as provided by the Constitution as inadequate, and proposed an amendment, purporting to require two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, instead of two-thirds of the number present. This was true, he believed; but how would it apply in the sense the gentleman wished? The objection of that State was, that the check in the Senate, provided in the Treaty-making power, was not sufficient, and they proposed a greater: from which he would argue that they conceived the Treaty-making power to be a subject of extreme delicacy, and that they wished additional checks consequently added. How this was to prove that the Convention of Virginia did not construe the present clauses of the Constitution under debate as the friends of the present motion did, he was at a loss to determine. The gentleman who cited this instance had not quoted any part of the proceedings on the subject, or of the reasons that led to the amendment. He had merely mentioned the result to the House. That gentleman had next professed to take a view of the opinions of the citizens of the United States antecedent to the present discussion, and posterior to the adoption of the Constitution. He had mentioned one case, viz: the meeting of the people of New York, who assembled to petition the PRESIDENT not to give his sanction to the pending Treaty, and exhorting him to refuse it, as, if it obtained his sanction, it could not be got rid of except by a war. Mr. G. remarked, he did not expect to hear that member quote the proceedings of town-meetings as a rule for the conduct of the House. Such assemblages of the people had often been the theme of merriment, and always objects of contempt with that gentleman, so that he did not conceive how their proceedings could have any weight on the opinions of the members.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed, that on the present question he had said nothing against the propriety of town-meetings.

Mr. GILES allowed that on the present occasion the gentleman had not repeated his sentiments respecting those meetings. For his own part, he was always ready to acknowledge that the result of those assemblies of the people for the expression of their opinions, had a weight on his mind; but he might be permitted to ask that gentleman why, since he placed no faith on that source of information, he brought any thing said at such meetings into the view of the House? If the gentleman admitted the sense of those meetings as the orthodox explanation of the doubtful parts of the Constitution,

H. of R.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

and as the expression of the public will, he would not, he hoped, consider it as out of order when any question should arise, to hear the proceedings of those meetings cited as an exposition of the public will.

But, in the present instance, he conceived the member unfortunate in his quotation. The meeting wished to persuade the PRESIDENT not to sign, and they used the strongest expressions they could think of to convince him of the impropriety of putting his hand to the fatal instrument. The meeting was not assembled for the purpose of expounding the Constitution: they met to give weight to an application made to the proper authority to beg that the Treaty might be crushed in that state of the business. But to take the gentleman's own rule of construction, it will be found that when their petitions to the PRESIDENT were of no effect, they then addressed this House as their dernier resort. If these popular proceedings were to be considered as an expression of public opinion, he would say that the petitions on the table of the House were more numerous than he had ever known them on any question whatever. From these petitions it will be found that the people had recognized the power of the House to interfere, and begged them not to abandon their rights.

The next subject the member from South Carolina touched upon was, the late amendments proposed to the Constitution by the State of Virginia. He deduced, from one of these amendments, that the Legislature of that State did not conceive the power of the House to extend to matters of Treaty. This he did not believe a fair deduction. It is not contended that there are words in the Constitution expressly giving this participation in controlling Treaties to the House, it is only contended for as growing out of the specific powers vested in Congress. The object of the State of Virginia was then to exchange a construction that might be disputed for an expression not to be doubted. It was unnecessary for the gentleman from South Carolina to remind the State of Virginia of the fate of their propositions in the Legislatures of the several States. Virginia, he hoped, would pursue uniformly the line of conduct that had marked her political character, under whatever circumstances she might happen to be placed. Her conduct had been uniform from the Declaration of Independence to the present day; uniform and exemplary in their obedience to the laws, and in their activity against encroachments; and, notwithstanding the fate of her proposed amendments, he prided himself in representing a State that never offered the slightest mark of disrespect to a sister State for differing with her in opinion. If Virginia had been the cause of some indelicacies on the part of other States, she is the innocent cause. They had exercised a Constitutional right which they conceived it their duty to exercise, and they could not be responsible for any indelicacies to which that conduct might have given rise.

The practice of the House had been referred to yesterday by the member last up, [Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.] He had remarked that the House had passed a general resolution directing the Clerk to place in the code of laws of the United States Treaties made under the authority of the United States. Was this, he asked, an exposition of the meaning of the Constitution? He believed the resolution a very proper one, and would vote now for its adoption if it was yet to be passed. It is certainly proper, when a Treaty is concluded under the authority of the United States, that it should be annexed to their code of laws; but this could not weigh against the exercise of discretion in the House on important Legislative subjects.

The practice of the House, with respect to appropriation laws, in the cases of Indian Treaties, had been mentioned by the member from South Carolina. In the first place, in observing upon this, he would remark, that he always conceived there was a distinction between an Indian Treaty and a Treaty with a foreign nation. The English had always made a distinction when we were Colonies. The Constitution establishes an express difference. He should not, however, found his objections to the inference of the gentleman upon this, but would examine it unconnected with this distinction. Provisions had been made by this House to carry Indian Treaties into effect; but why? No doubt because the House conceived it wise so to do, not because they had not a right to use their discretion in the business. Suppose, on any of those occasions, a motion had been made to strike out the sum proposed to be appropriated, would it have been said that the motion was out of order? A similar motion was made lately with respect to the Mint, and it was not considered as out of order. If, on that occasion, it had been the opinion of the House that the Mint was an improper establishment, by refusing the appropriation they could have defeated the law. It was certainly the opinion of the House that they could exercise their discretion in the business, for it was not even hinted that the motion for striking out was out of order.

On another head the gentleman appeared to plume himself much. He had asked, why, since the PRESIDENT had proclaimed a Treaty as the law of the land, which was not the law of the land, why he was not impeached? This question, the member exultingly remarked, had not been answered, because, he imagined, it could not be answered.

Suppose I should tell the gentleman, said Mr. G., that I could not now give him an answer, would it show that the House had not the authority contended for by the friends of the present motion? Why was the subject mentioned? Not with a view, I believe, to the discovery of the truth. I fear it is calculated to produce an opposite effect—to check investigation. It is too often the case that the names of persons are brought into view, not to promote the development of principles, but as having a tendency to destroy freedom of inquiry. I will go further with the gentleman, and admit for a moment (a position, however, I shall by and by controvert) that the PRESIDENT conceived that he had a right, after the exchange of ratifications, to promulgate the Treaty as the supreme law of the land; what would this amount to? Why, only that this was his opinion; but is that authority here? In any other case rather than the present, I should be inclined to pay a greater respect to opinions from that source; but now, when the question is about the division of powers between two departments, are we to be told of the opinions of one of those departments, to show that the other has no right to the exercise of power in the case. Such appeals are not calculated to convince, but to alarm.

Treaty with Great Britain.

He acknowledged that the PRESIDENT's Proclamation differed from what he expected it would have been; because the PRESIDENT had expressly said in his Speech at the opening of the session, that he would lay the subject of the Treaty before the House; and not, he supposed, for their opinions only, but for their agency. He believed, however, the Proclamation was issued in its present form with the best intentions; but the authority for the opinions on which it was founded would not, he said, prevent him from exercising his own. Opinion, said Mr. G., is sometimes repulsive. When it is pressed too closely, resistance and reaction, not favorable to the investigation of truth, are the consequence. The whole argument of the gentleman on this ground, then, proves nothing, and is attended with this ill effect—to check the discovery of truth. But he hoped the House would seek within themselves for opinions, and not travel for them to other departments of the Government. He had said, however, that it was his belief that it was not probable the PRESIDENT viewed the Treaty as the supreme law of the land before it had been submitted for Legislative decision; and this belief was grounded on the intentions which the PRESIDENT expressed in his Speech of laying the subject before the House.

Having examined the objections to the construction contended for by the friends of the motion, drawn from collateral sources, he should turn his attention next, he said, to the intrinsic meaning of the Constitution. He would attempt to interpret the Constitution from the words of it. It was a misfortune the clauses were not more clear and explicit, so far as to force the same meaning upon every mind, however they might differ in opinion in other respects. However, from the imperfection of language, it was no wonder, he observed, that on an instrument providing for so many different objects, and providing such a variety of checks, various opinions as to construction should arise; but he considered the present clauses of as plain import as any part of the instrument. The construction contended for by the opposers of the motion is, beyond denial, the most dangerous in its effects, and the least probable, as he thought, in its meaning. It is contended by them that the Treaty-making power is undefined in its nature, unlimited as to its objects, and supreme in its operation; that the Treaty-making power embraces all the Legislative powers; operates by controlling all other authorities, and that it is unchecked. When he had asserted this power, as contended by the gentlemen to be unlimited in its objects, he meant, however, that they had confined it only within the limits of the Constitution; but even admitting it in that extent, is certainly a doctrine sufficiently alarming. When the gentlemen contend for its supremacy, they also admit in this point some qualifications; according to their doctrine, it is not to be supreme over the head of the Constitution, but in every other respect they contend that it shall be unlimited, supreme, undefined. Gentlemen who insist that Treaties are supreme, next to the Constitution, must also grant that there is no necessity for the House to trouble themselves with making laws.

It will be remarked, said Mr. G., by examining the history of man, that the people have always been desirous to check the exercise of power in the administrators, and as uniformly have administrators endeavored to evade those checks. The same among us. The American people, sensible of this, when they, after a fortunate struggle for their liberties, were about to exercise their discretion in the establishment of a Constitution that should secure their rights and liberties, formed a Government of checks. The Americans have the reputation of a sagacious people, and have showed their sagacity in framing this Constitution; but even if they had proved themselves more sagacious in devising checks, a correspondent sagacity would still have been found in the Government to evade them. Never, I will venture to say, was there an instance of a more complete rout of so complete a system of checks, within the term of six years, in any Government on earth; and if the doctrine now contended for be agreed to, then I do declare that the triumph of evasion of checks is complete indeed, and little will be left hereafter to be evaded.

The construction contended for by the friends of the resolution is derived from two sources—from the Constitution, and the nature of things. The Constitution says, the PRESIDENT, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators present, shall make Treaties. Perhaps, if there was no other clause, the Treaty-making power might be considered as unlimited. Another clause declares that the Constitution, the laws made under it, and Treaties, shall be the supreme law of the land. Here the gentlemen, when they quote this clause, stop, as if there were no other words in it; and from all this it would appear that the people had, in fact, delegated an unchecked power. But, if we go on, it will be found that the last-mentioned clause adds that the Judges in the respective States shall cause them to be executed, any thing in the Constitution or laws of the individual States to the contrary notwithstanding. From the jealousy which individual States showed under the old Confederation for the preservation of their powers, and the inconveniences which were experienced in consequence, it was found necessary, when organizing a new Government, to declare, explicitly, that their Constitutions and laws must yield to the Constitution, laws, and Treaties of the United States, and for this purpose this clause was introduced.

Gentlemen, after granting that the Constitution

H. OF R.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

is supreme when in opposition to Treaties, contend that Treaties are supreme over laws. They also admit that this is not warranted by the Constitution, but they contend that it is so from the nature of things. From the nature of things, he said, he should infer the reverse, though he disagreed in this from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALLATIN.] He contended that the Constitution and the acts of the Legislature annul Treaties, and that Treaties do not annul laws. This he should infer from the nature of Treaties and the nature of laws. Gentlemen said that Treaties could not be repealed, because they were made by two contracting parties. This sounds very well, but was ever such a thing heard of as a Convention to repeal a Treaty? If this had never been done by Convention, it is at least presumable that the admission to have done so heretofore renders this theory doubtful. The truth is, that the right of annulling Treaties is essential to national sovereignty; and nations have at all times taken their own measures respecting Treaties, under the common responsibility for the breach; but if such is the practice, as is contended for, it would be advisable in the present case. Perhaps, said Mr. G., if his gracious Majesty is once more saluted with an expression of our reliance on his magnanimity, and well known justice, &c., he may relieve us from the burden. If the epithets are reverberated on him, they might rid us of that dilemma which they had such an agency in producing.

Mr. G. contended, that this mode of repealing Treaties by Conventions was merely theory, and that no instance of the exercise of such a power could be met with in the history of nations, neither is the doctrine consonant to reason. The reason why a law should repeal a Treaty, is because the law is an expression of the will of the nation, through their Constitutional organ. He did not mean to say, that a Treaty is not binding as long as it is a law. But, if it is admitted that the House, in concurrence with the other branches, have the power of declaring war, then he would not say, that the Legislature were to repeal Treaties article by article, but certainly they may annul them. He would go farther, and suppose, by the instrument submitted to the House, an equalization of duties on foreign and domestic bottoms be provided for, to the injury of our carrying trade; suppose a law should then pass annulling the Treaty; gentlemen say this would lead to war; perhaps it might have the effect, but that is not now the question; the question of right is now in debate; suppose a law should pass repealing, by the concurrence of the proper authorities, the particular article, the existence of which he had supposed, the Treaty would be rendered pro tanto void. Suppose, he said, in the case of the present Treaty, that the Parliament of Great Britain refuse to carry it into complete effect, were we to enforce on Great Britain a compliance of its stipulations? Great Britain had at all events the right so to act, taking the consequences of her conduct upon herself. But gentlemen contend that a Treaty is irrevocable; and because a foreign Power is a party in the contract, not because it is the interest of the United States that it should be so.

Mr. G. then contended that, in proportion as an authority is undefined, in that proportion every check should be exercised. It is the height of folly to contend that the American people ever intended to give any authority an unlimited operation. If the Constitution be examined, it will be found grounded on a jealousy against all rulers; this is evident from the face of the instrument.

In the first place, it contains limitations to the aggregate powers of the Government. In the next place, it provides checks for the powers given up. These checks are at least of three kinds; the first is, that of a distribution of different species of authorities into distinct hands, as in the case of the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary; secondly, it requires a concurrence of different branches of the Government for the exercise of the same species of authority, as in the case of all Legislative subjects, the concurrence of the Senate and this House, to which is subjoined the qualified veto of the President; the third species consists of prohibitions upon the whole of the departments in the exercise of particular authorities intrusted to them, as in the case of a prohibition of an appropriation for the support of an Army for more than two years; the prohibition respecting exports under the power to regulate commerce, &c. So jealous has the Constitution been with respect to armies, that it also requires biennial elections for the purpose of enabling every new House to prevent the execution of a law for raising an Army by withholding the appropriations for its support. Whilst the Constitution was formed under this spirit of jealousy, it would have been wonderful that that power which is described to be unlimited in its objects, undefined in its nature, and paramount in its operation, should have been left unchecked; it would have been an evidence of the most egregious folly. The American people were incapable of it; accordingly checks are found in the Constitution, if it be fairly interpreted; and it is not very material whether these checks are in express words, or whether they result virtually from the distribution of the several powers. It is sufficient that they are efficacious.

The checks on the Treaty-making power he considered as divisible into two classes; the first, consists in the necessary concurrence of the House to give efficacy to Treaties; which concurrent power they derive from the enumeration of the Legislative powers of the House. Where the Treaty-making power is exercised, it must be under the reservation that its provisions, so far as they interfere with the specified powers delegated to Congress, must be so far submitted to the discretion of that Department of the Government. The President and Senate, by the Constitution, have the power of making Treaties, Congress the power of regulating commerce, raising armies, &c.; and these, he contended, must form so many exceptions to the general power. Gentlemen had said that the Constitution was the exposition of the will of the people, and as such, that they would

Treaty with Great Britain.

obey its injunctions. There could be no difference of opinion on this ground; for his own part, he confessed, if he adored anything on earth, it is that will. But the question is, what is that will, as expressed in the Constitution? That instrument, to his mind, explained this question very clearly. It enumerates certain powers which it declares specifically vested in Congress; and where is the danger to be apprehended from the doctrine laid down by the friends of the resolution? the contrary construction must produce the most pernicious consequences; agreeably to that, there would remain no check over the most unlimited power in the Government. The gentlemen contend, that the House must remain silent spectators in the business of a Treaty, and that they have no right to the exercise of an opinion in the matter; they must then abandon their Constitutional right of legislation; they must abandon the Constitution and cling to Treaties as supreme.

The other check over the Treaty-making power, he noticed, was the power of making appropriations, the exercise of which is specifically vested in Congress. He begged leave to call the particular attention of the Committee to this part of the subject. The Constitution says, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law. This is no doubt intended as a check in addition to those possessed by the House. It is meant to enable the House without the concurrence of the other branches, to check, by refusing money, any mischief in the operations carrying on in any department of the Government. But what is a law? It is a rule prescribed by competent authority. The word law in the clause of the Constitution he had last noticed, was not meant in reference to the Treaty-making power; but in reference to Congress. A law prescribes a rule of conduct; it is the expression of the will of the proper authority; it is the result of discretion. Legislation implies deliberation. If a law is the expression of the will, must not an appropriation law be equally so? But gentlemen had found out a new-fashioned exposition of the word discretion, and, according to their definition in fact, it was no discretion at all. They had mentioned a part of the Constitution which provides that the salaries of the Judicial department shall be fixed; and asked, whether the House should conceive itself at liberty to use a discretion in appropriations for that department? Before he could consider this case and that before the House now, parallel, he must beg gentlemen would point out any part of the Constitution that declared the House should not exercise their discretion when called upon to make appropriations to carry into effect a Treaty. He could find nowhere, that, in this case, the right of opinion of the House is constrained.

A member from South Carolina had given to discretion a negative meaning; and chose to conceive that the discretion contended for by the friends of the motion, was a discretion of whim and caprice; this was not the case. He had then attempted to combat the doctrine of discretion by a trite remark, indeed, that it never could be right to do wrong. He would answer him in a manner as trite, and say, that it never could be wrong to do right. But this proved nothing; still it is necessary to inquire and judge what was right and what wrong, and to do this, discretion must be exercised. So, in the present case, if it is right to carry the Treaty into effect, it would be wrong not to do it; and so, if it would be wrong to sanction it, it could not be right to agree to it. But this is to be determined by the exercise of a sound discretion. He owned he felt attached to the old-fashioned discretion, which consists in the faculty of choosing or refusing; he could not admit of the docile complying discretion, that gentleman contends for; he would call it a predestinated discretion. The effect of this new-fangled discretion would be, not to vote according to the conviction of one's own mind, but by that of another. A clause of the Constitution had been cited to support the definition of discretion advanced by the gentleman; that part which directs that Congress shall call a convention when a certain number of States require it. This surely could not apply to the doctrine advanced; there was, in that case, no room for the exercise of discretion; discretion is out of the question, and there is a positive obligation, under the binding force of an oath, to do a thing when required in a certain manner; in this matter, Congress are only to execute the injunction of the Constitution. Gentlemen had attempted to set up a new doctrine as to the operation of the moral sense; their moral sense was to be exercised by the PRESIDENT and Senate, and they were willing to abide by its operation in the breasts of those branches of the Government. He had always understood, for his own part, that an agent who had the right to be directed by his moral sense, must be a free agent.

There could be, he contended, no Legislative act without deliberation; the opinions which were to guide their decisions, must be matured by deliberation; they were not to decide upon predestinated impressions; but their conduct must rest on the operations of their own minds.

A gentleman from Connecticut had discarded all pretence to the exercise of discretion; he might have an opinion as a citizen, but would not have one on the present question as a legislator. This was a nice distinction, indeed; he could not, for his own part, abstract in this way the citizen from the legislator. He declared, he would not form an opinion; Mr. G. conceived it the duty of a legislator to exercise an opinion, and not shut his eyes against convictions, and not to receive them from extrinsic quarters. When the Constitution says, the Legislature shall enact laws, it implies that they must be the fruits of deliberation, and not in the nature of an Executive act.

The uniform practice of the British Government had been cited to have been, in the case of Treaties, the same as that contended for by the friends of the present motion. The greatest security for the liberties of the people established in that Government, depends on the control which their Parliament has over the purse-strings. In England, this power rests merely on custom; here, the House are expressly intrusted with it; what is custom in England, is reduced to writing in our Constitution. Then, if this power is in England a ground for Parliament to judge of Treaties, it is a fair inference that it ought to be exercised here. The practice of the British Government, he observed, had often been quoted here in support of doctrines very different from those in aid of which it is now cited; it has been deemed orthodox when it favored Executive prerogative. He confessed, he never did expect that, as early as 1796, a reference would be made to practices, under the British Government, in support of the rights of the popular branch of our Government. It was painful to be obliged to have resort to that Government on such an occasion; but the authority of that Government should not be rejected for once, because its practice could be quoted in favor of the popular branch. The ground of the practice in England, and of the right claimed here, rests upon the sound maxim, that all public money is from the pockets of the people, and that it should be expended by none but their Representatives. No maxim had been more instrumental than this, in preserving the remnants of British freedom; and thus early is the House called upon to abandon it here.

Since checks were so wholesome and efficacious, and the want of them so dangerous to the rights of the people, there could arise no evil consequence, and but little inconvenience, from a multiplicity. What would the doctrine lead to, which goes to the suppression of the check now contended for? That the PRESIDENT and Senate may, if they please, reduce the House to a formal and not an efficient branch of the Government.

Treaties are contended to be paramount to the laws; the PRESIDENT and Senate make these Treaties, and when made and proclaimed as the supreme law, there is a predestinated necessity in the House to make the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect. The danger of this doctrine, he said, could not be better exemplified, than by a reference to the circumstances that attended the late Treaty in its progress. Three years ago a difference took place between the different branches of Government, as to the policy that should obtain in reference to the conduct of one foreign nation. The House were unwilling to trust solely to the magnanimity of the King, and wished to make some exertions themselves for self-protection. With this view several measures were proposed, viz: commercial restrictions, non-importation, embargo, sequestration, or rather arrestation upon the ground of the status quo. One of the measures passed the House by a respectable majority, but was rejected in the Senate by the casting vote of the VICE PRESIDENT. The PRESIDENT appointed an Envoy Extraordinary, who entered into certain stipulations, which, being sanctioned by two-thirds of the Senate it is now contended, are to operate to the destruction of the powers specifically vested in the House.

If the above was a true statement, he said, and he did not see in what particular it could be contradicted, then the Executive had been exerted as a check upon the Legislative power, for the negotiation necessarily foreclosed any further Legislative proceedings. It did more than this; the Executive legislated against legislation, and overruled them on the subject in contest. He should not advert at this time, he said, to the collateral circumstances which attended this business, nor go further in detail; he wished only to remark generally on the dangerous operation of the doctrines contended for. Now, it is said, the House have nothing to do but to obey, to appropriate the necessary money, leaving all deliberation aside.

Three years ago there was a further difference of opinion between the branches of Government on another interesting question. One branch was disposed to have an increase of the Military Establishment; a proposition to this effect was brought into the House, and negatived. The Senate, notwithstanding, successively sent down two or three bills for an increase of the Military Establishment—they were as repeatedly negatived by the House. Here different views existed, but the doctrine of checks was liberally exercised, and he thought to a good purpose.

If the PRESIDENT, said Mr. GILES, can, by the assistance of a foreign Power, legislate against the rights of the House to legislate, and his proceedings are to be binding on the House, it necessarily destroys their right to the exercise of discretion. If he can by Treaty declare, that commerce shall not be regulated, that property shall not be sequestered, and that piracies shall be judged and punished as he thinks fit; if he is to exercise the unlimited Treaty-making power contended for, what security have we that he may not go further when the negotiations are renewed with Great Britain, agreeably to the stipulations of the present Treaty? What security have we that he will not agree with Great Britain, that if she will keep up an Army of ten thousand men in Canada, he will do the same here? How could such a stipulation be got over by the House, when they are told that in matters of Treaty they must not pretend to exercise their will, but must obey? How will this doctrine operate upon the power of appropriation? A Military Establishment may be instituted for twenty years, and as their moral sense is to prevent their withholding appropriations, they can have no power over its existence.

Gentlemen should pause, he said, and consider what would be the situation of the United States, under this doctrine, before they give it their sanction. What he had mentioned as a possible result of it, he observed, would bear more evidence of probability if the doctrine was established. Establish the doctrine, said Mr. G., and under its influence he thought there was a greater probability, at this day, of a stipulation for such an armament, than there was on the day the late Envoy was appointed, that such a Treaty as the present would have been the result of the negotiation. He took a retrospect of the circumstances attendant on that negotiation. When the Envoy was named, what were the expectations? Not that he was going to throw himself upon the magnanimity of the Monarch; but that he would obtain a redress of grievances, and provide for the future security of our neutral rights; but what redress or security does the issue of the embassy promise?

Gentlemen had gone so far as to declare, that an attempt to examine the merits of the Treaty was rebellion, was treason against the Constitution. What justifies these harsh epithets? Such assertions could only create ill-will, and could not tend to the investigation of truth. Another argument of the same nature had been used. It was said, that the attempt at exercising a control over the Treaty-making power was disorganizing the Government. He believed the contrary would be found to be the case: The doctrine advocated by the friends to the motion, only goes to claim a negative voice in the business of Treaty-making; whereas the doctrine of its opposers claims the exercise of a power, that would supersede the specific authority delegated to the Legislature in all cases whatever. How would even a rejection of the Treaty disorganize the Government? Suppose the House should vote the Treaty null, and the next day quietly pass a land bill; would not the bill go calmly through its different stages? There is no foundation for the imputation; it is mere clamor and noise, vox et præterea nihil. Checks have been exercised before, and have not produced these dreadful consequences. When the House attempted to suspend the intercourse between this country and Great Britain, they were checked by the Senate, the Treaty was the only evil consequence of this. The use of checks is destroyed when the doctrine of coalition among the different branches prevails. Such coalescing does not render the Government strong; the strength of such a Government as ours is in the confidence of the people. Then let each branch make a manly use of its delegated authority; they will retain that confidence and secure that strength.

He did not believe, however, that the American people could be enslaved by their Government: they were too well convinced of the efficacy of the system of checks to suffer their liberties to be filched from them for want of the exercise of them. He remarked, the House had not been told yet how the exercise of discretion in the business of the Treaty was to destroy the Government. Possibly the Treaty with Britain is to give it energy, and if it be defeated, then disorganization was to ensue. But is the Government of the United States so low as to require foreign aid for its support? If it is tottering thus early, it may want, ere long, new negotiations and new concessions to prop it.

This would be a dreadful dilemma, that the Government should not possess efficacy enough in itself, but must lean on Great Britain for support. This would be a great reflection on the Government, and the conclusion to be drawn would be, that the confidence of the people had been misplaced. He believed the Government a Government of checks; that it was not intended the energy of the Executive was to be increased by a coalition or subordination of departments, and propped by a foreign Power.

He concluded by observing, that the interpretation of the Treaty clauses of the Constitution, as expounded by the gentlemen, would lead to a despotism of the worst kind. And if they were to plunge the nation headlong into the evils that must result from the establishment of the doctrines contended for by the empty sounds of war and disorganization, he should then lament the weakness—he should then, and not till then, distrust the discretion of the House.

Mr. G. said, that before he concluded he could not help remarking, that the terms of war and disorganization had been often applied to himself, and others, who generally associated with him in political opinions; that he had at all times beheld those groundless calumnies with contempt; that he disdained them, and had never condescended to any explanation. He remarked, that he was not in the habit of making professions; he knew that his conduct was the criterion by which he ultimately would, and ought to be, judged; and to that, with pleasure, he made his appeal for his justification.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that, after the length of time which had been consumed, and the talents which had been so ably exerted in the discussion of this subject, he should not think himself authorized to call the attention of the Committee to any observations of his; but, that he considered it in principle, and in its consequences, as the most important question which had ever been debated in this House. It was no less than whether this House should, by construction and implication, extend its controlling influence to subjects which were expressly, and he thought exclusively, delegated by the people to another department of the Government. We had heretofore been warned emphatically against seizing on power by construction and implication. He had known no instance in which the caution that warning enforced, deserved more attention than on the present occasion.

It must, he said, have been foreseen by the author of the motion, that it would ultimately be contested on the present ground. No sufficient reason had been given as an object for the call. The various reasons which had been hinted at had hardly been suggested before they were respectively abandoned. It would be remembered, and indeed had been avowed, that a request, such as the present, was in nature of a demand. It was true, if we had authority on the subject of forming Treaties, we had a right to all the means of exercising an intelligent discretion; and the demand, of course, was well founded. But, if we had no such authority, and we had none, unless it could be discovered in the Constitution, then the demand had no good foundation on which it could rest, and was, in his opinion, an attempt at seizing on power by usurpation.

He was perfectly sensible in how disagreeable an attitude a man would stand, who should attempt to limit the extent of power claimed by an assembly to which he should address himself. He had some of the most powerful inclinations of human nature to contend with. He felt the full force of the influence of this principle, as it would afford the cause of repulsion and resistance to the arguments which he might submit: But having formed an opinion, perfectly satisfactory to his own mind, from the best light which honest investigation could procure, he thought it a duty he owed his country and posterity—a duty rendered more indispensable from the obligations which were upon him—to obey the will of the people expressed in the Constitution of their Government, which he had sworn to support, solemnly to declare that opinion, and the reasons on which it was founded.

Treaty with Great Britain.

He, in his conscience, believed, that if the Constitution could operate the benefits its original institution intended—that if the Government should be rendered adequate to the protection of liberty, and the security of the people, it must be by keeping the several departments distinct, and within their prescribed limits. Hence, that man would give as good evidence of Republicanism, of virtue, of sincere love of country, who should defend the Executive in the exercise of his Constitutional rights, as the man who should contend for any other department of Government. If either should usurp the appropriate powers of another, anarchy, confusion, or despotism, must ensue: the functions of the usurping power would not be legitimate, but their exercise despotism. If the power of controlling Treaties was not in the House, the same spirit which might usurp it might also declare the existence of the House perpetual, and fill the vacancies as they should occur. The merits of the present question, it seemed to be agreed, depended on this right; it was of infinite importance, therefore, to decide it justly.

It would be taken for granted, and it would be conceded on all hands, that we were to resort to the Constitution, to know the extent and limits of our power, and if we found not there a clear evidence of its existence, we ought to abandon the exercise. It was certain we had not any express delegation to make or to control the public will in any of our relations with foreign nations. On the other hand, we found it declared, that the PRESIDENT should have power to make Treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concurred. Treaties, to attain the ends for which they were designed, were, from their nature, supreme laws; but the Constitution had, in another place, declared, Treaties made under the authority of the United States should be supreme laws. Gentlemen had said, that it was not declared that Treaties made by the PRESIDENT and Senate should have this effect; but those made under the authority of the United States. The question then recurred, what Treaties were made under the authority of the United States? The true answer undoubtedly was, Treaties made by those to whom the people, by their Constitution, had delegated the power. The PRESIDENT, qualified as had been mentioned, had expressly, and none else had such power. If we were to rest the subject here, it would seem to follow irresistibly, and to be incapable almost of higher proof, that whenever a compact was formed by the PRESIDENT with a foreign nation, and had received the advice and consent of the Senate, if it was of such a nature as to be properly denominated a Treaty, all its stipulations would thereby, and from that moment, become “supreme laws.”

That such had been the construction from the commencement of the Government to the promulgation of the British Treaty, he believed would be universally admitted; and but for that Treaty, probably never would have been denied. Did this afford no evidence that the construction was a just one? Was the subject a less important one, its decision might be safely trusted on this ground. But all-important, as it was, for the purpose of further investigation it might be useful to consider the nature, extent, objects, and effects of this power.

What authority was then delegated under a grant of power to form Treaties? Did not the term Treaties include all stipulations between independent nations relative to subjects in which the contracting parties have a mutual or common interest? If it had a more confined or limited sense, it became those who contended for it, to mark the limits and designate the boundaries. Without a power so extensive, much of the benefit resulting from amicable intercourse between independent nations would be lost; and disputes and differences, which are inevitable, would have no means of amicable termination. From the obvious utility, and indeed the absolute necessity, that such a power should be exercised, we know of no civilized nation, either ancient or modern, which had not provided the organs of negotiation to the extent, substantially, which he had mentioned. The power indispensable had always been delegated, though guards had been provided against its abuse by different means.

It was now to be inquired, whether the power of treating was wisely deposited, although he was inclined to believe it could not be intrusted to safer hands. It was sufficient, that those who had the right, the citizens of America, had declared their will, which we were bound to respect, because we had sworn to support it, and because we were their deputies.

The power of treating between independent nations might be classed under the following heads: 1. To compose and adjust differences, whether to terminate or to prevent war. 2. To form contracts for mutual security or defence; or to make Treaties, offensive or defensive. 3. To regulate an intercourse for mutual benefit, or to form Treaties of commerce. Without the first, war and contention could only be terminated by the destruction of one of the parties; without the second, there could be no defence, by means of union and concert, against superior force; and without the last, a profitable and beneficial intercourse could not be arranged on terms of reciprocity. Hence, then, it must be evident to every unprejudiced mind, that by a grant of power to make Treaties, authority was given to bind the nation by stipulations; to preserve peace or terminate war; to enter into alliances, offensive and defensive, and to form commercial Treaties.

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

This power, he held unlimited by the Constitution, and he held too, that in its nature, to the extent he had mentioned, it was illimitable. Did a serious difference exist with a foreign nation, in determining on the nature and extent of the stipulations which might be necessary to adjust it, the cause of injury, national rights and honor, the evils of war, and all circumstances of relation between the two countries, must be taken into account. In forming alliances, the threatened pressure, your own and your enemy's relative strength, the objects of acquisition or defence, must be considered. And, in adjusting an equitable intercourse for commercial purposes, a thousand circumstances present themselves for nice calculations. A thousand circumstances of foreign relations would occur in the history of every country, under which nothing short of unlimited powers of negotiation would be adequate to a prevention of enormous, perhaps ruinous evils.

But it might be objected, that a power so enormous, and comprehending such essential interests, might be abused, and thence asked, where is the remedy? To this he answered, that a national association required, for the great purpose of preservation, an unlimited confidence on many subjects. Hence, not only this, but perhaps every other national Government, had delegated to it an unlimited control over the persons and property of the nation.

It might, by the express power given to it of raising armies, convert every citizen into a soldier, and, by a single assessment of a tax, it might command the use of all the property in the country.

The power to raise armies and taxes was limited in its exercise by nothing but the discretion of the Legislature, under the direction of its prudence, wisdom, and virtue. Was there no security against the wanton abuse of these enormous powers? Yes, it was to be hoped that the people, in electing the members of this House, and the States in choosing those of the other, would not select characters who, regardless of the public good, would wantonly impose on their constituents unnecessary burdens. It would be an additional security, that the interests of the rulers were inseparably connected with those of the people; that they could impose no burdens in which themselves did not equally participate. But, should all these guards be insufficient, was there no dependence to be placed in the PRESIDENT?—the man elected by a refined process, pre-eminent in fame and virtue, as in rank! Was there no security in the watchful guardianship of such a character? Responsible by everything dear and valuable to man—his reputation, his own and his fellow-citizens' happiness—was there no well-founded reliance on all these considerations, for security against oppression? If not, we had not the requisite materials by which to administer a Republican Government, and the project might be abandoned. After all, however, should the unlimited powers he had mentioned (and such powers must always be unlimited) be wantonly abused, was there no remedy? Yes, in the good sense and manly independent spirit of the people.

If intolerable burdens were wantonly imposed; if necessary to defeat the oppression, opposition and insurrection would not only be authorized, but become a duty. And if any man could honestly lay his hand on his heart, and in sincerity declare, that a compliance with any existing Treaty was worth more than our Government, our Constitution, our Union, and the liberty protected by them; to that man he was ready to declare, that opposition had become a duty. But, in every instance of opposition, whether in defeat of a Legislative act, or of a Treaty, the right of resistance resulted not from the Constitution itself, for it had declared no such right; no Constitution could declare it. It existed in original principles, and never could be exercised but by resorting to them.

Gentlemen had spoken of the subject as if the members of this House were the only Representatives of the people, as their only protectors against the usurpations and oppressions of the other departments of the Government. Who then, he asked, were the Senators? Were they unfeeling tyrants, whose interests were separated from and opposed to those of the people? No. Did they possess hereditary powers and honors? No. Who, as contemplated by the Constitution, were they? The most enlightened and the most virtuous of our citizens. What was the source from whence they derived their elevation? From the confidence of the people, and the free choice of their electors. Who were those electors? Not an ignorant herd, who could be cajoled, flattered, and deceived—not even the body of enlightened American citizens; but their legislators, men to whom the real characters of their candidates would be known. They did not possess their seats in consequence of influence obtained by cajoling and deceit, practised in obscure corners, where the means of detection were difficult, if not impracticable; but they were selected from the most conspicuous theatres, where their characters could be viewed under every aspect, and by those most capable of distinguishing the true from the false. For what purposes were they elected? To represent the most essential interests of their country; as the guardians of the sovereignty of the States, the happiness of the people, and their liberties. Who, as contemplated by the Constitution, was the PRESIDENT? The man elected, by means intended to exclude the operation of faction and ambition, as the one best entitled to public confidence and esteem. And was no confidence to be reposed in such characters, thus elected? Might it not, to say no more, be at least doubtful, whether the treating power might not be as safely intrusted in such hands exclusively, as with the participation and under the control of the more numerous branch of the Legislature, elected in small districts, assailed by party and faction, and exposed to foreign influence and intrigue? Whatever merits this, as an original question, might possess, the people had decided their will. To the PRESIDENT and Senate they had given powers to make Treaties; they had given no such powers to the House.

Treaty with Great Britain.

It was not, in his opinion, proper, when investigating the Constitutional question of the extent of a particular power, and in what hands it was deposited, to divert the attention to a possible abuse of that power. Should it become a question whether Congress was by the Constitution authorized to raise armies, and the extent to which the power might be exercised, it would be unfair and improper to divert the attention from the inquiry of what was the truth, to the abuses which might result from the exercise of the power. To state that if such power existed, every citizen might, by the wanton abuse of it, be degraded from his rank, and subjected to the despotism of military discipline: To show that armies might be employed as the instruments of destroying liberty: To picture your country as strewn with human carcasses, and stained with human blood by their means. What would this be but to substitute prejudices instead of arguments? Still, however, it would remain true, that there should be some means of calling forth the whole force of the community for its security and defence. It would still remain true, that the power of Congress to raise armies was only limited by its discretion, under the direction of wisdom and patriotism. The same observations, changing their relations, might with equal justness be applied to the Treaty-making power. To be, and to continue a nation, required, on these subjects, unlimited confidence in the delegation of the necessary powers. The people had granted them, and provided against their abuse such guards as their wisdom dictated.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] had stated five different constructions which possibly might be given to the Constitution on this subject. Three of which, and for none of them to Mr. S.'s knowledge had any man ever contended, the gentleman had proved to be unfounded. The fourth, that which he had given to the Constitution, if admitted, and it should be abused, might produce mischievous effects. Was not this true of all the great and essential powers of Government? If the controlling influence of this House was added, would the power be less? And if, under these circumstances, abused, would the injury be more tolerable? In short, was not this a kind of argument infinitely more tending to the production of prejudice, than to the discovery of truth?

The gentleman has really given no decisive opinion what was the true construction. He had, however, seemed to incline to a belief that to the stipulations of a Treaty relative to any subject committed to the control of the Legislature, to give them validity, Legislative co-operation was necessary. Of consequence, if this was withheld, the operation of the Treaty would be defeated. That it was at the will, and within the discretion, of the Legislature, to withhold such co-operation, and of course the House might control and defeat the solemn engagements of the PRESIDENT and Senate.

The gentleman who had suggested this opinion was well known to the Committee, and throughout America. Mr. S. could not but observe that it was perfectly unaccountable to his mind, that that gentleman had yet to form an opinion to whom was delegated that power, the nature, extent, and effects of which he had so strongly and perspicuously detailed. The capacity of that gentleman's mind, long exercised on political subjects; his known caution and prudence, would authorize a request that he or his friends would explain how it was possible, if such as he states should have been the intention of those who framed the Constitution, that the true meaning should not have been expressed in the instrument? That when the gentleman went from the Assembly which framed the Constitution, immediately afterwards, to one of those which ratified it, he should have admitted an opposite construction? As Mr. S. would undertake, by and by, to prove that, in the Convention of Virginia, he did admit the very construction for which we now contended. He would take the liberty further to inquire, how it happened, that, if such was really the intention of the instrument, that such was the meaning of the people, no man had heard of it until the discovery was produced by the British Treaty? Strange national intention, unknown for years to every individual!

As the gentleman had been pleased to dwell on the idea of a co-operation between the powers of the Government, he would take the liberty to state, what had been ably explained by other gentlemen, that the power of making Treaties was wholly different from that of making ordinary laws; originating from different motives; producing different effects, and operating to a different extent. In all those particulars, the difference had been perfectly understood. For instance, the ordinary legal protection of property, and the punishment of its violation, could never be extended beyond your own jurisdiction; but, by Treaty, the same protection could be extended within the jurisdiction of a foreign Government. You could not legislate an adjustment of disputes, nor a peace with another country; but, by Treaty, both might be effected. Your laws, in no instance, could operate except in your own jurisdiction, and on your own citizens. By Treaty, an operation was given to stipulations within the jurisdiction of both the contracting parties.

It had been said that Treaties could not operate on those subjects which were consigned to Legislative control. If this be true, said he, how impotent in this respect is the power of the Government! What, then, permit me to inquire, can the power of treating effect? I will tell you what it cannot do; it can make no alliances, because any stipulation for offensive or defensive operations will infringe on the Legislative power of declaring war, laying taxes, or raising armies, or all of them. No Treaty of Peace can probably be made, which will not either ascertain boundaries, stipulate privileges to aliens, the payment of money, or a cession of a territory, and certainly no Treaty of Commerce can be made.

Was it not strange, that, to this late hour, it should have been delayed, and that now, all at once, it should have been discovered, that no power was delegated to any person to regulate our foreign relations? That, although a power was granted to the PRESIDENT and Senate to form Treaties, that yet there were such reservations and restrictions, that there remained nothing on which this power could operate? Or was it true, that this power was competent to treat with every Government on earth but that of Great Britain? Might he not be permitted further to inquire, if this Treaty had been formed with any other Power, with the precise stipulations it now contained whether there ever would have existed this doubt of constitutionality.

We had, he said, entered into Treaties of Commerce with many nations; we had formed an alliance, and entered into a guarantee with France; we had given Consular power, including judicial authority to the citizens of that country within our own jurisdiction; we had defined piracies, and provided for their punishment; we had removed the disabilities of alienage; we had granted subsidies, and ceded territory. All this, and much more, we had done, while the powers of the Government remained unquestioned, and none even thought that they required Legislative co-operation. Treaties, such as those, could, without opposition, and by unanimous consent, be ratified, and considered by force of such ratification, as supreme laws; but similar stipulations with Great Britain were clearly perceived to be unconstitutional, and PRESIDENT, Envoy, and Senate, were denounced for their respective agency, as infractors of the Constitution.

The objection, which he had just answered, had been brought forward by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALLATIN,] with another nearly allied to it, if not resting on precisely the same foundation; that whatever stipulation in a Treaty required Legislative provision, or repealed a law, did not become a supreme law until it had received Legislative sanction. There was no limitation expressed in the Constitution on which to found either of those objections. If we claimed the power which the objections imported, the claim must rest on construction and implication alone. Indeed, the whole reasoning of all the gentlemen seemed to him to be capable of being expressed in a few words: The PRESIDENT and Senate, in the sole and uncontrolled exercise of the Treaty-making power, may sacrifice the most important interests of the people. The House of Representatives is more worthy the public confidence; and therefore, by our influence, we will prevent the abuse of power.

The gentleman, to prove his position, stated, that the power of treating in Great Britain and the United States is precisely the same. He then read a passage from Judge Blackstone, "that the sovereign power of treating with foreign nations was vested in the person of the King, and that any contract he engaged in, no power in the Kingdom could delay, resist, or annul." At the same time, he said, that certain Treaties, such as those of subsidy and commerce, were not binding until ratified by Parliament. Now, both these could not be true; for it was no less than a direct contradiction in terms, to say, that there was no power in the nation which could delay, resist, or annul the contracts of the King, and at the same time to say, there was a power in the nation, the Parliament, which could delay, resist, and annul those contracts. Both the assertions could not be true. He was willing, however, to allow that the Treaties which the gentleman had mentioned, were not the supreme laws of that country, until approved by the Legislature. He had already said, that different countries had provided different guards against the abuse of this power. But why attempt to divert our attention from a construction of our own Constitution, to the vague uncertain customs and practices of other countries? Why compare the PRESIDENT and Senate to the King of Great Britain? In what was there a resemblance? In nothing. Why, then, perplex the subject by the introduction of irrelative matter? Was there perceived an interest in a diversion from the only legitimate source of information, the declared will of the people? If we found not there the power we claimed, we could exercise it only by usurpation.

Why did not gentlemen extend their reasoning further? Where, in point of principle, was the difference between restraining and controlling the Legislative power? The injury may be as great in the one instance as in the other; nor is there any more foundation for denying to the PRESIDENT and Senate the power in the one case than in the other, from any words or expressions in the Constitution.

If the gentlemen are right in their construction, if this was the understanding of the people at the time they deliberated on and ratified the Constitution, the power of the PRESIDENT and Senate of making Treaties which then created the most serious deliberation and alarming apprehensions, was the most innocent thing in nature. It could bind the essential interests of the nation in nothing. Could any man really believe that the agitation which a discussion of this subject occasioned, more, perhaps, than any other in the Constitution, could have for its object only the power of the PRESIDENT and Senate, in which two-thirds of the latter must concur, to digest schemes of Treaties to be laid before the Legislature for its approbation?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVENS] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] had asserted the power of the Legislature to repeal Treaties; whenever the wisdom of Congress should concur in opinion with those gentlemen, we should then cease to contend respecting the construction of the Constitution on this subject. For whenever our nation should, in defiance of every principle of morality and common honesty, by its practice, establish its right to prostrate national honor, by sporting with the public faith, no nation would submit to be contaminated by a connexion with one which avowed the right of violating its faith by the infraction of solemn Treaties.

On all subjects of this sort, the real inquiry was

Treaty with Great Britain.

and ought to be, what was the intention of the parties to this instrument? Hence a brief view of some interesting occurrences, which took place at the adoption of the Government, would not be impertinent, but might be useful.

A contemporaneous exposition of any instrument, and especially by those who were agents in its fabrication, had been allowed, and was, in fact, among the best guides to finding its true meaning. Gentlemen who had been members of the Convention, and unfriendly to the Constitution, with an intention of preventing its adoption, had stated to their constituents that the power of making Treaties, as confided to the PRESIDENT and Senate, was as extensive as was now contended for. Their intention could have been no other than to alarm the people with the dangerous extent, and what would be the pernicious exercise of this power. If this charge was unjust and groundless, what would have been the conduct of the friends of that instrument? They would have proved the charge to have been malicious and ill-founded. They would have shown that the Constitution was not liable to such an objection; that it could bear no such construction. They would, in the language of novel discovery, have said, that every subject of Legislation was an exception from the power of making Treaties; and thus they would have proved to the world, that the sages of our country had devised and offered to their enlightened countrymen a scheme of Government, destitute, by an express delegation, of the essential attribute of adjusting differences with other nations, and of agreeing with them on the terms of amicable intercourse. But they did no such thing; they admitted the power, proved the necessity of it, and contended that it would be safe in practice. Let me here, said he, appeal to any unprejudiced man, if he can possibly believe that the enemies of the Constitution could have made the charge against it, and that its friends would have admitted the truth of it, on the hypothesis that it was unfounded and false? They certainly knew what they had so recently intended, and having opposite objects in view, which excited their strongest wishes, it was impossible they should agree in imposing on the people a false and unwarrantable construction. So far he had extended his reflections as resulting from the conduct of those who formed the Constitution; a conduct from which he flattered himself, there flowed demonstration that the power of making Treaties was as extensive as was that which was now contended for. This being the concurrence of men who could not have united to deceive, with regard to which it was impossible they should be mistaken, formed a guide for our opinion, which could not mislead, which no degree of stupidity could mistake, nor the most ingenious sophistry successfully misrepresent.

So much he had thought proper to say, as respected the construction given to this part of the instrument by those who formed, who could not mistake, and who were under no temptation to misrepresent it. It might be necessary, in the next place, to inquire under what opinions it was adopted; and if we perceived a correspondence of construction between those who formed and those who received and approved, we might then surely derive all reasonable satisfaction that we had discovered the truth. Here he believed that it might be asserted, without any danger of contradiction, that in the State Conventions it was, on one hand, affirmed that the PRESIDENT and Senate would, by the Constitution, have power to form Treaties on any subject in which the United States and a foreign nation had a common interest; and that Treaties so formed without any other aid or circumstance whatever, would thereby become the supreme law of the land; and that the exercise of this power was not so guarded as to render it safe to the public interests. On the other hand, it was admitted that such was the extent of the power, and it was attempted, at least, to be proved that it was so guarded that danger could not reasonably be apprehended from its exercise. It would be too tedious, and well might be thought unnecessary to consult all the materials which might be within our reach on this subject; but he dared to appeal to the recollection of every gentleman who was in a situation to know the facts, for the correctness of the statement which he had made; and he would read some few extracts from the debates of the Convention of Virginia, which would probably be, on this occasion, for many reasons, admitted as the best authority: and particularly, because the subject there was examined by eminent talents, and by minute and scrupulous investigation.

Mr. SENGWICK read the following passages from the third volume of the "Debates and Proceedings of the Convention of Virginia." From the speech Mr. George Mason, who was as well a member of the Federal Convention, as of that of Virginia:

"That he thought this a most dangerous clause. By the Confederation, nine States were necessary to concur in a Treaty: this secured justice and moderation. His principal fear, however, was not that five, but seven States, a bare majority, would make Treaties to bind the Union."

He then read the reply of Mr. George Nicholas to Mr. Mason:

"That the approbation of the President, who had no local views, being elected by no particular State, but the people at large, was an additional security."

Mr. S. said, that if it was true, as now contended for, that this House was intended to have a check on the principles which had been mentioned, and which, he had already shown, would extend to some of the stipulations of every Treaty which could be formed, it was utterly impossible it should not have been mentioned and relied on.

From a speech of Mr. MADISON he read:

"That he thought it astonishing that gentlemen should think that a Treaty could be got with surprise, or that foreign nations should be solicitous to get a Treaty ratified by the Senators of a few States; that should the President summon only a few States, he would, for so atrocious a thing, be impeached."

From the speech of another member, Mr. Henry:

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

"That if two-thirds of a quorum would be empowered to make a Treaty, they might relinquish and alienate territorial rights, and our most valuable commercial advantages. In short, should anything be left it would be because the President and Senators were pleased to admit it."

[How, Mr. S. asked, could this be true, if the doctrine now laid down in support of this motion, was well founded?]

"The power of making Treaties, ill-guarded as it is, extended further than it did in any country in the world. Treaties were to have more force here than in any part of Christendom."

From Mr. MADISON's speech he read :

"Are not Treaties the law of the land in England? I will refer you to a book which is in every man's hand, 'Blackstone's Commentaries;' it will inform you, that Treaties made by the King are to be the supreme law of the land; if they are to have any efficacy, they must be the law of the land. They are so in every country."

From Governor Randolph :

"It is said, there is no limitation of Treaties. I defy the wisdom of that gentleman to show how they ought to be limited."

From Mr. George Nicholas :

"Have we not seen in America how Treaties are violated, though they are in all countries considered as the supreme law of the land?"

That Mr. Mason, speaking of this power, had said :

"It is true it is one of the greatest acts of sovereignty, and therefore ought to be most strongly guarded. The cession of such power, without such checks and guards, cannot be justified; yet I acknowledge such a power must rest somewhere : It is so in all Governments. If, in the course of an unsuccessful war, we should be compelled to give up part of our territories or undergo subjugation, if the General Government could not make a Treaty to give up such a part, for the preservation of the residue, the Government itself, and consequently the rights of the people must fall. Such a power must, therefore rest somewhere. For my own part, I never heard it denied that such a power must be vested in the Government. Our complaint is, that it is not sufficiently guarded, and that it requires much more solemnity and caution than are delineated in that system."

[Strange, Mr. S. said, that this gentleman did not discover, or was not told, that Treaties before they should become laws, must receive Legislative sanction.]

"There are other things which the King [meaning the King of Great Britain] cannot do, which may be done by the President and Senate in this case. Could the King, by his prerogative, enable foreign subjects to purchase lands, and have an hereditary, indefeasible title? Will any gentleman say that they [the President and Senate] may not make a Treaty, whereby the subjects of France, England, and other Powers, may buy what lands they please in this country?" "The President and Senate may make any Treaty whatsoever. We wish not to refuse, but to guard this power, as it is done in England." "We wish an explicit declaration in that paper, that the power which can make other Treaties, cannot, without the consent of the national Parliament, the national Legislature, dismember the empire. The Senate alone ought not to have this power."

From the speech of Mr. Corbin, who was in favor of the Constitution :

"If there be any sound part in the Constitution, it is this clause. The Representatives are excluded from interposing in making Treaties, because large popular assemblies are very improper to transact such business, from the impossibility of their acting with sufficient secrecy, despatch, and decision, which can only be found in small bodies; and because such numerous bodies are always subject to faction and party animosities. That it would be dangerous to give this power to the President alone, as the concession of such a power to one individual is repugnant to Republican principles. It is therefore given to the President and Senate (who represent the States in their individual capacities) conjointly. In this it differs from every Government we know. It steers with admirable dexterity between the two extremes, neither leaving it to the Executive, as in most other Governments, nor to the Legislative, which would too much retard such negotiations."

That another member of the Convention (Mr. Henry,) after contending that the Constitution ought to be amended, so as to guard against the abuse of the Treaty-making power, by requiring the consent of the House, concluded his observations, by saying :

"That when their consent is necessary, there will be a certainty of attending to the public interests."

That the debate on this interesting subject was, in that Convention, concluded by a gentleman of this House, [Mr. MADISON] not by insisting on that security, which gentlemen had now discovered the Constitution provided against the abuse of this power. He had stated :

"That the power was precisely in the new Constitution as it was in the Confederation."

He had stated the checks which the Constitution had in fact provided, but it had not then occurred to him that the consent of this House was among them.

He also read the amendment which the Convention of Virginia proposed to the Constitution :

"That no commercial Treaty shall be ratified without the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole number of the Senate; and no Treaty ceding, controlling, restraining or suspending the territorial rights or claims of the United States or any of them; or their or any of their rights or claims to fishing in the American seas, or navigating the American rivers shall be made but in cases of the most urgent necessity; nor shall any such Treaty be ratified, without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively."

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that it was manifest, beyond all doubt, from that amendment, that the Convention of that State supposed, that the Constitution as it then stood unamended, delegated to the President and Senate, and to the exclusion of the House, the whole power of making and ratifying Treaties, with all its consequences and effects.

He had stated, that the real inquiry was, what opinion was entertained on this subject by those

H. OF R.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

who ratified the Constitution. If that opinion could be discovered, with honest minds it must be conclusive on the present debate. He had shown what opinion was entertained by Virginia; what power she meant to delegate, and to whom. That this opinion remained from that time until she proposed her late amendments, unaltered, appeared from the amendments themselves. That State then, and her Representatives here, who had expressed themselves, differed in opinion. He did not mention Virginia with intention of producing any unpleasant sensation. He was willing to allow that she was great, wise, intelligent, enlightened, and, if gentlemen pleased, moral. Her opinion derived additional authority from her respectability. It was not Virginia alone, but he was persuaded every other State had given precisely the same construction. That the Treaty-making power, with all its effects and consequences was solely and exclusively in the President and Senate. And he would dare to challenge gentlemen to produce a solitary instance of its being adopted under any other idea. Indeed, the agitation which was at that time produced, would of all things be the most ridiculous if any of the other constructions were true. If the power was checked as was now contended, it was impossible danger should be apprehended from its exercise; it could indeed do neither good nor evil.

Here then, he said, we had the evidence of those who framed, and of those who received and approved the Constitution. There was another source of inquiry, which would confirm it, if it wanted confirmation, that construction for which he had contended. It was the construction which had been practically given by those who had administered our Government, from the commencement of our foreign relations to the present session; a construction which had been assumed, admitted, or acquiesced in, by our National and State Governments, and by every individual citizen, until they received new light, by our having accommodated our causes of contention with Great Britain, and escaped the evils with which we had been threatened from that source.

The association which preceded any express contract between the States, was supposed to imply an authority to form national compacts, imposing national obligations, and pledging the public faith. Hence our treaty with France, which preceded two years our national association, the Confederation, had been supposed binding on us, and not only obliging us to the faithful performance of our express engagements, but as drawing after it undefined, unlimited, and perpetual obligations of gratitude. This seemed, so far as respected defined obligations, to be a rational deduction, from what is an inseparable attendant on national associations, and without which a nation would be destitute of one of the best means of securing its happiness, and even existence.

To pursue, he said, the history of our country on this subject in the order of time, it would not be pretended that, under the Confederation, the powers of Congress to form "Treaties and Alliances" were more extensive than those of the PRESIDENT and Senate under the Constitution to form "Treaties." The Legislative powers of the nation, then residing with the several States, were as obstructive to the operation of Treaties (and extended to all the objects which the National and State Legislatures now comprehend) as the Congressional Legislative can now be. Yet under the Confederation Treaties of Alliance, of Peace, of Commerce, were made; nor until the present moment has their obligations been denied, though they contained stipulations, perhaps, on all the subjects to which the treating power could extend. No Legislative provision had been thought necessary to give them validity; and he dared appeal to every member of the Committee, that every enlightened citizen had admitted their binding obligation as supreme laws. That the Treaty of Peace in particular, which controlled the most important rights of sovereignty, arrested the hand of justice in inflicting punishment for the highest crime which a citizen could commit, treason, and stayed proceedings in cases of confiscation, for forfeitures which had been incurred, had always received this construction. He would add, that it was well understood to be the opinion of that tribunal which the Constitution had authorized to pronounce the law, the Supreme Court, that the Treaty from its own powers, repealed all antecedent laws which stood in the way of its execution.

To proceed further on: Since the adoption of the Constitution, the powers now denied had been constantly exercised with all the consequences and effects now contended for, and, until the present moment, unquestioned. Peace had been concluded, subsidies granted, payment of money stipulated, territorial rights discussed and decided on. Treaties for those purposes had been ratified, not by venal and corrupt majorities, but by virtuous unanimity. Hence, from the moment we had become a nation, under every form of our implied or expressed association, the powers now denied had been exercised, not only without question, but with unqualified approbation.

There was one more point of light in which this subject ought to be viewed. In the year 1789, it was proposed to discriminate in the imposition of our duties, between the nations with whom we had, and those with whom we had not, Treaties of Commerce. The author of this proposition renewed the same in the year 1791. This was virtually acknowledging the validity of the Treaties which did exist, and inviting those nations who had not already, to form Commercial Treaties. Something more than this was done by the motions which some gentlemen of the minority of the Senate are said to have made when this very Treaty was in discussion. Their motions recommended an accommodation by Treaty of all subsisting differences between the two countries. It could not escape remark that these several propositions and motions were supported by all that description of persons who now opposed the Treaty.

It would not then be deemed impertinent to inquire, it was worthy attention, what was imported and admitted by this conduct and those proposi-

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

tions? They undoubtedly implied a concession that the subsisting Treaties were of validity; why else should they be considered as a meritorious cause of favorable discrimination? They implied, too, that there existed in this country a power to treat on commercial relations, and to adjust subsisting differences.

If without Legislative aid (and they had received none) those Treaties would authorize the Legislature to derange the commercial pursuits of the nation, and enter into Legislative hostility with that nation with which we had the most extensive relations, it must be from the competency of the Treaty-making power on the principles on which we contended. Strange again, he would say, it must appear that the true construction of the Constitution, on this very important subject, should have escaped the penetration and sagacity of the author of those propositions, during the time of forming and ratifying the instrument, and his whole active public life, from those periods until that of the publication of the British Treaty.

If, then, it was true, as he had endeavored to prove, that by the power given by the Constitution to the President and Senate to make Treaties, they had an authority to the extent he had supposed with all its consequences and effects; if Treaties so formed did in fact become supreme law, then being compacts they bound the public faith and could not be violated without national disgrace and personal dishonor. They might require Legislative provision to carry them into effect; but this neither implied nor authorized the exercise of discretion, as to refusal. The Constitution he had had frequent occasions of saying, prescribed a Government of departments. Each was intended to be furnished with the means of self-preservation and defence. For this purpose it was declared that the President should receive a compensation to be ascertained by law. Laws were to be made by the Legislature, of which this House was one branch. To support the Constitution each department must be enabled to perform the functions assigned to it. To enable the Executive to do its duties, the compensation must be provided. It was then necessary to the support of the Constitution, that the compensation should be made. We have sworn to support the Constitution. The people by their Constitution had solemnly engaged that whoever was the President should receive a compensation. We had been deputed to discharge the duties and engagements which our constituents had assumed. Under these circumstances no man of common honesty could declare that we were at liberty to refuse all provision.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] had attempted to make a distinction between the duties we had imposed on us by the Constitution and such as were enjoined by law. He could perceive no foundation for any such distinction. After the salary of the President was ascertained by law, it could not be paid without an appropriation; would any one say he was at liberty to withhold it? No man, he presumed, would wish to risk his reputation by such an assertion. For such conduct instead of supporting would tend to subvert, and would, if persisted in, annihilate the Constitution. This was undoubtedly one of the most important of the public contracts; but the truth was, in fact, that we were bound to perform all the public engagements. The truth was that our national association was a compact of virtue. To support the Constitution it was necessary to preserve public faith. To promote the public happiness it was essential to hold sacred, and to perform, the public engagements. In this were included all engagements, whether expressed in the form of Constitution, of laws, or of Treaties; in any way, indeed, in which the people had agreed that their will and their duties might be expressed.

Mr. S. concluded by observing, that he had intended to have presented the subject in several other important aspects, but he had already trespassed on the patience of the Committee. He would, as the time of adjournment was passed, suspend for the present any further observations; and he hoped that all the grounds which he had left unoccupied would be taken by other gentlemen, so as to supersede the necessity of troubling the Committee with any further observations on this subject.

MARCH 14.—In Committee of the Whole on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolution:

Mr. SAMUEL LYMAN said he rose only to make a few observations. He was against the resolution now on the table, as involving a doctrine, in his opinion not only inconsistent with the principles of the Constitution, but also inconsistent with the laws of nations. In debating the merits of this resolution, an exceedingly important abstract Constitutional question had arisen, viz: How far that House had a right to exercise their Legislative discretion and judgment relative to carrying a Treaty into effect. In order to answer this question, he would raise two premises. And, first, by the Constitution, the Legislative powers of that House, in co-operation with the other branches of the Legislature, extend to all objects within the reach of their sovereignty, excepting the reservations to the distinct sovereignties of the several States which compose the Union; but beyond those boundaries their powers could not extend. Secondly, there is, by the Constitution, attached to the Legislature a subordinate kind of power, of a limited and ministerial, or Executive nature. At present, it did not occur to him that this subordinate power was to be exercised in its simplicity, excepting in two instances, viz: 1st, for calling a Convention under certain circumstances to amend the Constitution; and, 2dly, for carrying into effect Treaties which are constitutionally made; for these two purposes, the people, who are the source of power, had stripped that House of all Legislative authority, and made them only the executors of their will; therefore, upon these premises he answered, if a Treaty was unconstitutional, they had an undoubted right to exercise a Legislative discretion and judgment relative to carrying it into operation, for they were sent there as the guardians of the rights of their fellow-citizens, and, for that purpose, are sworn to support the Constitution; but if the Treaty was Constitutional, they had not a right to exercise that discretion; for, without their intervention, it becomes the supreme law of the land, and virtually repeals all laws which are repugnant to it; and in that case that House is bound to obey it, and to carry it into complete execution; for, by the Constitution, the power of making Treaties is vested solely and exclusively in the Executive department. In the former case, they have a right to exercise a deliberative or Legislative power, but not in the latter case; they could there only exercise a ministerial or Executive power. So that herein, said he, lies the true distinction, and it arises from the nature and principles of the Constitution. Gentlemen would do well to recollect Miller and Delolme upon the British Constitution, when they form a comparison of their Constitution with the Constitution of England, and to advert to one important circumstance, which is the source of a considerable dissimilarity, especially as to the power of making Treaties: The Constitution of this country is written, and the powers of the several Departments of Government are clearly and accurately defined; but the Constitution of England is made up of customs and precedents, the influence of which has been alternately augmenting or decreasing from time immemorial, owing to a perpetual conflict between the Sovereign and the House of Commons, the Government being in its origin an absolute monarchy, and founded upon conquest; but the spirit of that great nation, by the subtlety and adroitness of their House of Commons, who have been watchful of favorable junctures, has, as it were, surreptitiously deprived their Sovereign of many of his royal prerogatives. This check upon his Treaty-making power was, among others, an important achievement.

In this country they had only a right to exercise a deliberative or Legislative power relative to Treaties which are unconstitutional; but they could only exercise a ministerial or Executive power relative to Treaties which are Constitutional; and in forming an opinion relative to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a Treaty, all they want were the Treaty and the Constitution, and then, by comparing the two instruments together, and upon that comparison alone, form their judgment. From these premises it conclusively follows, that, as they have no occasion, so they have no right, to call upon the Supreme Executive for the papers in question. This doctrine, he thought, necessarily resulted not only from the principles of their Constitution, but also from an important principle of the Law of Nations. For all nations between whom there are existing Treaties have a kind of property lodged in the secret cabinet of each other, and no nation can, consistently with good faith, publish to the world the secret negotiations which led to forming either of those Treaties. To prove this principle, a recurrence may be had to Paley's Philosophy and Vattel's Law of Nations. This principle of the Law of Nations is predicated upon an important principle of the law of nature. Here, then, is no necessity of recurring to written authorities, for every sentiment of their nature enforced conviction, and, of consequence, is clothed with all the solemnity of moral obligation.

This principle of the law of nature is no less than the law of self-preservation, as relative to themselves, their nation, and all other nations; for, what would be the consequence if the reverse of this doctrine was established as the Law of Nations? The consequence would be pernicious and destructive among the nations; it would be the source of jealousies, of Carthaginian faith, of war and bloodshed.

He had not the least doubt of the constitutionality of a Treaty, when the stipulations in it were of such a nature as not to respect objects of legislation, but only objects with lay beyond the bounds of their sovereignty; for beyond those limits their laws could not extend as rules to regulate the conduct of subjects of foreign Powers; and although some stipulations in a Treaty may respect objects which were within the reach of their sovereignty, yet it may be in such manner as to be strictly Constitutional; for such stipulations may be not only pertinent, but absolutely necessary in forming the Treaty. This conclusion, he thought, was the natural and necessary result of a fair and liberal construction of the principles of the Constitution, and especially of that paragraph which vests the power of making Treaties in the Supreme Executive, with the advice of the Senate.

Mr. L. said he was sensible he had been delivering an unpopular doctrine, but that he was deeply impressed with its truth, its reality, and its importance; and that the obligations of an oath had prevented his silence on the occasion.

Mr. BALDWIN said he had before expressed his opinion in general terms, in favor of this question. It must have been observed that he had been for several days noting the debates, and preparing to take part in them. He had intended to have introduced the debate on Friday morning last, but a singular incident prevented him, which he felt it to be his duty to take this earliest opportunity to state to the House. Mr. B. then said: About five minutes before I expected to rise on the question, I was called out of the House by a person then unknown to me, who said his name was FRELINGHUYSEN, and whom I found to be a Senator of the United States. After a number of interviews, he observed, with great expressions of pain and regret, that he was at last obliged to the unwelcome office of delivering me that letter, which I opened and found to be a challenge directed to me from JAMES GUNN, who is also a Senator of the United States. The pretext for this transaction was, to extort from me some private letters which I had received early in the session from a number of my constituents, expressing their wish that I would endeavor to prevent any thing being done in Congress to validate the Mississippi Yazoo Land Speculation before the meeting of the State Legislature. There was no complaint of any personal indecorum or disrespect at all: whether they were actuated in their conduct solely by interest in Yazoo speculations, I will not pretend to judge.

Treaty with Great Britain.

[II. OF R.]

The revival of a transaction of so old a date at that particular moment, was to me surprising. Not knowing their degree of relation to this question between the two Houses, and not knowing the cast of character but of one of them, I am left only to conjecture. It was so peculiarly timed, and the professed object also of so peculiar a nature, to interrupt the channels of confidence for free communication between me and my constituents, that I have thought it my duty not to let the treatment of it depend on my own individual discretion. I consider it as in the discretion of the House. Mr. B. also observed that he felt himself under the necessity of using this as an apology for the apparent neglects of Friday, after the particular attention he had before appeared to pay to the discussion; and for his not being able to notice any of the proceedings in the debate of Friday, he had supposed he had lost the opportunity of offering his opinion, but was glad to find the question had not been taken, as he was unwilling to suffer this, or even a greater interruption, to prevent him from declaring his opinion, as he had before intended.

Mr. B. then began his remarks on the question, and observed that, from the course which the business had taken, the subject seemed to be one thing and the discussion another. He begged leave first to consider the question, partly with a view to rescue some remarks which he had made when the question first presented itself, from a singular envelope which one or two members have thought proper to attempt to throw about them. He did not then say that it was advisable to request these papers of the PRESIDENT, for the sake of publishing them; that published they ought to be; that there were no secrets in Government now-a-days; and that the doctrine of mysteries was exploded.

The mistake, if it was merely a mistake, must have arisen from not attending to his first observation, which was nearly as follows: that they were obliged, at any rate, to go into the subject; the House had ordered the Committee of the Whole to proceed to consider the Treaty, and the petitions from their fellow-citizens complaining of different parts of it; the committee must be formed, the subject taken up, propositions upon it must be received, and some result concluded on. The only question, then, was, whether to take up the subject unexplained as it was, merely from the instrument and petitions, or to request any information that might be thought useful to the discussion, and not improper to be communicated, which might guard them from error, and lead them to a proper result. To this it was objected, that these papers were secrets of the Executive department, &c. In this connexion it was he made the observation alluded to; that he hoped, on reflection, that objection would not appear to have so much weight; that, since they had been a free people, the different Governments in this country, and the different departments of Government, appeared to be under an increasing conviction (which, he thought, had been much strengthened by experience) that a rigid adherence to the old mysterious doctrines of Governmental secrecy was not necessary; that, in place of it, it seemed now to be believed that it was desirable, as far as possible, to have Governmental regulations accompanied with light and information, and as full an exhibition of the reasons on which they are founded as the nature of them will permit. He had almost brought his own mind to believe that there was but one limitation to the extent of this principle, and that was, that, while measures were in the transaction, and in an unfinished state, it might, at many times, be improper to disclose them. Proofs could not be wanting that these impressions had such weight on the mind of the PRESIDENT that he persuaded himself there was no danger of their making an unfavorable impression on his sentiments, qualified as the motion had been by the last amendment. It was said the PRESIDENT would have published these papers unasked, if there had not been an impropriety in it. There might be a diplomatic impropriety in disclosing the particulars of a negotiation unless some kind of occasion led to it—like an individual too freely disclosing private letters; but when it was known that there was occasion, it is a proper justification.

A gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] had undertaken to controvert these assertions. His proofs are too remarkable not to be noticed: his first was, that the old Congress had animadverted on the conduct of a member from Rhode Island, for improperly communicating some matters which had been intrusted to his confidence; the second was, that they now had a rule for clearing their galleries. Let that gentleman look at the secret Journal of the old Congress, and see how it continually diminished till it was become almost nothing; let him look over the United States, and see how many public bodies which used to deliberate in secret have now their doors open; let him look over the communications, of mere Executive business, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, for these two or three years past; let him read the rule of their own House, as it now stands, on the subject of clearing the gallery, and see how much it is narrowed from the rule which was in force for the first two or three years—and then let him declare whether there is not some foundation for the assertions which he had attempted to combat. He hoped he should be excused for having detained the Committee by some repetition of what he had before said—it was the strict debate of the question, and had been held up undefended in two unfavorable attitudes. He could not patiently see observations that appeared to him so important, so well grounded, and so strictly applicable to the question in debate, hunted from the House, because the attention of gentlemen, who at other times would not have suffered it in silence, had been absorbed by a still more important direction which the discussion had taken. He should conclude this part of his observations, which he considered as properly the debate of the question, by an expression of his wish that gentlemen would reflect in what light they exhibited themselves, and what must be the tendency of their opinions, if they avowed themselves the adversaries of his observations, as he had now explained them. He had hoped, when he first made the observations, they had not been useless; they still had great weight on his own mind—he believed they had on the minds of some other members.

Mr. B. then proceeded to consider the question in the form in which it is presented by the discussion. He was sensible of the disadvantage any person must labor under and particularly himself, in attempting to speak upon it, after it had been so long and so very ably discussed. It would be impossible for any person to propose to himself a strict and regular plan of viewing the subject without going over a great deal of the ground that had been before taken by other gentlemen. This, in the present stage of the business, would be so tedious—and any attempt to improve upon their statements would be to him so hopeless—that he should decline the task, with barely making the observation as an apology for a less formal, though he hoped not useless, submission of some thoughts which had occurred to him on the subject.

He said, it was remarkable that several gentlemen rose with very different expressions which had been said to contain the subject in discussion. It was certainly important to agree exactly on that point. The least variation in the point of departure would soon diverge till they were out of sight of each other, and yet each one keep a straight direction. One gentleman had stated that the question was, whether this House should feel itself at liberty to judge over the heads of PRESIDENT and Senate on the subject of Treaties without restraint: his reasoning seemed to be built on that proposition. Another gentleman had said that the question was, whether the power of making Treaties was given by the Constitution to the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate, or to the PRESIDENT and both branches of the Legislature. He might mention several others, but he called the attention of the House to the fact, to settle the point, that they might at least agree what they were talking about. The question, said he, on the table is, to request of the PRESIDENT papers respecting the Treaty: the objection is, you ought not to ask for the papers, because you have no right to touch the subject. He begged leave then to ask, with the utmost candor and respect, whether the real question now depending and brought into dispute by this motion, is not whether all questions relating to this subject are not so definitely and perfectly settled by the Constitution that there was nothing for that House to deliberate upon on the occasion, but only punctually to provide the funds to carry the Treaty into effect. If it were allowed that there might be any possible or extraordinary cases on the subject of Treaty-making in which it might ever be proper for that House to deliberate—as, for instance, offensive Treaties which might bring the country into a war—subsidies and support of foreign armies—introduction of an established religion from a foreign country, or any other of those acts which are by the Constitution prohibited to Congress, but not prohibited to the makers of Treaties; if it were allowed that there might possibly exist any such case, in which it might ever be proper for Congress to deliberate, it would seem to be giving up the ground on which the discussion of the present question has been placed; what agency the House should take, and when, would be other questions. Whether a case would probably occur once in a hundred years that would warrant the House in touching the subject, is of no consequence to the debate. The right is denied in the largest sense. The assertion is that the House has no right to deliberate or to look into any papers on the subject; that the people have by the Constitution, reposed the whole of their confidence on this subject elsewhere; that, to attempt to deliberate upon it, or to ask for any papers respecting it, is treason and anarchy.

If this ground were once given up, he should be infinitely less anxious what the House might do in any particular case: these would rest on their individual merits. For his own part, he was by no means disposed to carry the interference of the House to any extreme; but he could not express his abhorrence of the doctrine in the extent to which some gentlemen have carried it in this discussion. He begged leave to entreat gentlemen again candidly to review the few words in the Constitution on which they rested so much, and to ask whether they appeared to be such labored expressions as they supposed—so apt and definite as to mean exactly what they contend for, and nothing else, and whether all the words may not well be satisfied without, and stand more harmoniously connected with the other parts of the Constitution.

How much they intended to incorporate with this power of Treaty-making, under cover of contract with foreign nations, he had not heard any one attempt to explain; it seemed designed to stand distinguished as an indefinite, uncontrolled branch of the Government, the extent of whose powers was to be known only by its own acts. Its definition was to be, that it was indefinite—like what is said of some branches of the powers of Parliament; that no one has pretended or ought to pretend to know their extent; that they are not to be submitted to the judgment of any one but themselves; and that they never develop them but by the particular exercise of them; that they were to be left in this state, because, if they were defined, they might be eluded. However this might be found, respecting a foreign Constitution, it is making a monster of our own. There was not another part or lineament in it which appeared to be in the same mould or proportion.

He then proceeded to observe, that though upon these principles a definition of this power was not to be asked or expected, yet without doubt it might be permitted to contemplate it in its display. From the late exhibition which had been made of it in the instrument which had been laid before the House, it appeared to assume the right of repealing laws. He supposed it not to be denied, that in not less than four instances it had repealed laws of the United States. He had not heard any reason assigned why it might not have been extended to the whole book, and repealed all the laws passed before that time. It appeared also to have narrowed the former ground of legislation, and taken away the powers of the Legislature, if he mistook not, on five subjects on which proceedings had been begun, but not finished, at the preceding session. If the Committee on Unfinished Business were to make a full report, he supposed they must say, that with respect to the bill for the regulation of the sale of prizes; the bill for the suspension of commercial intercourse; a resolution for sequestration of Public Debts; also, for some commercial discriminations, and concerning naturalization, which they found among the unfinished business—they forebore to bring them to the view of the House, inasmuch as Congress had now no Legislative powers on those subjects. Such a report would at first strike with a degree of surprise. Has there been a Federal Convention? it would be asked. Have amendments to the Constitution been recommended by two-thirds of each branch of Congress, and adopted by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the respective States? He believed he might say with safety that it was at least a mode of taking away the Legislative powers of the Federal Government that had not before been much contemplated, and ought to be well weighed before it was recognised in the extent in which it now presented itself.

Treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. B. then proceeded to take another view of the subject, in which, he said, it would be necessary for him to request the Committee to go back with him again to the question, and take the other alternative, to see whether it would not carry them on to safer and better ground. He would begin it by the assertion, that those few words in the Constitution on this subject, were not those apt, precise, definite expressions, which irresistibly brought upon them the meaning which he had been above considering. He said it was not to disparage the instrument, to say that it had not definitely, and with precision, absolutely settled everything on which it had spoke. He had sufficient evidence to satisfy his own mind that it was not supposed by the makers of it at the time, but that some subjects were left a little ambiguous and uncertain. It was a great thing to get so many difficult subjects definitely settled at once. If they could all be agreed in, it would compact the Government. The few that were left a little unsettled might, without any great risk, be settled by practice or by amendments in the progress of the Government. He believed this subject of the rival powers of legislation and Treaty was one of them; the subject of the Militia was another, and some question respecting the Judiciary another. When he reflected on the immense difficulties and dangers of that trying occasion—the old Government prostrated, and a chance whether a new one could be agreed in—the recollection recalled to him nothing but the most joyful sensations that so many things had been so well settled, and that experience had shown there was very little difficulty or danger in settling the rest. In this part of the subject, he said, had he been earlier in the debate, he should have gone over some of the ground on which others had now gone before him. He would not detain the House a minute by the repetition of the luminous and able discussion with which the House had been for several days instructed. Can any man, said he, after the views which have been presented to us, doubt that there is room—that there is a call for deliberation to reconcile some parts of the Constitution on this subject—to give the greatest effect to them all?

For example, it is said:

ART. I. "All Legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives," i. e. every particle of law-making power in the Constitution granted shall be vested in a Congress, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives.

ART. VI. Treaties are laws.

The power of making Treaties is a particle of law-making power, granted by the Constitution; but it is granted by article 2d to the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate.

And yet there is no doubt in these expressions. They are so perfectly clear and definite, that there is no call or even room to deliberate in commencing practice upon them.

And how, he asked, are such questions between the different constituent parts of the Government to be settled, but for each branch to deliberate with calmness and moderation in their own sphere, and come to a mutual result? It must indeed be a fearful, trembling loyalty, that should prevent so important a branch of the Government as that House from even presuming to deliberate on the very important considerations which have been addressed to them. It was not a new case, or peculiar to that House; there can be no doubt but it will be well received by the other branches of the Government, with the exception of but few individuals. The PRESIDENT had not hesitated to send back to them their laws when he thought them against the Constitution, and they had given way to his reasons. The Judges had refused to execute a law intruding upon their department; it was repealed, and they passed another on the subject.

In this place, he begged leave to take notice of some things which had been adduced in opposition to the opinions which he had expressed. A gentleman from South Carolina had produced a number of publications, and had alluded to a number of transactions by which he would make it appear that it had been allowed, that the Treaty-making power was as extensive as it is now contended for. He quoted a number of meeting and party writings, and among the rest of his authorities he was constantly expecting to hear him quote another, very common in the present times, the toasts. The gentleman from Massachusetts had produced many others: the reasons of members of the Convention, the proposed amendments of several States, &c. He was willing to allow due force to that kind of reasoning, if it has, in fact, been the common view of the subject; if it is the one that most naturally presents itself on reading that part of the Constitution, it would be a good reason for calling up all their candor and diligence on the occasion, in comparing and reconciling it to the other parts of the Constitution; but it was not of sufficient force to be a ground of absolute certainty that the thing is definitely settled, and that they ought not to deliberate upon it. He thought more weight had been allowed to this turn of argument than was its due. It was not to be forgotten, that probably even in making the Constitution, and in all that had been said upon it since, there never had been till now so many persons and so much time employed at once in searching and settling this single point. It may be said to be the first solemn decision of the question. The suability of the States was not so much talked of or believed, till it was declared by the Judges to be the meaning of the Constitution; its being a new and unexpected construction, was not used as a weapon to excite irritation against the Judges; why ought it to be on this occasion? He might mention several other particulars to the same effect, but he wished as far as possible to avoid being tedious.

Mr. B. then undertook to state his own view of the subject, and what he thought ought to be done. Much, he said, depended on the words "make Treaties and supreme law of the land;" as to the words supreme law of the land, he had not much doubt for what purpose solely they were introduced. The words were satisfied, and he thought most naturally, by not suffering them to disturb the balance of the Federal Constitution, for that is not the subject which the section where these words are used is speaking of; but to consider them as giving to the Treaty-making power the same paramount authority over the laws and Constitutions of the several States, that they give at the same time to the Constitution and laws of the United States. The words appear to be introduced for the express purpose of making the Constitution, laws, and Treaties, of the United States, paramount to the Constitutions and laws of the several States, and for no other purpose; this is all that the section appears to be speaking of; it satisfies the words, is the most obvious and natural meaning, and leaves the other parts of the Constitution harmonious and undisturbed. As to the words "power to make Treaties," it was more difficult to ascertain precisely what the Constitution meant to give by them. It had been argued that from the nature of Governmental powers, the Treaty-making power must be paramount, and from the nature of contract it must be paramount. The truth is, the Treaty-making power must be what the Constitution has made it. He did not hesitate to say, that the most natural meaning to give these words, was to consider them as borrowed from former use, and to give them the meaning which they had always before given them. Gentlemen had said that nothing useful could be derived from English books and explanations on these terms. This seemed to him an unreasonable assertion. It might as well be said, that they could not use an English Dictionary to ascertain the meaning of words. In many sciences, said he, there are definite and appropriate phrases as well as definite and appropriate words; and, in fact, books which are Dictionaries of phrases, ascertain the meaning of phrases with as much precision as Dictionaries ascertain the meaning of words. It is exceedingly useful that it should be so. When such a precise meaning is fixed to a phrase, and publicly known, it is apt to remain a long time exact, as it is frequently employed, and is very useful as a medium of certainty. Many instances of this kind might be quoted, particularly from English books on law and Government. He would observe further, these appropriate phrases had been for their certainty in many instances transferred into our Constitution, and their meaning must be manifestly sought in those sources as in a Dictionary. One remarkable instance occurred to him, and which, from the singularity of its garb, would be very discernible in the Constitution—he meant the definition of treason in the third section of the third article of the Constitution. The phrase is, levying war, adhering to enemies, giving them aid and comfort. These are the very words of the English books, which have been so critically judged that they are not capable of the least variation in their meaning on that tremendous subject; but this meaning is to be sought from those sources; he might mention several instances, but it was unnecessary. He thought the phrase, power to make Treaties, should be ascertained in the same manner; and the English meaning, as it would naturally be understood at the time of making the Constitution, should be affixed to it; that it should be considered as giving to the President and two-thirds of the Senate the same kind of power as the King of England possesses on the subject of Treaties, which it is known is in several cases subject to the control of Parliament. Here it is qualified by the powers specifically given to Congress.

But all this, said he, is answered by most violent outeries, which sound to him very bold on so new a subject: that the nation will be undone, all confidence in its engagements destroyed, and the country, without doubt, involved in a war abroad, and anarchy at home. That was an extraordinary mode of discussing a curious and perplexed question. It may be asked, why do not those things occur in England? The King, it is seen, has laid this same Treaty before Parliament; they may probably now be discussing it. Some of their Treaties which were read the other day appeared to be carried by but a small vote; suppose this should now be lost in Parliament by a small vote, what reason to apprehend more dreadful consequences to this country than to that?

He hoped, on the whole, the House would be prevailed on to go coolly into the subject; he had no doubt but their good sense and moderation would guide them safely and prevent them from working mischief or creating confusion. He hoped they would first request the papers on the subject; he had no doubt but that it would appear that this was not now as new a question to all the branches of the Government as it was to that House. It is probable it presented itself to the Ministers who made the Treaty. The English had been so much in the habit of having an article introduced into their Treaties respecting its being submitted to

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. or R.]

Parliament, that probably the English minister had the caution to ask our Minister, whether an article ought not to be introduced about its being submitted to Congress, and what he considered the powers of the PRESIDENT and Senate on the subject. It is very probable information on this subject will be found among the papers which it is proposed to request. Our Minister was a man of so much good sense and information, that, without doubt, he had drawn some line on that subject. Perhaps on looking at the papers they might find he had drawn it very properly, and be perfectly satisfied not to disturb it; but, that there should have been so long and formal opposition to requesting the papers and looking at the subject, he confessed, was what he had not expected.

Mr. COOPER rose to refer his colleague [Mr. HAVENS] who spoke last week, to the mode in which the laws and Constitution of the State of New York were explained away in the year 1792, so as to deprive the citizens of that State of the right of suffrage, and to inquire whether that decision was not considered by all thoughtful people as erroneous; if so, whether the present reasoning does not originate from the same mistaken notions of power over right. I think, said Mr. C., it will not be improper for the gentleman to recal to mind those observations before he decides on this important argument.

That gentleman and several others have asserted on this floor, that a Treaty was not the law of the land until it was assented to by that House; if so, it may be fair to inquire into its merits, and have the papers before them. Let them examine the matter. Surely if that principle be admitted, could not the officers of the revenue with equal propriety say to Congress your law is no law until our will is had—until we set it in motion; or, the collectors of the taxes, your law is of no validity until we take order to make the people pay their several quotas, or the people at large say, we are the essence of all law; it is with us all revenue, all appropriations of money, and all laws originate. Of what use, they may say, is your dry parchment? Although the House of Representatives may have passed it, although the Senate may have agreed to it, although the PRESIDENT may have confirmed it, and although it may have passed through each House with all the graceful forms necessary to dignify it as a law of the land; yet, unless our will is had in the premises, it has no weight. But the question is, can it be thought right for the people; can it be right for the collectors; would it be right for the officers of the revenue; or was it right for that House to hold out to their constituted authorities this sort of language? No, must be the answer. The principle is subversive of all Government. Common sense revolts at the idea. In this way the people can repeal laws by not obeying them; and, perhaps, there may be cases when they have a revolutionary right so to do; and it was in that confused state of things that Congress might repeal Treaties by not filling that middle ground they are placed in by refusing to grant appropriations; but both must be considered as in rebellion against the Constitution of the United States. Why this new mode of explaining the Constitution? It had been understood from the school-boy to the Senator according to its true meaning. Why, to gratify party rage, shall they attempt a new explanation of this criterion of their happiness? An observation, he said, fell from one of the Representatives from Virginia in his speech of last week, which he would take the liberty to make one or two remarks on. He intimated that he stood on high ground; he felt bold from the propriety of his intentions; he cared not for the cant word of disorganizer, &c. That is right; gentlemen who attempt to remove the established bond of the Constitution, ought to be bold; they ought to prepare for such cant words; it was reasonable they should expect them; for, from ancient date, the remover of land-marks was spoken harshly of. All men, said he, must now see who are willing to be bound down by the letter of the Constitution, and who are desirous to break through all shackles. There are three causes why this Treaty is so vastly disagreeable to some of the citizens in a part of the Union. One was, it compels some of them to pay their just debts, which they contemplated evading. As to the idea of its being a good or bad Treaty, it is a mere pretence, for the same opposition was made before it appeared as afterwards. A second is, that they have been at war with the nation this compact is made with, and an improper influence a nation now struggling for liberty has over their passions as Americans has increased their prejudices against the British nation. But the third and most rational cause is, that as they are an old and powerful nation, and as America is young, and unable to meet them, they insult and misuse them on that account. He felt their insults, yet his wish was to support their neutrality. Twenty years hence, he said, their voice would have a more manly sound, and although they may feel now as men will feel then, yet it would be imprudent for them to act now as it would be proper for men to act then. A wise man is governed by reason, men of less understanding by experience; but it is the weak, indeed, that are governed by their passions or feelings, when the interest of their country is in question.

Much has been said about the British Constitution. He always understood that their charter was nothing more than long usage, or practice reduced to precedent; and from that uncertain source their present unpleasant situation may have arisen. But they had the book and page, and surely the good sense of the United States will frown into atoms the man who shall attempt to violate the sacred volume.

For his own part, he should oppose the resolution, because it interfered with the oath he had taken to support the Constitution of the United States.

With these observations he should sit down during the rest of the debate on this question, hoping the House would not so far forget themselves, and what they owe to posterity, as to adopt a resolution so deeply tinged with usurpation of power.

Mr. HOLLAND said: It is with great diffidence I rise on this important subject, to submit some considerations to this Committee. As it has now become a Constitutional question, not with respect to the merits of the Treaty, but with respect to the Constitutional right of this House to request the Executive to furnish us with papers that related to the Treaty antecedent to its ratification.

To this it is objected that this House has no discretionary power over the Treaty, and, on that account, has nothing to do with the papers.

The question is not whether the Treaty is a good or bad Treaty, but it is whether we have a right to exercise our judgments upon it. Then, without any regard to the Treaty, we must be governed by the rational construction of the fundamental principles of Government.

To illustrate which, it may be necessary to examine what has been incident to the different kinds of Government, according to the histories of those nations governed by despotism, monarchs, or republics; and, from the Constitution of the United States as the fundamental maxims of the Republic, draw that construction that is most rational and natural.

It will also be proper to examine which of those Governments preserves the most power in the people.

First, then, of monarchy. Where has that power been placed? According to the theory of the English Government, it has been lodged in the Sovereign, for it is there expressly said (nor has it been denied on this floor) that the King is the source of all power; and it is also expressly declared that the King of Great Britain has sovereign and exclusive right to make Treaties. That, when they are made, they cannot be impeded or annulled by any existing power in the Kingdom. This is the theory of that Government. But what has been the practice? I answer, the contrary; for it ever has been that, when a Treaty was made, that the same has been submitted to the Parliament for concurrence; and Parliament, if they thought proper, admitted and sometimes annulled them, as in the Treaty of Utrecht, and sundry instances that the history of that nation affords us. The English Government, therefore, is in practice what it is not in theory. By the construction of the Constitution, as contended for, by giving uncontrollable power to twenty Senators and the PRESIDENT, our Government will be in practice what the English Government is in theory. If this doctrine had been believed that this was the true construction of the Constitution, previous and at the time of its adoption, would the people of the United States have adopted it? If they had been informed that, by this instrument, they were ceding more power to two-thirds of the Senators and PRESIDENT, than even could be practised by the King of England, with his lords spiritual and temporal, under that impression would they have ceded that power? Or, if they had been told that the House of Representatives, under this Constitution, had less power than was exercised by the House of Commons in England; that they would be less able to secure their liberties in this country against the approaches of prerogative, would they have, under that belief, accepted of this Constitution? I think, Mr. Chairman, I may venture to say, they would not.

With respect to the more absolute Government of France, where has this power been lodged? In this, as in the monarchy of England, it was, in theory, lodged in a Prince; but the theory, even in that despotic Government, never could be carried into practice. According to Vattel, in the Treaty made by Francis I., in the Treaty of Madrid, on account of that Treaty encroaching on the fundamentals of their Government, it was set aside. How was this done? It was not done by Parliament, for they had none; but the principal people of the kingdom met together at Cogniac and annulled it. I ask, again, Mr. Chairman, if the people of this country possess less power than the people of that despotic Government? Or do they possess less power to withstand the usurpations of the Executive, on the subject of Treaties, in their Representatives in Congress, than has ever been maintained in the cramped situation of the people of England by the House of Commons?

Why were these rights ever maintained and so scrupulously attended to by the people of those countries? It was because they considered them as the palladium of their remaining liberty—they, therefore, would not let them go.

Then, with respect to a Republic, the sovereign power is in the people. It therefore follows that whatever can be effected by the people in those countries can be done here—they being the source of power.

Then, with regard to the Constitution, it must be construed naturally and liberally in behalf of the people. Not as giving all power that can be given, but as retaining all power and natural right that ought to be retained. It would have been extremely improper to have wantonly discarded natural privilege, or ceded more power than was essential to Government; nor was any more intended to be given.

The Constitution, upon the face of it, shows that this is the case—limits are prescribed to Governmental power. Not so in the countries spoken of, yet the people exercise it. But, it is said, our Constitution has not retained this privilege, and it is the law and the testimony, sacred volume, &c. The sacredness depends upon the attention to the principles that procured its adoption; when that is contravened a violence is made upon the rights of the people. If, by any construction that can be given, these rights can be preserved, it is wise to consider it as the better opinion. But it is said to be impossible that this power has been ceded, subject to no control, to the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senators present; that, whatever may be the practice in other countries, it will not apply to this; that those countries have no Constitution, and that we have, and must be governed by it. Unfortunate circumstance! why adopted? Was it wantonly to throw away a privilege and natural right? Certainly not, but the contrary. It was to secure natural right, and to establish a Republican form of Government.

How, then, can it be said by a gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] that, as a private citizen, he might exercise his judgment; but, as a legislator, on the score of the Treaty, he would not think, although he acknowledged, that it was the duty of this Legislature to make laws to carry it into effect, but he had no discretion on the reason of the law? A gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. W. SMITH] also said, that we had no discretion; and, to prove the position, quoted the prohibitory clause, third article and section in the Constitution, which prevents legislating so far as relates to the diminution of the Judges' salary. This clause was intended to prevent the destruction of a legal right; the salary being fixed, it would be improper and unjust to diminish during the time for which he was elected. But there is a difference between the repulsive and the compulsive; the latter being incompatible with the character of a legislator, and that freedom of will incident to legislation, and that the man is the more or less a legislator in proportion to the freedom of his will, and uninterrupted exercise of his judgment. But, in the case of appropriation, so far as relates to the discharge and payment of the Judges' salary, as has been previously fixed by law, in this, as in all other cases of Legislative acts, a sound discretion should be exercised. It would be proper to examine the state of the Treasury with other external relations; and, if it should be found that the sum was impracticable in the present state of things, they most certainly could refrain. Nor would this be a destruction, but only a temporary suspension of the Judges' right, which frequently happens in exigencies. It therefore clearly follows that, in this case, discretion and judgment are at liberty, and as much unrestrained as in any other act of legislation.

In the eighth section, eighteenth clause of the Constitution, full power is given to Congress to make all laws, &c.; and in the sixth clause of the ninth article it is expressly declared, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but by law. Why by law? Why not by a decree of the Senate? It would have been much less expensive, being done by them, and it would have prevented the phenomenon of one hundred and four Representatives of a free people, and spare them the disagreeable dilemma of being obliged to legislate where they could not exercise will nor judgment; a situation extremely disagreeable in a private capacity to every person that has a tincture of independence; then shall it be said or believed that the Representatives of the free people of the United States can be in this situation?

Natural right has power to think and act on all subjects that present themselves to our natural or moral sense, except acting on those objects that would be accompanied with an express or implied violence to the property and rights of others. Nor has the adoption of the Constitution taken from us this privilege. Then, with regard to this instrument, (the Treaty as it is laid before us,) is it a subject that we can exercise our mental powers upon, or is it the property or right of others? It belongs no more to the PRESIDENT and Senate than to this branch of the Government. If it is a property, it is the right of a nation, it is a property in common, and, as such, we may clearly exercise our judgment upon it, in order to discover its merits or deformity; and, if it be found valuable, perpetuate, if an incumbrance, discard it. If its merits can be known, there can be no doubt that it will obtain the support of this House and of all the people of the United States. But it is said by a gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH,] that the custom has always been to admit of the Treaties; and that no attempt had been made to prevent their operation till this solitary case, and from this infers, that this House has no power to examine its merits; that they have uniformly passed laws to carry them into effect. All this may be true; but this goes only to show that they corresponded with those Treaties. It does not show that this House have not the right or power of repulsion. There is a difference between the having the power, and the act of exercising the power to the full extent.

A gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEDGWICK] has said, that he is much amazed if this power is in the House, that it was never found out until this moment; that not a man, from Georgia to Massachusetts, ever knew it before. I beg leave to inform that gentleman that he is mistaken; that he has not made himself acquainted with the understanding and judgment of, I trust, a large majority of enlightened citizens of the United States. That it was this construction that procured the adoption of the Constitution. That previous to, and at the Convention of North Carolina, this clause, which gives the Treaty-making power to the PRESIDENT and Senate, was considered by some as an exceptionable part, on account of the indefiniteness and generality of the expression. It was said, that the PRESIDENT, with two-thirds of the Senate, could make Treaties and make stipulations unfavorable to commerce. But those in favor of its adoption (of which I had the honor to be a member) said, that commercial regulations had been previously and expressly given to Congress, and to them secured. Under that conception I was in its favor; but should have been opposed to it upon the other construction. I yet think that is the true construction. In the explanation of a statute, it is proper to examine the evil and the remedy, and to reconcile the seeming inconsistency, which can be done in no other way than by this construction.

I considered that the Executive had absolute power to make peace, as by the Constitution he is declared Commander-in-Chief of all the Armies, his situation enabled him to be the best judge of the forces and of the force he had to contend with, and as secrecy was necessary to effecting a Treaty of Peace, that power was properly vested in him, guarded by two-thirds of the Senate. But a Treaty of Commerce presupposes an existing peace, and in those Treaties secrecy is not essential; but a competent knowledge of the produce of the respective States in all their remote situations was necessary; which would be best obtained by an association of the three branches of Government.

This is a Treaty of Commerce, and therefore has involved legislative objects. It consequently requires Legislative sanction; a contrary construction would be a violation of the Constitution and of the principles upon which it was adopted, and therefore a violation of the rights of the people.

I confess, on viewing the exception and force of the argument, that I had some doubt, that when the Government became old and corrupt, that this perversion might be attempted; but had no idea that in the course of six years it would be contended for.

A view of mutual interests excites individuals and nations to form intercourse and commercial contracts. So long as the end corresponds with the design, the firm should exist and no longer; when either or both are dissatisfied, reason would dictate a dissolution. Nor can this with individuals or nations be a just cause of quarrel or war, but often the best way to preserve peace. It is not enough for me to know that this Treaty did happen, but I wish to know the causes that produced it, which will best be known by advert- ing to the papers contemplated in the resolution.

A gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. Buck] in the commencement of this debate, has said that the Treaty was now the law of the land, after having been concurred in by two-thirds of the Senate and ratified by the President. It was subverting the first principles of our Government, and to oppose was rebellion; and more particularly as it was officially laid on the table and promulgated by the President's Proclamation. To use his language, it struck like thunder—appeared like the majesty of Heaven.

I would beg leave to observe to that gentleman, that as to the majesty of Heaven, I lack a simile, not being acquainted with the gods. But with respect to thunder, I have some knowledge of its operation; when it strikes a sensible object it destroys sensibility. If it has had that effect upon that gentleman, unless he has recovered, he is yet unfit for a legislator. I would only further observe, that if the Treaty was not the law of the land, the Proclamation did not make it so. I should not have observed on the gentleman from Vermont, but for the eulogium given by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. W. SMITH] who had said, that his speech was of such dignity that an attempt to repeat it would lessen the original.

I have been told it has been a custom in this House, when persons have conspicuously discharged their duty to give them the thanks of the House, I wish to indicate to the gentleman, that he was unauthorized to communicate mine.

Another gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] said, when this motion was first made, he thought it immaterial, but now he thinks it a violation of the rights of the Executive. How gentlemen can so suddenly change their opinions from one extreme to the other, I am at a loss to conceive. I, generally, have discovered that in all common occurrences, things present themselves (as to substance) right in the first instance; there may be some change with respect to form. Nor can I conceive any other cause than a recollection of the necessity of guards to prerogative.

I yet think it a modest and reasonable request, and in that point of view, I trust, will the President consider it. He will recollect that we are the Representatives of the people, and that we cannot discharge our duty by knowing that this Treaty did happen, but by being acquainted with the causes that produced it, whether by accident, design, or necessity. If by accident, we are not bound; if by design, and the motives corrupt, it is a nullity; fraud contaminates a private contract, according to Vattel; if by necessity, and that can be known, it will be a sufficient apology, and we will submit to it. Under these considerations, with those that have been offered, I am conclusively in favor of the resolution.

Mr. BRADBURY observed, that the most plausible reason that he had heard in support of the resolution under the consideration of the Committee, resulted from a principle advanced by a member from Pennsylvania, who spoke upon the subject last week. The principle was this; that where any articles of a Treaty were repugnant to prior existing acts of Congress, those acts must first be repealed by Congress before such Treaty can become the law of the land; and it was said some of the articles of the British Treaty were of this nature. He would not stay to examine the truth of the fact, for admitting it to be true, he altogether denied the principle; but yet he acknowledged that if it could be made out, it would afford the best reason yet given for calling for the papers. If their concurrence was necessary to give existence or legality to the Treaty, he saw not why they ought not to be favored with the papers as well as the Senate. But he asserted, and would endeavor to prove, that the Treaty has already a legal existence; that it is now the law of the land; and that, therefore, no act of Congress is, or can be, necessary to make it so; and, therefore, that House could have no need of the papers, nor any right to call for them on that ground.

That the Treaty had already become the law of the land, and that no Legislative act of Congress was necessary to make it so, he argued wholly from the Constitution itself, by which alone the question must at last be determined.

That instrument expressly declares, that all Treaties made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land. He laid no stress upon the word supreme, admitting for argument sake, that the supremacy ascribed to the Constitution and laws, and Treaties made under it, meant a supremacy over the Constitution and laws of individual States.* All he asked to be granted him, and which he thought could not be denied, was that a Treaty made under the authority of the United States was the law of the land. If so, then all that needed to be proved was, that a Treaty made by the PRESIDENT, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, was a Treaty made under the authority of the United States. And to prove that, he needed only to mention another clause in the Constitution, which expressly declares that the PRESIDENT, with such advice and consent, shall have the power to make Treaties.

If then the United States, by their Constitution, have authorized the PRESIDENT, with such advice and consent, to make a Treaty, and if he, with such advice and consent, has in fact made one with Great Britain, then that Treaty is made under the authority of the United States, and if so, then it is the law of the land.† This reasoning appeared to him to be plain and conclusive. The consequence could not be denied or evaded. If so, the principle asserted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania must fall to the ground. The Constitution neither expresses nor countenances such a principle. If it had intended that a Legislative act in that case should be necessary to complete the contract, it would have expressed that intention by an express proviso; for it is a case that must often happen in making of Treaties, and which must have been contemplated when the Constitution was made. Instead of which the Constitution declares, that Treaties, all Treaties, without exception or limitation, made under the authority of the United States, (and he had proved that Treaty to be so made,) shall be the law of the land; but this principle teaches and asserts, that they shall not be the law of the land, although so made, until sanctioned by an act of the Legislature. It was not possible to reconcile the doctrine with the Constitution; they were contradictory in fact as well as in terms. He added, that if a Treaty was the law of the land, it must necessarily, upon its becoming so, repeal and annul all previous acts and laws repug-

* Though this be admitted here, for argument sake, yet it is easy to show that the declaration in the Constitution, "This Constitution and the Laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land," is to be considered as a declaration of the supremacy of the Constitution, and the laws made under it, while in force, and of all Treaties made or to be made under the authority of the United States, as well over the general Federal Government, as over the Constitution and laws of the individual States. The meaning is, that they shall all be supreme, not only over the General Government, of which there could be no room to doubt, though not expressed, but also over the Constitution and laws of every State in the Union, of which there might have been some pretence to doubt, had it not been expressed.

† The words, "made under the authority of the United States," were evidently chosen instead of the words "made by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate," because they were to refer to Treaties then already made, as well as to such as should be thereafter made, the former not having been made by the President, but by Congress, but both might truly be said to be made under the authority of the United States. There is no color for the assertion made by Mr. Gallatin, that they were used to express or imply the idea that "a Treaty clashing in any of its provisions with the express powers of Congress, would not, until it so far should have obtained the sanction of Congress, be a Treaty made under the authority of the United States."

nant to it: here the maxim of law strictly applies, leges posteriores priores contrarius abrogant. If it did not, it could not be the law of the land; for, if former acts repugnant to it were still in force, they must still necessarily be superior to it, and prevent its operation, and a law that cannot operate is no law.

It was acknowledged by the same gentleman, that an act of Congress could not repeal a Treaty, because it was a contract made with another party. Nor, said that gentleman, can a Treaty repeal a law, because Congress made it, and their consent is necessary to repeal what they have made. But he denied the consequence. It does not follow that an act of Congress is necessary to repeal a law, because they made it. The Constitution may, without absurdity, authorize another distinct power to repeal an act of Congress; and it is still a question of fact whether they had or not. He contended that they had in the case of a Treaty.

To prove his proposition, that gentleman had observed, "That in the first section of the Constitution, all Legislative power therein mentioned was given to Congress; yet in the last section but one the Constitution says, Treaties shall be the supreme law of the land, though made by the PRESIDENT and Senate. A Legislative power is thus given them after all Legislative power was vested in Congress, as if there were two Legislative powers. How were these powers to be reconciled?" He answered, the latter particular power was an exception to the former general power. If a Treaty is a law, then the making it is a Legislative act, by what power soever made, call it Executive, or what you please. If a general unlimited power of legislation be given to Congress, and afterwards a particular power to legislate in a particular case is given to the PRESIDENT, it must operate as an exception to the general power; this will reconcile the two powers.

But it is said, if this be the case, then the Executive may grasp all Legislative power, and repeal all acts of Congress, by making an insignificant Indian tribe a party to a Treaty. He answered, that the Supreme Executive must be very weak as well as wicked, to make use of an Indian Treaty as an instrument to repeal all acts of Congress. What consideration could be held forth by an insignificant Indian tribe as an equivalent for so great a sacrifice? The fraud must appear on the face of the Treaty, and would defeat his intentions. This Treaty-making power given to the Supreme Executive by the Constitution, was, he acknowledged, a very large and important power; but no argument could be drawn against its existence from the possibility of its being abused. It was fully considered when the Constitution was made, that the Treaty power was a great and important power, and the giving it to the Supreme Executive without defining or limiting it, was one great objection to the Constitution. But it was then justly observed, and more especially in the Debates of the Virginia Convention, that it was a power that could not well be placed in Congress nor anywhere else, so well as in the Supreme Executive; and that, in its nature, it could not be limited, except perhaps that it ought not to extend to the dismemberment of the empire. This last sentiment is ascribed to a learned and respectable character, who was now a member of that House; but, in the present debate that gentleman had declared, that he now hesitated not to say, that they ought not to admit the Treaty-making power to be unlimited. How this could be reconciled with his former sentiment, if it were rightly ascribed to him, he was unable to say. He presumed the gentleman had altered his opinion.

H. OF R.]:

The fatal consequences which might flow from the abuse of this power, have been painted by the same gentleman in strong colors; but those consequences were considered as possible when the Constitution was formed; notwithstanding which, it was judged necessary to lodge this power in the Supreme Executive, without attempting to limit it as to its object. And it cannot be limited by anything but the Constitution; no laws inconsistent with that can be passed, either by the Treaty or Legislative power. And the only other checks he could find on this power of the Supreme Executive in the Constitution, were the requiring the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate; and impeachments against both, for abuse of power, vested in that House.

He nowhere read in the Constitution that any act of Congress, in any possible case, was necessary to make a Treaty, so as that without it such Treaty could not be the law of the land. He nowhere read that prior acts of Congress repugnant to a Treaty must first be repealed before a Treaty could be a law.

But, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the same Treaty power is given to the King by the Constitution and laws of England, that is given to the PRESIDENT by our Constitution, and yet the Parliament have the power there which he contends for in favor of Congress here; that is, they must repeal prior laws repugnant to a new Treaty, before it can be the law of the land; and why is not an act of Congress, it is asked, necessary for the same purpose, in a similar case here? He would answer, because our Constitution is different from the British in this respect: it declares that a Treaty made under the authority of the United States, (and he had shown that a Treaty made by the PRESIDENT, as aforesaid, was made under such authority,) is the law of the land, and if it is a law, nothing further can be requisite to make it so. There was no such declaration in the Constitution and laws of England.

There was no arguing from the power of Parliament to the power of Congress. The Parliament must have controlled this Treaty power of the King, and stripped him of his prerogative, by use and custom. There had been in England a constant struggle between power and privilege; the prerogatives of the King were not founded in the grant of the people; they were founded on force, on the right of conquest; whatever therefore, was gained from the King by the Commons, was considered as so much gained by the people from an adverse power.

If the PRESIDENT were an hereditary monarch, deriving his power from his predecessors by descent, a power originally founded in conquest, Congress would do well to get as much of it out of his hands as they could. It would here be, as it was there, a struggle between prerogative and privilege, it would be the people against the King. But as this was not the case, and as Congress never had in fact assumed and exercised the power of confirming by an act of theirs, Treaties made by the PRESIDENT, this argument from analogy wholly failed.

Suppose the Parliament of Great Britain should pass a law, expressly delegating the Treaty-making power to the King, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of his Privy Council, and should declare in the act, that a Treaty made under such authority, should be the supreme law of the land. They claim a right to make such a law, for Judge Blackstone affirms, that the denial of a power in every Government, even to alter every part of its Constitution, is the height of political absurdity; and in England, he expressly ascribes this power to Parliament.

What would be the effect of such an act of Parliament? Would not a Treaty made under it be clearly the law of England? and would not all acts of Parliament, prior and repugnant to it, be repealed by it? He was clearly of opinion they would; and this clause, he said, was inserted in the American Constitution, probably to guard against that very construction which is now endeavored to be put upon the Treaty power; on purpose to cut off all pretence of a power in Congress to control a Treaty, by refusing to repeal any prior laws that might stand in the way of it.

But, said the same gentleman, shall a British House of Commons have this right of controlling the Treaty-making power, and shall it be denied to the Representatives of a free people? He answered, the PRESIDENT and Senate of the United States were as much the Representatives of a free people as that House was; they were as truly, though not so immediately, chosen by the people as they were. The people distributed their powers as they pleased. The PRESIDENT, said he, represents the people as their executive agent, and is possessed of all executive power, and the power of making Treaties. The true question, then was, shall one constituted representative authority usurp the power and control the acts assigned by the Constitution to another representative authority of the same free people? They certainly ought not. If they should attempt it, it would be opposing one authority of the people to another. It would be dividing a free people against itself. But he hoped he had said enough to show the unsoundness of that principle, and fully to establish what he first undertook to prove, that the Treaty was already completed; that it was already the law of the land; and that, it did, by its own force, repeal all prior laws, if there were any standing in the way of it; and if so, they could have no need of the papers to assist them in making it a law. It had also been laid by the King before his Parliament, and he supposed the necessary appropriations had been made to carry it into effect. He did not know that any other Parliamentary provision was necessary.

But it may be said, that it is fit and proper that they should call for the papers mentioned in the resolution, even if the Treaty were law, because appropriations by act of Congress would be necessary to carry it into effect, and they ought to have the papers to judge whether it be fit for them to make those appropriations.

He answered, whether that be fit or not, in his opinion, must depend wholly upon the Treaty or law itself, and upon nothing out of it. It was like all other laws requiring appropriations, in making which they must be governed by a sound and legal discretion, and that discretion must be governed by the instrument itself.

Even if a question should arise, and be proper for the discussion of that House, on the constitutionality of the Treaty, yet that question must be decided by the Treaty itself, and by nothing else; and there could be no need of any papers for that purpose. If general information were the object, to allay the public sensibility, he should think the better way would be to request the PRESIDENT to publish the papers in all the newspapers throughout the United States. But he believed he must be considered as the best judge in that matter. He would only add, that the correspondence between their Envoy and the British Minister was, in its nature, secret and confidential. It was communicated to the Senate because they were a part of the Treaty-making power, which the House was not; but even to them it was communicated in confidence. A request to the PRESIDENT, said he, to communicate these papers, amounts to a requirement; but there can be no right to require where there is no obligation to obey.

The request may place the PRESIDENT in a disagreeable situation. He is undoubtedly disposed to gratify the House in every request as far as his duty will permit; but where there is so much doubt, respecting his duty in this case, he hoped they would never reduce him to the disagreeable alternative, either by the violation of what he might esteem his duty, to gratify the House, or by observing it, to give offence.

The great and only question, after all, he conceived, would be upon the nature and extent of their discretion in making the appropriations necessary to carry the Treaty into effect. They must, upon a view of the Treaty, determine whether they will make such appropriation or not; and, in determining that question, they must, as he had before observed, exercise sound, legal discretion. If it be a law of the land, as he had endeavored to prove it was, they should exercise the same discretion as they do in passing all other appropriation laws.

He was ready, for his own part, to admit that a Treaty, though made according to all the forms of the Constitution, might be so bad, so pernicious to the interests and rights of the people, as to justify that House in refusing to lend their aid towards carrying it into effect, so pernicious as to justify the Legislature in declaring by law that they would not fulfil nor be bound by it. If any future PRESIDENT and Senate should become so corrupt and wicked, as to form an alliance by Treaty with a foreign nation at war, and contract to become a party to such war, and to furnish such nation with a large body of troops, to be transported across the Atlantic, a case that had been put, he should think that such a Treaty, made against the general sense of the people, and manifestly against the public interest, would be an abuse of power, and one of those extraordinary cases that might justify the Legislature in refusing to carry it into effect. But cases of this kind are not to be supposed, and cannot be easily defined; nor is there any necessity of attempting to ascertain the extent or limits of the discretionary power of the House with respect to such cases.

It was sufficient to observe, in general, that as, by Treaty, the honor and public faith of a nation were pledged and at stake, and that, as its character and reputation depended so much upon good faith, and the due observance of public engagements with other Powers, it must be a very extraordinary case, indeed, that could justify a violation of such an engagement. Such a case, he trusted, was not the present. But he would not then trouble the Committee with any further observations on that point, because he did not conceive that it had any necessary relation to the resolution before the Committee.

He confessed he was very sorry this resolution had not been either postponed or withdrawn. It had carried them into a wide field of controversy, and led into a premature and lengthy discussion of important questions, upon an important subject, which would not be decided by the discussion, but still lie open to debate, which ever way the question upon the resolution might be decided. He hoped, however, some light would be thrown upon the main subject by the present debate, and if so, their time and labor would not be entirely lost.

Mr. RUTHERFORD.—I beg leave to make a few observations, and I briefly declare that I am neither in the temper of picking or breaking locks, nor of blind or passive obedience. The majesty of this great people justly entitles them to all possible publicity; more they do not desire, nor do their Representatives expect or desire more. Therefore, it is with much concern I discover good patriots alarmed, and deceiving themselves into sophistries, by considering this great subject as finally decided upon, and completely finished, while they entertain fears for the Federal compact; fears, though unfounded, that originate in a very laudable sentiment. But where is the man, possessing moderate abilities and a love for his country, that will not readily allow the Union (as the jolly sailors term it) to be the sheet-anchor of these States; and that the great family cannot divide and yet stand? a circumstance, indeed, which would be pleasing to such as view us with malignant eyes. What is intended by the resolution before you? Mere information respecting the important business of the Treaty in question, and expressed in terms so replete with due respect to that generous patriot—submitting all to his caution, his great prudence, and good sense—that I trust, when gentlemen recur to their own minds, every doubt will vanish. I am well aware of the warm patriotism of gentlemen, and it would therefore be indelicate to warn them religiously against everything that may be construed as a spirit of party. No violence or indelicacy is meant, in the least, against the PRESIDENT or the Senate. All consider the PRESIDENT with lively, grateful, and generous sensibility. No change in the Federal compact is here intended, till the sovereign people shall deem it necessary deliberately and constitutionally so to do; and, therefore, arguments on that head are fallacious, to say the least. The Treaty, when it becomes the subject of debate, is to be considered with great moderation, on Constitutional ground, and under the auspices of justice and right reason. The matter is, nevertheless, serious, weighty, and very important; involving no less than the sovereign rights of a virtuous, great, and rising people, who, under Divine favor, have triumphed for their fair and generous patriot partners, their tender children, and all posterity. None, I trust, will contend, before the people and all the observing world, that this branch of the great National Council have not complete control over the commerce, naturalization, &c., of the United States. Much stress has been laid on the patriotism of the PRESIDENT, which makes it necessary for me to reply, lest I am taken for one uninformed. I have had the honor of the PRESIDENT'S acquaintance well nigh, or quite, forty-four years, and he has supported every character with merit, dignity, and unwearied attention. I have acted with him on trying occasions, sometimes equal, oftentimes in a subordinate sphere; and though senior in point of years, yet I uniformly looked up to him as a parent, my head, and my guide; yet I am independent of the PRESIDENT—an unchangeable friendship only excepted. My principles I shall avow without fear or shame, and I am conscious they are not unpleasing to that honest man, who will, I am well assured, come forward with his wonted purity, (though his task has been very arduous,) and will do what is prudent, right, and necessary, and no more. Why did this our common parent, the dignified servant of the people, submit his Treaty to these his fellow-servants? Surely, to obtain their aid in this great national concern. He is not governed by light rules of action. Why then hesitate or tremble? Are we not the legitimate Representatives of a magnanimous people, who desire nothing but equal justice, and therefore really have nothing to dread in contending with becoming firmness in support of their just rights. I did not intend to touch the merits of the Treaty, nor shall I now enlarge, though a case presents itself to my mind, which seems to me to be in point. We will suppose that the immortal FRANKLIN, and other patriots, had been managed out of the American independence in the Treaty of 1783, after torrents of heroic blood had been spilled on the cold earth, so much treasure lavished, and a horrid war, with all its concomitants, had existed eight years. Had such been the case, would not the same brave people, though small in number, sore and wearied, have rushed again to arms with one voice? An answer is unnecessary. One word more, which is submitted to candor: Is not equality and mutual benefits the great basis of justice? Was this Treaty obtained on this equal ground? This also requires no reply. Then, why should the American people, who wish not to interfere with European politics, further than prudence and the warmest calls of gratitude dictate, prostrate themselves to obtain a losing commerce? And shall they dread being dragooned into this losing trade? No, never, I hope and trust. This same commerce is a pretty thing to a few individuals, indeed it is mirth and gladness to such, while it is a slow though certain political death to the common interest. Though I highly regard that people, I would not have the American people imploring, as a boon, to be the painful, adventurous collectors for that people; and after obtaining treasure from other nations, cast it into their coffers, and at the feet of their merchants. Surely the Government of that country are too wise, magnanimous, and just, to attempt forcing this losing commerce. I shall not dwell on the futility of such a project, and only observe, that it would divert the present current of commerce, and of course it would never fall again into the same channel; especially as the people of these States neither wish nor desire anything repugnant to reason, justice, and good neighborhood. Have the terms of the Treaty of 1783 been observed with good faith? I shall not reply. The field is wide, much might be said; and when the Treaty is the subject, I shall be more full, if opportunity presents.

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

MARCH 15.—In Committee of the Whole on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolutions.

MR. PAGE spoke as follows: I confess, sir, that I had wished that this House, instead of asking the PRESIDENT for information respecting the negotiation and ratification of the Treaty, at this late day of its session, had given him, as soon as possible after its meeting, fully their opinions, and that of their constituents, respecting the Treaty itself. But, as time has been afforded for deliberation, and the House has waited most patiently and respectfully till the PRESIDENT could "place the subject before them," according to his promise in his Address to Congress, I think they have shown a spirit of moderation which deserves credit. The friends of the Treaty cannot complain that it has been hastily and rudely attacked, and should not object to the request which is proposed to be made to the PRESIDENT, to furnish a statement of facts which, from what has been said elsewhere, may be supposed sufficient to silence the most clamorous opposers of the Treaty. I have been astonished, therefore, to find that several members have most strenuously opposed the application to the PRESIDENT, as an insult to him; as useless and unconstitutional, unless intended as the foundation of an impeachment of him, of his Envoy, or of the twenty Senators; and, lastly, as founded on a mistaken supposition, that the Treaty is unconstitutional. In reply, sir, to these objections, I remark, that the idea of its being an insult to the PRESIDENT must be founded on a mistaken opinion of the Constitutional powers of the PRESIDENT and of the House of Representatives, and of the relation the PRESIDENT and Representatives have to each other, under the Constitution of the United States; for unhappily the ideas which some members have adopted, respecting the authority of our Executive, are derived from a recollection of what was the Executive authority in the Government under which we once lived, and of what they have read in books written to support that Government. But there cannot be a greater error than to adopt these ideas; for the Executive authority of the United States, flowing from the people, the PRESIDENT, or person invested with that authority, elected by them, at short stated periods, allowed only a limited negative on the laws of Congress, for which negative too he is to give reasons, which, if not satisfactory to two-thirds of both Houses, are to be disregarded, and the law is to be valid without his assent; restrained from creating offices, giving salaries, or making war, and bound to give account of the state of the Union to Congress, and moreover impeachable by the House of Representatives, and triable by the Senate,—cannot be compared to one of those monarchs who hold their kingdoms and subjects by hereditary right; to whom all property and power originally are supposed to belong; from whom all honor and authority flow; who can declare war and make peace, and to sanction whose acts of sovereignty it has been thought prudent to affirm that they can do no wrong: I say, sir, that there can be no resemblance between such an awe-commanding being, and our fellow-citizen, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; and that it could be no insult to him, to ask him for information respecting an important transaction, in which his constituents and this House are deeply interested; for such requests are made even to the British King. If the Constitution requires that the PRESIDENT shall give an account of the state of the Union to Congress unasked, it should not be said that it is unconstitutional for this House to ask for information; especially as it is acknowledged, by the very objection itself, that such information may be demanded, if it be intended as the foundation of an impeachment; and if it is confessed that it may be useful in case of an impeachment, it must be a contradiction to say, that it is useless to call for it; and especially as, independent of an intention to make this use of it, we have been told that it may silence clamors against the Treaty. The application, therefore, to the PRESIDENT, as proposed in the resolution, is neither an insult to him, nor useless, nor unconstitutional; but, on the contrary, is sufficiently decent, may be useful, and is perfectly within the spirit, and, I may say, the letter of the Constitution, should it be found necessary to apply it to an impeachment. But we have been told that the Treaty being Constitutional, and the Treaty-making power out of the reach of this House, we have nothing to do with any information respecting the Treaty, and that the PRESIDENT having issued his proclamation declaring the Treaty ratified, it is now the supreme law of the land, and it is rebellion to oppose it. As to the constitutionality of the Treaty, I did think that when that subject should be brought before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it would be the only proper time to examine it; but, as it has been forced upon the present Committee, I will take the liberty which has been used by others, and show what I think at present respecting it.

I think that the Treaty is Constitutional, as far as relates to the powers of the contracting parties to make Treaties; and is Constitutional and valid, also, as far as relates to that part of it which gives it the name of a Treaty of Amity, and which might be in a separate and distinct Treaty by itself; for the PRESIDENT, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators present, has an undoubted authority, under the express words in the first article of the Constitution, to make Treaties. And I have no doubt that the Treaties which were in the view of the framers of that article, must have been principally Treaties of Peace, of Amity, of Neutrality, or of Alliance. This is the more probable, as the first and principal Treaties in which nations were concerned, were Treaties of Peace, or Treaties to secure the blessings of peace; and it is certain that the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain was the very Treaty which gave rise to the declaration of the Constitution, that all Treaties made and to be made by the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land; for the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain was said to be in a state of inexecution on account of an obstruction thrown in the way by the laws of certain States. This article, therefore, was intended to remove all obstacles, which had arisen or might arise from State Legislatures, and might, I will here remark, as easily have been extended to remove all obstructions from the General Legislature by adding to the words “any Constitution or law of the States;” these words, “or the Constitution or laws of the United States notwithstanding.” The power to make Treaties of Commerce and Navigation, I humbly conceive, could scarcely be within the view and design of the Convention, at least not as a primary object, when they formed the articles respecting Treaties; because they knew, that the extent, situation, population, and productions of the United States, were such as would command them a sufficient share of the commerce of the world, without the aid of commercial Treaties. They knew that almost all Europe stood in need of their productions, and that Great Britain and her islands could scarcely exist without them; they knew more, they knew this, sir, that the almost universal belief of their constituents, that giving a power to Congress to regulate commerce, which would answer every purpose of Commercial Treaties, gave existence to the very powers under which they were acting at the moment they framed that article.* This mode of regulating commerce was favored by the opinion of the people, who celebrated the adoption of the Constitution with so much exultation and expensive parade in the great commercial cities of the United States. They had no doubt that the new Congress would use the power with which it was invested, so as to oblige Great Britain to open her ports to them in the West Indies, and to put their trade with them upon a more equitable and stable footing. Indeed, sir, the people thought, as associations not to import certain articles from Great Britain, entered into by them when they were poor helpless Colonists, with hal-

* APRIL 30, 1784.—Congress assembled—present eleven States. Congress took into consideration the report of a committee consisting of Messrs. GERRY, READ, WILLIAMSON, CHASE, and JEFFERSON, to whom were referred sundry letters and papers relative to commercial matters, and the following paragraph being under debate: "That it be recommended to the Legislatures of the several States, to vest the United States in Congress assembled, for the term of fifteen years, with a power to prohibit any goods, wares, or merchandise, from being imported into any of the States, except in vessels belonging to, and navigated by citizens of the United States, or the subjects of foreign Powers with whom the United States may have Treaties of Commerce;"

A motion was made by Mr. HOWELL, seconded by Mr. ELLERY, to postpone the consideration thereof, in order to take up the following: "That it be recommended to the Legislatures of the several States, to restrain, by imposts or prohibition, any goods, wares, or merchandise, from being imported into them respectively, except in vessels belonging to, and navigated by, citizens of the United States, or the subjects of foreign Powers with whom the United States may have Treaties of Commerce, or the subjects of such foreign Powers as may admit of reciprocity in their trade with the citizens of those States. That it be recommended to the Legislatures of the several States, to prohibit the subjects of any foreign State, Kingdom, or Empire, from importing into them respectively, any goods, wares, or merchandise, unless such as are the produce or manufacture of the State, Kingdom, or Empire, whose subjects they are." And on the question to postpone, for the purpose above mentioned, the yeas and nays being required by Mr. ELLERY, it passed in the negative. The report being amended, was agreed to, as follows:

The trust reposed in Congress, renders it their duty to be attentive to the conduct of foreign nations, and to prevent or restrain, as far as may be, all such proceedings as might prove injurious to the United States. The situation of commerce at this time claims the attention of the several States, and few objects of greater importance can present themselves to their notice. The fortune of every citizen is interested in the success thereof; for it is the constant source of wealth and incentive to industry; and the value of our produce and our land must ever rise or fall in proportion to the prosperous or adverse state of trade.

Already has Great Britain adopted regulations destructive of our commerce with her West India Islands. There was reason to expect that measures so unequal, and so little calculated to promote mercantile intercourse, would not be persevered in by an enlightened nation; but these measures are growing into a system. It would be the duty of Congress, as it is their wish, to meet the attempts of Great Britain with similar restrictions on her commerce; but their powers on this head are not explicit, and the propositions made by the several States, render it necessary to take the general sense of the Union on this subject. Unless the United States in Congress assembled shall be vested with powers competent to the protection of commerce, they can never command reciprocal advantages in trade; and without these, our foreign commerce must decline, and eventually be annihilated. Hence, it is necessary that the States should be explicit, and fix on some effectual mode by which foreign commerce, not founded on principles of equality, may be restrained. That the United States may be enabled to secure such terms, they have RESOLVED, That it be, and it hereby is, recommended to the Legislatures of the several States to vest the United States in Congress assembled, for the term of fifteen years, with power to prohibit any goods, wares, or merchandise, from being imported into, or exported from, any of the States, in vessels belonging to, or navigated by, the subjects of any Power with whom the States shall not have formed Treaties of commerce. RESOLVED, That it be, and it hereby is, recommended to the Legislatures of the several States to vest in the United States in Congress assembled, for the term of fifteen years, with the power of prohibiting the subjects of any foreign State, Kingdom, or Empire, unless authorized by Treaty, from importing into the United States any goods, wares, or merchandise, which are not the produce or manufacture of the dominions of the Sovereign whose subjects they are.

ters about their necks, repealed the Stamp act that acts of Congress regulating commerce, so as to retaliate on Great Britain, would at least prevent the enacting of the law by which the British King was authorized to regulate the commerce of the U. States with Great Britain and her Islands.

I acknowledge, sir, that whenever a Treaty is to be made, the PRESIDENT and Senate are the proper agents to make it. I think it an excellence in our Constitution that the PRESIDENT and Senate, though not allowed to declare war, have authority to put a stop to its horrors. This is a wise provision against the injury which the pride and ambition of the larger States might do to the smaller, by continuing a war. But I cannot conceive that when Congress is authorized to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect all the powers granted by the Constitution, the Treaty-making power as well as others, and are to provide for the general welfare, which is not confided to the PRESIDENT and Senate, nor can be intrusted to them alone by the people upon any principle which has ever had weight in the formation of a Republican Government, I cannot conceive, I say, that as this is the case, and the House of Representatives is composed of members proportioned to a certain ratio of the number of persons to be represented, and has the sole right to originate money bills, how it can possibly be supposed that the PRESIDENT and Senate, without their concurrence, can make regulations of commerce, which may be injurious to the general welfare, ruinous to the commerce of certain, and even the largest, States; and by a Treaty, too, which may, moreover, deprive that House, which, by the supposition of those who have defended the Treaty is at least a Committee of Ways and Means, (and, indeed, nothing more) of the resources of revenue to which, by the Constitution, they might have recourse.

Sir, the supposition that the PRESIDENT and Senate can make such a Treaty as the one before us, under the authority of the Constitution, is, to my mind, the most inconsistent and extravagant that I ever heard or read of; and, if true, the most positive proof of the absurdity of the Constitution, and of the propriety and necessity of its immediate alteration. But, sir, I think the Constitution is capable of a construction which will reconcile it, not only to reason, but to true Republican principles. The PRESIDENT and Senate can guard the smaller States against the encroachments of the larger; they can moderate the mistaken zeal of the popular branch of the Legislature; they can prevent, as they have done, or as they supposed they had done, a rash vote of this House from taking effect; they may negotiate Treaties of Amity and Neutrality, and of Commerce and Navigation, with the previous or subsequent consent of Congress; but, surely, sir, it does not follow, that they can take away from this House, and from a future Congress, a right to express their will, and the will of the United States, in a law; nor that they can, instead of securing the rights of neutrality with all the belligerent Powers, sacrifice those rights in favor of one of those Powers, and provoke another to make war on the United States. These are powers which they cannot possess, and, indeed, which the Constitution neither gives nor can give, because it would be destructive of itself and of its original intention. But it is said the words are general. It is true they are so; but it has been well replied, that, although they are general, there are other expressions which, giving specific powers to the House of Representatives, to Congress, to the PRESIDENT, and to the Judiciary, must, upon the well-known principles of construction, be looked upon as a reservation and exception out of the general grant of power to make Treaties, given to the PRESIDENT and Senate.

No rule of construction is more universally known and established in explaining any Constitution, law, contract, or Treaty than this: that the whole must be taken together, and whatever seeming contradiction may appear in different parts, those parts must be construed so, if possible, as to be consistent with each other, and with the whole; and by no means so as to contradict the general tenor and design of the whole instrument; for it is absurd to suppose that contradictions or even unmeaning provisions could be designedly inserted in such instruments of writing. The Constitution has defined the powers of the different branches of Government. To the Executive it has given a power to make Treaties, to pardon, in certain cases, and to execute the laws; to Congress, a right to lay and collect taxes, duties, impost, and excise; to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; to regulate commerce with foreign nations; to establish one uniform rule of naturalization throughout the States; to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the Law of Nations; to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal; to establish offices and salaries of officers, and to appropriate money, &c., and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department thereof. To the Judiciary, it gives a right to judge of all cases in law or equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, &c. These powers are perfectly distinct from each other, and may be all exercised without any clashing or interference. For the PRESIDENT and Senate may make Treaties of Peace, when Congress is not in session, or if in session, should Congress be inattentive to the distresses of war, they may make Treaties of Neutrality and Alliance, but not such Treaties as shall abridge the power, or interfere with the Constitutional jurisdiction of Congress or of the Judiciary.

The Judges may decide on cases arising under Treaties made according to the Constitution, and Congress may and ought to pass laws to carry into effect all such Treaties, provided they are not inconsistent with the general welfare, for which it is their Constitutional duty to provide, and which is not confided to the PRESIDENT and Senate by the Constitution, nor can be intrusted to them alone by the people upon any principle which has ever had weight in the formation of a Republican Government. If it be said that this construction of our Constitution will render it difficult to form and ratify Treaties, it may be answered, that there may be difficulties, but there will be no absurdities; and when once those difficulties are removed there will be no danger of discontent and infraction of Treaties.

But we are told, sir, that the power given to Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce cannot extend to that regulation which depends upon the will of a foreign nation or Government, and which can only be regulated by compact, or by the Treaty-making or pactitious Powers. Granting that this assertion be true, which, however, may be denied, as the general belief which I have alluded to, and on which the existence of the present Government was founded, seemed to contradict it; for it was almost universally believed that an act of Congress regulating the commerce of the United States with Great Britain, as had been proposed to the former Congress, or Congress under the Confederation, or as proposed to this House on the 3d of January, 1794, and well known by the name of MADISON's propositions, or as proposed by Mr. CLARK, 7th April, 1794, would have brought about a more advantageous commercial intercourse with Great Britain than any direct negotiation with the British Ministry. It was thought highly probable that the Parliament of Great Britain would (if any of these propositions had been adopted by Congress) have refused to have renewed their act, by which the trade with these United States (as if they were more degraded than Colonies) was regulated by the King's Proclamation. I say, granting, however, that assertion to be true, how does it prove, or what other assertion can prove, that Congress has not a right, under the express words of the Constitution, which declares that it shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to be a party to that compact, or to have some share, either previously or subsequently, in the Treaty-making business, when it regulates the commerce of the United States with foreign Powers?

I may agree that a Treaty is necessary to establish a commercial intercourse between two nations, to their mutual advantage and satisfaction, but I must affirm, that as that Treaty would be a commercial regulation, and as Congress is expressly empowered by the Constitution to regulate commerce, whenever such Treaty shall be made between the United States and any other nation, Congress must either direct that the negotiation be commenced upon conditions approved, or sanction the ratification of such Treaty by some act showing that the regulation of commerce, by the Treaty, was made by the authority of Congress, in conformity to the Constitution.

Besides, sir, if the PRESIDENT and Senate can regulate the commerce of the United States with one nation, they can with all nations, and if they can with all, what nation can there be with whom

H. OF R.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[MARCH, 1796.]

Congress can regulate commerce? This argument, therefore, must fall to the ground. We are told, however, that the Treaty-making power, from its nature, is competent to all the objects at least of the Treaty under consideration, and is not to be controlled or checked by this House. Let me examine this assertion. If this be true, sir, we find that, although the British King, from whose tyranny we revolted, cannot force upon his subjects, against the will of their Representatives, a Treaty, which, it is acknowledged, too, he has a right to make, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES can, by his Proclamation, force upon the people who are his constituents, a Treaty which their direct Representatives wish to suspend, alter, or annul. Can this possibly be a true construction of the Treaty-making power? Surely it cannot. If it be true, then, can the PRESIDENT repeal, as he has by the Treaty, the laws of Congress, although by the Constitution he cannot negative them? He can oblige Congress to levy taxes; can withdraw impost and tonnage from their reach; prohibit the exportation of sundry articles, the produce of the United States, although the Constitution forbids, the Senate and Representatives concurring, to lay the smallest duty on the exportation of any article; he can create offices and annex salaries thereto; destroy the rights of this House; provoke war; in short, he can do any thing; but this we are sworn to deny. The absurdity of that construction, then, must be evident, and the recollection of our oaths to support the Constitution, of which we have been reminded, must force us to revolt at the thoughts of adopting such a monstrous construction of the Constitution. We are reminded also of the PRESIDENT's Proclamation. I will attend to it. I look upon it as a proper notification of the ratification of the Treaty of Amity with Great Britain, but it can have no effect on the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, till sanctioned by the votes of Congress. The evacuation of the posts on our frontiers, held by the British, if intended in consequence of the Treaty of Amity, ought to take place, or if in conformity to the Treaty of Peace; but, if intended as a compliance with conditions annexed to the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, good faith requires that they ought not to be evacuated until the final adjustment of the differences which may arise in the course of the discussion of the merits of that Treaty, and this with me is one reason why I wish for information from the PRESIDENT respecting the Treaty. I confess too, sir, that I wish for a full and free conference with the Senate on the important subject of the Treaty.

I wish also to know what was the imperious necessity which induced a negotiation and ratification of such a Treaty as the one before us, which has in it articles which appear so pernicious, as, from the authority of writers* on the Law of Nations, and the confession of a member yesterday, might be declared null and void, and which [Treaty] is destitute of others, which our constituents hoped and expected would form an important part of the Treaty.

I will now reply to a few arguments which were thought weighty, at least they were applied so earnestly to the Representatives from Virginia, as if they were what are called argumenta ad hominem. We are told, sir, that Virginia had put the same construction which they now put. For the Assembly of that State had proposed certain amendments; but these amendments, it should be remembered, were intended to remove the evils which the construction those gentlemen put on the Constitution, if adopted, must produce, and would be unnecessary if that construction for which the Virginia Representatives contended should be adopted by Congress. The arguments of certain members of the General and State Conventions were also retorted on them; but, sir, the gentleman was too much agitated to do strict justice in his recitals, for I think he did not recite enough of some passages from the debates which he read; but the opinions of those gentlemen, as stated, only prove that the Constitution has ambiguities, but can never prove that it becomes this House to explain them, so as to put it into the power of the PRESIDENT and Senate, as it was well remarked by the member from Pennsylvania, to legislate by assistance of any foreign Power, without the aid of the House of Representatives, and reduce the Representatives to a mere Committee of Ways and Means. We were asked, sir, with great vehemence, by a member from Massachusetts, why there had been no objection to any Treaty which had been made till now? He enumerated, I think, several nations with whom Treaties had been made, and demanded why we objected against the Treaty with Great Britain alone? I reply to this, sir, that objections were made by Congress even to the Treaty with France, on which their political salvation depended, and two articles were altered; that complaints have been made against several Indian Treaties; that, however, if no objections had ever been made to any before, it might be said to be high time for us to make a stand, to examine into and check a little the expensive business of Treaty-making; and it may be asked, in reply to the gentleman, what other Treaty, except that with Great Britain, ever repealed acts of Congress; prohibited the exportation of the valuable commodities of the States, and at the same time obliged us to abandon our claim to the rights of neutrality, and to acquiesce in an avowed attempt to destroy our friends and only safe allies?

A Treaty pernicious to the State is null, and not obligatory. No conductor of the nation having power to make such Treaties.

The nation in itself cannot enter into engagements contrary to its indispensable obligations.

In the year 1506, the States General of the Kingdom of France, assembled at Tours, engaged Louis XII. to break the Treaty he had concluded with the Emperor Maximilian and the Archduke Philip, his son, because that Treaty was pernicious to the Kingdom. They found that neither the Treaty nor the oath that had accompanied it could oblige the King to alienate the dominions of the Crown. From the same reason, a want of power, a Treaty is absolutely null.

* Vattel, book 2d, chap. xxii. page 298.—A Treaty is valid, if there be no fault in the manner in which it was concluded; and for this purpose nothing more can be required than a sufficient power in the contracting parties, and their mutual consent sufficiently declared.

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

The gentleman will pardon me, when I say, he should not have asked such questions.

I will not, on a question which involves, perhaps, the fate of the United States, as well as the political existence of this House, say any thing to provoke warmth. I will refrain, therefore, from saying any thing respecting the attempts which have been made, both within and without the doors of this House, to deter members from opposing the Treaty, and will not now repeat the harsh expressions which have escaped from some members in the course of debate, but contend for, and will use the right of freedom of speech, reminding the Committee, however, that freedom of debate should always be regulated by a sense of propriety and decency, and that a difference of opinion on questions which must be decided by voting cannot require passionate debate.

From what I have said, I think I have proved that I may vote for the resolution before the Committee, not only without insulting the PRESIDENT, but as paying all the respect to him which can be due to the PRESIDENT from an independent branch of the Legislature, the direct Representatives of his constituents; that I may vote for it as a Constitutional right of this House, when it may wish for information from the PRESIDENT respecting the state of the Union; that I may vote for it, not only as useful, but as necessary to know the true meaning and intention of certain articles in the Treaty, whether it may be proper to direct any impeachment or not. I think I have also proved that Congress has a Constitutional right to participate in the ratification of a Treaty of Commerce, if such Treaty can be called a regulation of commerce, and I think it has been amply proved by other members, that whenever money is necessary to carry any Treaty into effect, this House has a Constitutional authority to deliberate on the propriety of granting it; to call for information respecting that propriety, and to withhold a grant of money if it should be found unnecessary or improper; and this has been demonstrated not only from express words in the Constitution, but from the nature of the case, and the practice of France and England, nations which have been supposed far less independent of their Executive than the United States; and it has also been evidently proved by stating the mischiefs and absurdities which must result from a contrary supposition. For these reasons, and others which I have not time to mention, I shall vote for the resolution before the Committee.

Mr. BOURNE said he would have given a silent vote on this question, had it not have been for some strange doctrines which had been asserted, for he did not consider the question in itself as necessarily involving any Constitutional question. He regretted the debate had taken the turn it had: That before they had gone into the Committee of the Whole to whom the Treaty was referred, they were debating what Constitutional agency the House could take in relation to it. Those who opposed the passing the resolution, were charged with having given the direction to the debate, but he would ask, who had advanced the position that the Treaty was not the law of the land till sanctioned by this House? Gentlemen in favor of the motion were certainly chargeable with this, and hence originated the Constitutional points now in discussion. The doctrine, that the formal assent of the House of Representatives was essential to the legal existence of a Treaty, struck him as a perfect novelty. That the PRESIDENT and Senate had power under the Constitution to make Treaties, and that these Treaties were the laws of the land, he had never heard denied until this debate. It was true he had heard it said, that the House might control the PRESIDENT and Senate in the exercise of this power, by refusing to carry Treaties into effect by withholding appropriations of money; but he did not expect to hear the assertion, that the ratification of the House was necessary to a Treaty, before it became the law of the land. He called the attention of the Committee to the powers of forming Treaties and Alliances, as vested in Congress under the former Confederation, which was exactly similar to that vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate under the present Constitution. Then the power of regulating commerce, laying taxes, &c., was vested in the State Legislatures. Was it ever heard that the Treaties then made under the authority of Congress were not the laws of the land? Was it ever suggested that the Treaty with France was not a law until it had the assent of the State Legislatures? Yet, according to the assertions of gentlemen, this Treaty was not of legal efficacy, without, for the States had the same power of regulating commerce, which is now vested in Congress; and, say the gentlemen, Treaties which embrace commercial regulations are not valid until Congress, who possesses the power of regulating commerce, ratify them. The fact was, the Treaty with France did embrace commercial objects, and is the law of the land without the consent of the State Legislatures.

It was under the idea that Congress had no more controlling power over Treaties, under the present Constitution, than was possessed by the State Legislatures under the Old Confederation, that the people of the State he had the honor to represent had adopted the Constitution. They conceived that the whole power as to making Treaties was vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate. They strongly objected against adopting it even under this construction, but he was sure those objections would have been much strengthened had they conceived the Treaty-making power, as described in the Constitution, subject to the constructions now put upon it.

As a Representative of a small State, he felt himself much interested in opposing the doctrine contended for. Under the former Confederation Rhode Island had an equal vote with any State in the making of Treaties. This right was thought to have been fully preserved under the present Constitution. But, if the sentiments he was combating prevailed, the small States would be deprived of one of their most essential rights; for the power of making Treaties is one of the principal rights of sovereignty, was vested in all the States separately when they became independent was afterwards, and in the Old Confederation, vested in Congress, each State having an equal vote. It was now, in his opinion, exclusively vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate, in which body the great and small States had the same equality of suffrage. The opinion which he advanced was not merely the opinion of Rhode Island when the Constitution was adopted. A gentleman from Massachusetts had already shown from the debates of the Virginia Convention, that that Assembly entertained the same opinion. He was sure the opinion prevailed in the Convention of Massachusetts—he had attended their debates when this part of the Constitution was the subject of discussion. Objections were raised against it, from the indefiniteness of the power vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate of making Treaties. No one suggested that the House of Representatives had any control over, much less a participation in, this power. It was urged, from the nature of the power, that it ought to be placed where it was—in the PRESIDENT and Senate. The Senate represented the sovereignty of the States; besides, from their small numbers, they were better adapted to the exercise of this power in respect to secrecy and despatch, necessary in negotiations. Objections were raised on the ground of the possible abuses to which the power of making Treaties, unlimited and undefined as it was, might be carried. No one said the PRESIDENT and Senate did not possess the power, nor was it pretended that Congress had any power to control it.

He then called the attention of the Committee to the debates of the Convention of North Carolina. He had been a little surprised to hear a member from that State yesterday say he was a member of the Convention, and that it was understood that Congress could control the PRESIDENT and Senate in making Treaties, so far as respected commerce; the power of legislating on commercial regulations being given to Congress. What created his surprise was, that he had read the debates of the first Convention, and found no such sentiment. The gentleman had explained himself by saying there was a second Convention called in that State, of which he was a member, and there the doctrine alluded to had been advanced. The debates of this Convention Mr. B. had not seen. In order to show what were the opinions which were held in the first mentioned Convention of North Carolina, he would read extracts from the debates of that Assembly, which would be applicable to the present question, and clearly discover that all agreed that the Treaty-making power was exclusively vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate.

Extracts from the Debates referred to by Mr. BOURNE.

Mr. LEWIS.—I have a greater objection on this ground than that which has just been mentioned—I mean, sir, the Legislative power given to the President himself. It may be admitted by some, but not by me. He, sir, is to make Treaties which are to be the supreme law of the land. This is a Legislative power given to the President, and implies a contradiction to that part which says that all Legislative power is vested in the two Houses.

Mr. SPAIGHT [a member of the Convention which formed the Constitution] answered, that it was thought better to put that power into the hands of the Senators as Representatives of the States, that thereby the interest of every State was equally attended to in the formation of Treaties, but that it was not considered as a Legislative act at all.

Mr. MACLAINE.—That Treaties were the supreme law of the land, in all countries, for the most obvious reasons; that laws or Legislative acts operated upon individuals, but that Treaties acted upon States; that, unless they were the supreme law of the land, they could have no validity at all; that the President did not act in this case as a Legislator, but rather in his Executive capacity.

Mr. LEWIS.—He still thought the President was possessed of Legislative powers, while he could make Treaties joined with the Senate.

Mr. IREDELL.—When Treaties are made they become as valid as Legislative acts. I apprehend that every act of the Government, Legislative, Executive, or Judicial, if in pursuance of a Constitutional power, is the law of the land.

Mr. PORTER.—There is a power vested in the President and Senate to make Treaties, which shall be the supreme law of the land. Which among us can call them to account? I always thought there could be no proper exercise of power without the suffrage of the people: yet the House of Representatives has no power to intermeddle with Treaties. The President and seven Senators, as nearly as I can remember, can make a Treaty, which will be of great advantage to the Northern States, and equal injury to the Southern States. They might give up the rivers and territory of the Southern States; yet in the preamble of the Constitution, they say all the people have done it. I should be glad to know what power there is of calling the President and Senate to account.

Mr. SPAIGHT answered, that, under the Confederation, two-thirds of the States might make Treaties. That, if the Senators from all the States attended when a Treaty was about to be made, two-thirds of the States would have a voice in its formation. He added, he would be glad to ask the gentleman what mode there was of calling the present Congress to account?

Mr. PORTER repeated his objection. He hoped that gentlemen would not impose on the House; that the President could make Treaties with two-thirds of the Senate; that the President, in that case, voted rather in a Legislative than an Executive capacity, which he thought impolitic.

Mr. JOHNSTON.—In my opinion, if there be any difference between the Constitution and the Confederation with respect to Treaties, the Constitution is more safe than the Confederation. We know that two members from each State have a right, by the Confederation, to give the vote of that State, and two-thirds of the States have a right also to make Treaties. By this Constitution two-thirds of the Senators cannot make Treaties without the concurrence of the President.

Mr. PORTER.—That, as Treaties were the supreme law of the land, the House of Representatives ought to have a vote in making them as well as in passing them.

Mr. J. McDOWALL.—Mr. Chairman: Permit me, sir, to make a few observations, to show how improper it is to place so much power in so few men, without any responsibility whatever. Let us consider what number of them is necessary to transact the most important business. Two-thirds of the members present, with the President, can make a Treaty. Fourteen of them are a quorum, two-thirds of which are ten. These ten may make Treaties and alliances. They may involve us in any difficulties and dispose of us in any manner they please. Nay, eight is a majority of a quorum, and can do every thing but make Treaties. How unsafe are we when we have no power of bringing those to an account! It is absurd to try them before their own body. Our lives and our property are in the hands of eight or nine men. Will these gentlemen intrust their rights in this manner?

MR. DAVIE.—Mr. Chairman, although Treaties are mere conventional acts between the contracting parties, yet, by the law of nations they are the supreme law of the land to their respective citizens or subjects. All civilized nations have concurred in considering them as paramount to an ordinary act of legislation. This concurrence is founded on the reciprocal convenience and solid advantages arising from it. A due observance of Treaties makes nations more friendly to each other, and is the only means of rendering less frequent those mutual hostilities which tend to depopulate and ruin contending nations. It extends and facilitates that commercial intercourse which, founded on the universal protection of private property, has in a measure made the world one nation.

The power of making Treaties has, in all countries and Governments, been placed in the Executive Departments. This has not only been grounded on the necessity and reason arising from that degree of secrecy, design, and despatch, which are always necessary in negotiations between nations, but to prevent their being impeded or carried into effect by the violence, animosity, and heat of parties, which too often infect numerous bodies. Both of these reasons preponderated in the foundation of this part of the system. It is true, sir, that the late Treaty between the United States and Great Britain has not, in some of the States, been held as the supreme law of the land. Even in this State, an act of Assembly passed to declare its validity. But no doubt that Treaty was the supreme law of the land without the sanction of the Assembly; because, by the Confederation, Congress had power to make Treaties. It was one of those original rights of sovereignty which were vested in them; and it was not the deficiency of Constitutional authority in Congress to make Treaties that produced the necessity of a law to declare their validity, but it was owing to the entire imbecility of the Confederation. On the principle of the propriety of vesting this power in the executive Department, it would seem that the whole power of making Treaties ought to be left to the President, who, being elected by the people of the United States at large, will have their general interest at heart. But that jealousy of Executive power, which has shown itself so strongly in all the American Governments, would not admit this improvement. Interest, sir, has a most powerful influence over the human mind, and is the basis on which all the transactions of mankind are built. It was mentioned before, that the extreme jealousy of the little States, and between the commercial States and the non-importing States, produced the necessity of giving an equality of suffrage to the Senate. The same causes made it indispensable to give to the Senators, as Representatives of States, the power of making, or rather ratifying, Treaties. Although it militates against every idea of just proportion, that the little State of Rhode Island should have the same suffrage with Virginia, or the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, yet the small States would not consent to confederate, without an equal voice in the formation of Treaties. Without the equality, they apprehended that their interest would be neglected or sacrificed in negotiations. This difficulty could not be got over. It arose from the unalterable nature of things. Every man was convinced of the inflexibility of the little States on this point. It therefore became necessary to give them an absolute equality in making Treaties.

On a due consideration of this clause, it appears that this power could not have been lodged as safely anywhere else as where it is. The honorable gentleman [Mr. McDOWALL] has spoken of a consolidation in this Government. That is a very strange inconsistency, when he points out, at the same time, the necessity of lodging the power of making Treaties with the Representatives, where the idea of a Consolidation can alone exist, and when he objects to placing it in the Senate, where the Federal principle is completely preserved. As the Senate represents the sovereignty of the States, whatever might affect the States in their political capacity ought to be left to them. This is the certain means of preventing a consolidation. How extremely absurd it is to call that disposition of power a Consolidation of the States which must to all eternity prevent it! I have only to add the principle upon which the General Convention went: That the power of making Treaties could nowhere be so safely lodged as in the President and Senate; and the extreme jealousy subsisting between some of the States would not admit of it elsewhere. If any man will examine the operation of that jealousy in his own breast, as a citizen of North Carolina, he will soon feel the inflexibility that results from it, and perhaps be induced to acknowledge the propriety of this arrangement.

MR. McDOWALL declared, that he was of the same opinion as before, and that he believed the observations which the gentleman had made on the apparent inconsistency of his remarks would have very little weight with the Committee; that, giving such extensive powers to so few men in the Senate was extremely dangerous; and that he was not the more reconciled to it from its being brought about by the inflexibility of the small, pitiful States to the North. He supposed that eight members in the Senate from these States, with the President, might do the most important acts.

MR. INDELL.—If this power be improperly vested, it is incumbent on gentlemen to tell us in what body it could be more safely and properly lodged. I believe, on a serious consideration, it will be found that it was necessary, for the reasons mentioned by the gentleman from Halifax, to vest the power in the Senate, or some other body equally representing the sovereignty of the States, and that the power, as given in the Constitution, is not likely to be attended with the evils which some gentlemen apprehend. The only real security of liberty in any country is the jealousy and circumspection of the people themselves. Let them be watchful over their rulers. Should they find a combination against their liberties, and all other methods appear to be insufficient to preserve them, they have (thank God) an ultimate remedy. That power which created the Government can destroy it. Should the Government, on trial, be found to want amendment, that amendment can be made in a regular method—in a mode prescribed by the Constitution itself. Massachusetts, South Carolina, New Hampshire, and Virginia, have all proposed amend ments, but they all concurred in the necessity of an immediate adoption. A constitutional mode of altering the Constitution itself is perhaps what has never been known among mankind before. We have this security, in addition to the natural watchfulness of the people, which I hope will never be found wanting. The objections I have answered deserved all possible attention; and, for my part, I shall always respect that jealousy which arises from the love of public liberty.

Mr. SPENCER.—Mr. Chairman, I think that no argument can be used to show that this power is proper. If the whole Legislative body—if the House of Representatives—do not interfere in making Treaties, I think they ought at least to have the sanction of the whole Senate.

Amendment proposed to the Constitution.

“XXIII. That no Treaties which shall be directly opposed to the existing laws of the United States, in Congress assembled, shall be valid, until such laws shall be repealed, or made conformable to such Treaty; nor shall any Treaty be valid which is contradictory to the Constitution of the United States.”

Mr. BOURNE said, he would not tire the patience of the Committee by reading any further from the debates relative to that point, but would only turn to what was said by a member who now belongs to the Supreme Court of the United States, in answer to a question asked by a member who now belongs to the Senate, whether it was not customary, in England, to submit Treaties to the approbation of Parliament.

Extracts referred to.

“Mr. BLOODWORTH desired to be informed whether Treaties were not to be submitted to the Parliament, in Great Britain, before they were valid.

“Mr. FREDELL.—A gentleman from New Hanover had asked, whether it is not the practice, in Great Britain, to submit Treaties to Parliament, before they are esteemed valid. The King has the sole authority, by the laws of that country, to make Treaties. After Treaties are made they are frequently discussed in the two Houses of Parliament, where, of late years, the most important measures of Government have been narrowly examined. It is usual to move for an Address of approbation; and such has been the complaisance of Parliament, for a long time, that this seldom has been withheld. Sometimes they pass an act in conformity to the Treaty made; but this, I believe, is not for the mere purpose of confirmation, but to make alterations in a particular system, which the change of circumstances requires. The Constitutional power of making Treaties is vested in the Crown; and the Power with whom a Treaty is made considers it as binding without any act of Parliament, unless an alteration by such is provided for in the Treaty itself; which, I believe, is sometimes the case. When the Treaty of Peace was made in 1763, it contained stipulations for the surrender of some islands to the French. The islands were given up, I believe, without any act of Parliament. The power of making Treaties is very important, and must be vested somewhere, in order to counteract the dangerous designs of other countries, and to be able to terminate a war when it is begun. Were it known that our Government was weak, two or more European Powers might combine against us. Would it not be politic to have some power in this country to obviate this danger by a Treaty? If this power was injudiciously limited, the nations where the power was possessed without restrictions would have greatly the advantage of us in negotiations; and every one must know, according to modern policy, of what moment an advantage in negotiation is. The honorable member from Anson said, that the accumulation of all the different branches of power in the Senate would be dangerous. The experience of other countries shows that this fear is without foundation. What is the Senate of Great Britain opposed to the House of Commons, although it be composed of an hereditary nobility of vast fortunes, and entirely independent of the people? Their weight is far inferior to that of the Commons. Here is a strong instance of the accumulation of powers of the different branches of Government without producing any inconvenience. That Senate, sir, is a separate branch of the Legislature—is the great Constitutional Council of the Crown—and decides on lives and fortunes in impeachments, besides being the ultimate tribunal for trying controversies respecting private rights. Would it not appear that all these things should render them more formidable than the other House? Yet the Commons have generally been able to carry everything before them. The circumstance of their representing the great body of the people alone gives them great weight. This weight has great authority added to it, by their possessing the right (a right given to the people's Representatives in Congress) of exclusively originating money bills. The authority over money will do everything. A Government cannot be supported without money. Our Representatives may at any time compel the Senate to agree to a reasonable measure, by withholding supplies till the measure is consented to. There was a great debate in the Convention whether the Senate should have an equal power of originating money bills. It was strongly insisted by some that they should; but at length a majority thought it unadvisable, and the clause was passed as it now stands.”

It appeared clearly, Mr. BOURNE contended, from the debates he had read, that there was only one opinion in the Convention of North Carolina in relation to the Treaty-making power being vested in the President and Senate; and that Treaties made by them were the supreme law of the land, subject to no check or control from the House of Representatives. If such an idea had been entertained, would not those who in that Convention were in favor of adopting the Constitution, and who almost despaired of its being adopted, have said, in reply to those who objected against the investiture of this power in the President and Senate, “Your rights are safe; the House of Representatives must ratify commercial Treaties before they can be carried into effect.” But this was not said; on the contrary, it was said, that the power of making Treaties was exclusively vested in the President and Senate; that it was right and proper it should be so vested; and that the small States, in the Convention which formed the Constitution would not agree to give any part of the Treaty-making power to the House of Representatives. That the nature of the Treaty power showed the propriety of placing it where it was placed, the numbers of the Senate were small and most fit for this business—more so than a numerous body where faction and party might prevail; that the power of making Treaties was vested in the Senate, because it was a branch of the sovereign power. These observations had been made in the Convention of North Carolina. Now, he asked, if this was the construction of the Constitution when it was adopted in the several States, would it not be a trick on the small States now to construe it differently, and say that no Treaty was the law of the land until ratified by the House of Representatives? He considered that the State which he had the honor to represent would be of that opinion. He said it would be a gross violation of the Constitution to maintain that the PRESIDENT and Senate could not make Treaties without the assent of the House.

But he did not consider this principle as involved in the motion before the Committee; it was a question of expediency. The PRESIDENT was asked by it for the instructions to his Ministers and all the documents respecting the Treaty, excepting only such as related to any existing negotiation; he thought that the alteration of the original motion which was made by introducing the exception had made it more objectionable; it was saying, "send us all the papers respecting this negotiation, excepting one particular description of them, which we think you ought not to send." Nothing was left to the discretion of the PRESIDENT. Did any gentleman ever before hear of an Executive being called on for the confidential instructions which he had given his Minister in relation to a foreign negotiation; for the correspondence between himself and his Minister, and for that which passed between the two Ministers representing the negotiating parties? Was it not natural for gentlemen to consider that much confidential communication takes place on these occasions, which ought not to be disclosed but to the immediate parties concerned? The agency of private individuals might have been used in effecting the Treaty, and was it proper that their names should be published? With the facts he was perfectly unacquainted. The Committee would readily suppose he knew nothing of the secrets of the negotiation if such there were; but he thought there might be many, and they ought not to be divulged. Mr. B. added, that he believed the call for such papers to be wholly unprecedented. Just before the adoption of the present Government in France, a Treaty had been negotiated through the agency of the Committee of Safety with Spain. It is well known that strong objections were raised in the Convention, who then had the power of ratifying Treaties, against giving their consent to that; and though it was the subject of much debate, the instructions and correspondence of the negotiator were not called for. Suppose the PRESIDENT should be disposed to communicate the papers in question, it probably would be under an injunction of secrecy. Did the House mean to debate on the Treaty with closed doors? He conceived not. But if the papers were not to be disclosed to the public, they would not conduce to allay the public sensibility in respect to the Treaty, which had been assigned as one motive for calling for them, though he did not think it real; for he thought the addresses which had been made to the passions in the debate were calculated to increase instead of allaying any sensibility which may have existed. A gentleman had said that he disapproved of the Treaty, insomuch that the Minister who negotiated it ought to be sent again as Minister Plenipotentiary to repeal it, if that was the only proper mode to get rid of it.

The same gentleman who said this also said, if he adored any thing in this world it was the voice of the people, and that their voice was against the Treaty. Mr. B. said, he respected the voice of the people; but where were they to find the voice of the people? That gentleman had referred to the petitions on the table. How many had petitioned against the Treaty? Were there as many as were necessary to choose one Representative in that House? No, not half so many. Was this then the voice of the people? He thought the voice of the people was to be collected from the diminutive appearance of the petitions themselves. The inference was strongly in favor of the voice of the people being with the Treaty, when it was considered what pains had been taken to gain petitioners; he thought, also, the voice of the people was to be collected from the proceedings of the State Legislatures, in relation to the conduct of the PRESIDENT and Senate in ratifying the Treaty. He stated that the several branches of the Legislature of New Hampshire had been unanimous in their expressions of approbation. In Massachusetts a similar spirit had been shown. The General Assembly of Rhode Island had been unanimous and explicit in their approbation of the conduct of the PRESIDENT and Senate. The unanimity of Connecticut on this subject was well known. The addresses at the meeting of the Legislature of New York had breathed a similar spirit; those of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, also; the latter had been unanimous in their resolutions of approbation and confidence. He would not travel any further; some sentiments of a contrary complexion had been expressed to the South. The gentlemen had referred to the sensibility which had been exhibited in the town-meetings. Mr. B. acknowledged that much dissatisfaction with the Treaty had been shown in most of the populous towns; he believed, however, from recent appearances, it was much abated. The people had been deceived in their expectations in respect to the Treaty by several publications before the Treaty arrived, having exaggerated its advantages, and stated that every thing was obtained which had been asked for. Mr. B. said, he should not give his ideas of the Treaty at present, they would be reserved for a more proper time. He believed that in obeying the Constitution, they should obey the voice of the people. If a doubt existed as to what was the true construction of the Constitution, he believed it ought to be conformed to the opinion which prevailed when the Constitution was adopted, and he had shown that the most eminent men had then but one opinion in relation to it; they all agreed that the power of making Treaties was vested exclusively in the PRESIDENT and Senate. Mr. B. concluded by observing, that he had not intended to have carried his observations to so great a length, but as the State he represented was particularly interested in the consequences of the principles which had been advanced, he had been the more lengthy. Indeed he did not consider these principles as necessarily involved in the question now before the Committee, but he confided that whatever might be the fate of this question, from the knowledge he had of the members of the Committee, that when they should come to decide on the question of carrying the Treaty into effect, they would duly respect the sacred obligations they were under to support the Constitution.

Mr. BRENT said he should not in the present debate touch on the merits of the Treaty, which he conceived foreign to this question. On a motion to ask for papers with respect to the Treaty, he did not conceive with what propriety the fitness of the instrument could be brought into view. It would be proper, he contended, to have the papers proposed to be called for, even if it was conceded that the House had no control in matters of Treaty; for if they were bound to carry it into operation, still the papers would be necessary to a due understanding of the subject. The motion, he argued, stands upon the same ground as the calls so often made for information to the Heads of Departments. But even if the papers are not necessary to give information as to the laws which it is said must be passed, they are necessary on another ground. The Constitution gives the House a general superintendence over the conduct of officers, and the power of impeachment; no member denies this right, and how can they exercise it understandingly without information? Can the Constitution be supposed to give this right of impeachment, and at the same time deprive the House of the means of information? This would be as absurd as to refer to a blind man to judge of shades and colors. How can the House decide on the ability or fidelity of the negotiator of the Treaty, unless they have a sight of his instructions, and of his correspondence? how can they determine on the merits or demerits of the negotiation?

The turn which the debate had taken had given rise, he said, to an important Constitutional question; he did not believe its decision of consequence to the decision on the present motion; but as the debate had taken that turn, he should pursue the same road in answer to the arguments of gentlemen. He laid this down as a sound inference from the provisions of the Constitution on the subject of the Treaty power: that the PRESIDENT and Senate possess the right of forming Treaties, and of carrying on the necessary negotiations with foreign countries; but when these contain stipulations bearing a relation to the specific power vested in the Legislature, the House had a right to take cognizance of it, and such Treaty could not become the supreme law of the land until sanctioned by the Legislature. To show the justness of this position, he should examine this subject, he said, in a threefold light. He should examine it by a recurrence to the words of the Constitution; then to the opinions which prevailed as to its meaning at the time it was framed and adopted; and, lastly, he should examine what construction was best calculated to preserve the liberties of this country.

The Constitution contains two clauses in reference to the Treaty-making power. The first declares that the PRESIDENT, with two-thirds of the Senate, shall have power to make Treaties. He proceeded to inquire whether this clause gives them the right to make Treaties the supreme law of the land? To determine this it was necessary to examine the import of the word in those countries, where the Treaty power had been frequently exercised, and to consult the opinions of the best civilians. The general power of making Treaties is under the control of the Constitution. In despotic countries, where all power, Legislative, Judicial, and Executive, is in the hands of one person, there the Treaty-making power is without control, and a Treaty as soon as made becomes, ipso facto, the supreme law of the land; but in all limited Governments, the Treaty power is subject to the limitations in the Constitution. The practice of this principle may be found even in the British Government. There, though the King originates Treaties as the PRESIDENT and Senate do here, they do not become the supreme law of the land, respecting Legislative subjects, until the co-operation of Parliament is obtained. Thus the power of making Treaties does not imply the power of making those Treaties in all cases the supreme law of the land. If the Executive make a Treaty involving none but Executive powers strictly, then it becomes immediately the supreme law; but if they contain provisions, which involve the Legislative authority, the Executive can make them but conditionally, and they do not become supreme until the Legislature chose to make them so. The British Government furnishes an example where this doctrine has been practised, and it is by a reference to the practice of despotic Governments, that the mistaken idea is taken up, that all Treaties as soon as made become the supreme law of the land. The clause in our Constitution, he concluded, does not give authority to the PRESIDENT and Senate to make a supreme law of the land.

When this clause of the Constitution is compared with the other parts of it, it will be found, he said, that the above interpretation is just; for the Treaty-making power is delegated as a general power, while to Congress specific powers are granted. The rational and admitted rule of construction in these cases is, that specific power restrains general powers; and here, then, the general Treaty power must be restrained by the specific powers of Congress. He admitted that the Executive had full power, under the general authority vested in them by the Constitution, to originate Treaties and to carry on negotiations with foreign Powers; but that if the provisions of a Treaty so negotiated clashed with specific powers granted, the authority exercising these specific powers must give it their sanction before it becomes the supreme law of the land.

He next turned to the second clause of the Constitution respecting Treaties, which had been noticed in the debate. It says, that the Constitution,

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

laws, and Treaties, shall be the supreme law of the land; and gentlemen contend, he remarked, that though the first clause does not make the Treaties entered into by the Executive the supreme law of the land, yet that this does; but its obvious and only meaning, when the whole of it is taken into view, is, that the Constitution, laws, and Treaties of the United States, are only meant to be declared supreme to Constitutions and laws of the individual States. It is admitted, as a sound rule of construction, that to discover the true meaning of any instrument, it is fair to have recourse to the existing circumstances that produced it. When the Constitution was formed, it was under a strong impression of the inconveniences experienced under the Confederation, when great obstruction was thrown in the way of the Treaty power, by the States refusing to carry into execution those agreed to by the Constitutional authority. This was the evil the framers of the Constitution had in view when they inserted this clause, and it has no relation to the powers of the General Government, which stand precisely in the same situation with or without it. It does not declare that Treaties shall abrogate laws, but that the States shall not have it in their power to throw impediments in the way of their execution. The words of the Constitution cannot be understood otherwise than that the Constitution, laws, and Treaties, shall exist together: it does not say that a Treaty shall repeal a law, or a law repeal a Treaty. Then the Constitution certainly contemplated that they never should be in opposition, for contradictory and opposing laws cannot exist at the same time; if they exist at the same time, they cannot be in opposition to each other. If it can be supposed that the PRESIDENT and Senate can make a Treaty in opposition to a law of the Legislature, and yet both the Treaty and the law be at the same time the supreme law of the land, an absurdity is supposed. But if it be admitted that the House shall have a participation in the business of Treaties, in cases which involve the Legislative authority, then the words of the Constitution become intelligible, and both Treaties and laws may be at the same time the supreme law of the land.

He further developed this idea. The Constitution says, that the PRESIDENT and Senate shall make Treaties, and that when concluded under the authority of the United States they shall be the supreme law of the land. This is intelligible, if the control of the House be admitted; for then, if the PRESIDENT and Senate make a commercial Treaty, in any part contrary to existing laws, the Congress repeals those laws, and the Treaty then becomes the supreme law, and when it commences its existence there is no opposing law. On this construction all existing laws will be supreme law; on the other, though all are declared supreme, yet all cannot be supreme when there is a clashing. A Treaty made by the PRESIDENT and Senate, as far as it relates to commercial concerns, is not a Treaty made under the authority of the United States until it has obtained the sanction of the Legislature.

Gentlemen say, that Treaties, ipso facto, repeal anterior laws clashing with their provisions: they say, that the Constitution, laws, and Treaties, stand upon the same footing in the Constitution, being all declared the supreme law of the land. If Treaties can repeal laws, then laws can repeal the Constitution, for the second (laws) are to the first (Constitution) what the third (Treaties) are to the second (laws); then, also, by parity of reasoning, Treaties may repeal the Constitution. If all stand on the same footing, and the precedence is according to the point of time, the last law always prevailing, then Treaties may change the fundamental principles of our Government; then the PRESIDENT and Senate, by entering into stipulations with a foreign Government, may give us a Monarchy, may convert our PRESIDENT into a King, and our Senate into a nobility; for, say the gentlemen, Treaties are the law of the land as well as the Constitution, and a subsequent law repeals those which are anterior. But these positions are false in all their parts; a law or a Treaty cannot repeal the Constitution, nor can a Treaty repeal a law. If the manner in which the three words are placed in the Constitution is to have any force, it would not favor the construction of the gentlemen; they contend for the supremacy of Treaties, whereas Treaties are last named, and the true construction from this source would be the reverse, when there was clashing. He next adverted to the lengths to which the mode of interpretation contended for by the gentlemen would carry them. It was never intended, he asserted, by the people, when they instituted this Government, that the Treaty power should possess this omnipotence. It was never intended that the PRESIDENT and Senate should have it in their power to effect a radical change in our Government, and stipulate with a foreign nation for a guarantee of the change. Laws contrary to the Constitution are nugatory, and Treaties contrary to existing laws, the same; because, when in that stage, they are not concluded under the authority of the United States, but are only so (and then there is no longer any clashing) when once they have received the sanction of the Legislature. From the above, he concluded that the PRESIDENT and Senate originate Treaties, and that the Legislature to a certain extent should exercise a check upon this power. And upon these principles the British Treaty is not the supreme law of the land until a decision on it was had in the Legislature.

It might be supposed, Mr. B. observed, that his opinion of the true construction of this part of the Constitution was a solitary one—that it was a chimera of the imagination. Upon inquiry, it would, however, be found that this opinion was advanced at the time the Constitution was under consideration, in the several conventions which ratified it, and by the most distinguished writers of the day. A member from Massachusetts had quoted parts of the proceedings in the State of Virginia in support of his construction of the Constitution. He should not himself have brought forward the authority of that State in favor of a contrary construction, had not that gentleman cited it as authority of great weight. But since he had endeavored to make use of the proceedings in that State as an offensive weapon, he would endeavor to employ them as a defensive weapon. Whatever aspect the debates of the Convention there might bear as partially quoted by the member from Massachusetts, he was bold to declare, that, on a careful examination, it would be found that the majority in that body construed the Constitution as contended by the friends to the present motion. By reading detached parts a different impression might be made; but if the whole of the debates were adverted to, it would be found that the PRESIDENT and Senate were thought to have the same relations to the Treaty-making power as the King of Great Britain has to England. He first quoted the sentiments of a gentleman in that body, to whose abilities the adoption of the Constitution was much attributed:

"The President and Senate have the same power of making Treaties, and when made they are to have the same force and validity. They are to be the supreme law of the land here. This book shows us they are so in England. Have we not seen in America that Treaties were violated, though they are in all countries considered the supreme law of the land? Was it therefore not necessary to declare, in explicit terms, they should be so here? How, then, is this Constitution on a different footing with the Government of Britain? The worthy member says, they can make a Treaty relinquishing our rights and inflicting punishments, because all Treaties are declared paramount to the Constitutions and laws of the States. An attentive consideration of this will show the Committee that they can do no such thing. The provision of the sixth article is, that this Constitution, and laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land! They can by this make no Treaty which shall be repugnant to the spirit of the Constitution, or inconsistent with the delegated powers. The Treaties they make must be under the authority of the United States, to be within their province. It is sufficiently secured, because it only declares that, in pursuance of the powers given, they shall be the supreme law of the land, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution or laws of particular States."

He then cited the sentiments of another member, who was also an advocate for the adoption of the Constitution:

"The honorable gentleman on the other side tells us that this doctrine is not sound, because in England it is declared that the consent of Parliament is not necessary. Had the honorable gentleman used his usual discernment and penetration, he would see the difference between a Commercial Treaty and other Treaties. A Commercial Treaty must be submitted to the consideration of Parliament; because such Treaties will render it necessary to alter some laws, add new clauses to some, and repeal others. If this be not done, the Treaty is void, quo ad hoc. The Mississippi cannot be dismembered but two ways—by a common Treaty or a Commercial Treaty. If the interest of Congress will lead them to yield it by the first, the law of nations would justify the people of Kentucky to resist, and the cession would be nugatory. It cannot, then, be surrendered by a common Treaty. Can it be done by a Commmercial Treaty? If it should, the consent of the House of Representatives would be requisite, because of the correspondent alterations that must be made in the laws. [Here Mr. Corbin illustrated his position, by reading the last clause of the Treaty with France, which gives certain commercial privileges to the subjects of France: to give full effect to which, certain correspondent alterations were necessary in the commercial regulations.] This, continued he, secures Legislative interference."

He mentioned a third authority from the same source:

"I think the argument of the gentleman who restrained the supremacy of these to the laws of particular States, and not to Congress, is rational. Here the supremacy of a Treaty is contrasted with the supremacy of the laws of the States. It cannot be otherwise supreme. If it does not supersede their existing laws as far as they contravene its operation, it cannot be of any effect."

It was at that day the opposers of the Constitution who insisted, that the Constitution gave the PRESIDENT and Senate the unqualified power of making all Treaties, and they contended that this power would work the overthrow of liberty. If the public sentiment of that day is to be recurred to for an exposition of the Constitution, he wished to know whether the sentiments of the majority or minority were to be recurred to? Unless the gentlemen would prove that the minority gave on that occasion the true exposition of the Constitution, the sense of the majority must be considered as expressing the wishes of the people, under the opinion which caused the ratification of the instrument.

The Committee had been told, however, that the deliberations of the North Carolina Convention bore a different aspect. But here the gentlemen had been equally unfortunate in their quotations, for they had cited the sentiments held out in the Convention that did not ratify the Constitution; that that Convention was dissolved before the Constitution was adopted; that another met, who received and ratified it, and a worthy Representative from North Carolina now in Congress, who was a member of the Convention, has informed, that the construction given to the Treaty power by the friends of the instrument in that body, was the one contended for by the advocates of the present motion. The first Convention who misconstrued the Treaty power broke up without sanctioning the instrument; but the second, who construed it differently, and who ratified the Constitution, must undoubtedly be considered as having really expressed the sentiments of the people.

He was surprised that gentlemen should conceive the construction now contended for as novel; that the member from Massachusetts should, in so earnest a manner, declare, that the doctrine is novel, when, by recurring to the very debates he produced, the construction was unequivocally laid down. To make the assertion he must entirely have lost sight of the various debates and writings of the day. He would quote a passage from the work of a distinguished writer of the day, who was in opposition to the adoption of the Constitution, but who, though he made various objections to the instrument, and appeared solicitous to find fault, yet construed the part of the Constitution now under consideration as the friends to the motion do. He meant the Federal Farmer. The following is the passage he quoted :

"On a fair construction of the Constitution, I think the Legislature has a proper control over the President and Senate in settling Commercial Treaties. By one article, 'the Legislature shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations,' &c., and by another article, 'the President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, shall have power to make Treaties.' These clauses must be considered together; and we ought never to make one part of the same instrument contradict another, if it can be avoided by any reasonable construction. By the first recited clause, the Legislature has the power; that is, as I understand it, the sole power, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or to make all the rules and regulations respecting trade and commerce between our citizens and foreigners. By the second recited clause, the President and Senate have power generally to make Treaties. There are several kinds of Treaties, as Treaties of Commerce, of Peace, of Alliance, &c. I think the words, 'to make Treaties,' may be consistently construed, and yet so as it shall be left to the Legislature to confirm commercial Treaties. They are in their nature and operation, very distinct from Treaties of Peace and of Alliance. The latter generally require secrecy: it is but very seldom they interfere with the laws and internal police of the country. To make them, is properly the exercise of Executive powers; and the Constitution authorizes the President and Senate to make Treaties, and gives the Legislature no power directly or indirectly respecting these Treaties of Peace and Alliance. As to Treaties of commerce, they do not generally require secrecy; they almost always involve in them Legislative powers; interfere with the laws and internal police of the country: and operate immediately on persons or property, especially in commercial towns: (they have in Great Britain usually been confirmed by Parliament.) They consist of rules and regulations respecting commerce: and to regulate commerce, or to make regulations respecting commerce the Federal Legislature, by the Constitution, has the power. I do not see that any commercial regulations can be made in Treaties, that will not infringe upon this power in the Legislature. Therefore I infer, that the true construction is, that the President and Senate shall make Treaties: but all Commercial Treaties shall be subject to be confirmed by the Legislature. This construction will render the clauses consistent, and make the powers of the President and Senate respecting Treaties, much less exceptionable."

He contended that the power of making Treaties, and of entering into foreign negotiations, did not imply a power of making them laws of the land: and that, if the Constitution meant to place Constitution, laws, and Treaties on the same footing, and that the PRESIDENT and Senate could repeal laws and change the Constitution, that instrument was monstrous indeed, and if it had been so understood, could never have received the sanction of the different Conventions. It was ratified under the impression, that the PRESIDENT and Senate had the power of originating Treaties; but that when they involved Legislative considerations, they did not become Treaties under the authority of the United States, until they had been submitted to the Legislature.

Gentlemen had asserted, that if the construction of the friends of the resolution prevailed, it would be difficult to regulate our foreign concerns. He could not see the justice of this remark, for the Treaty power had been exercised under these modifications in Great Britain, and it had not been found defective in this particular. Indeed, it is more likely to be expected, that this would not have been brought in as an argument, as the very Treaty now in question will stand in Great Britain precisely on the footing here contended for.

He might have recourse to the pamphlet called The Federalist, as another authority to prove his construction. He expressed his surprise that the gentleman from Massachusetts should never have heard of these opinions and authorities. The debates of the Pennsylvanian Convention, he understood, were analogous to those in Virginia.

If the PRESIDENT and Senate possess this unlimited Treaty-making power, what security, he asked, have we for our rights? He was not referring to the persons now in office, who might be all virtue; but he was speaking of the consequence of the principle. Though the PRESIDENT and Senate of the present day might never make an improper use of power, what might occur at a future day should be adverted to, for the Constitution was not intended for the present day only, but for future times. As highly as he valued the PRESIDENT, as much as he felt for the great services he had rendered, yet even him he would not trust with such unbounded power. Unlimited power was apt to corrupt the purest heart, and he wished to do nothing that could cast a shade over that character which had been the admiration of the intelligent world. But liberty he considered as the best gift of heaven to man, and he did not wish to hold it by the courtesy of any man.

The amendments proposed by the Convention of Virginia were cited as proving that Virginia saw the Constitution in the light contended for. If they are attended to, he conceived they could not ascertain the fact. The amendment in question goes to providing, that no Commercial Treaty shall be concluded without the consent of two-thirds of the lower House; but surely this does not go to prove that they conceived the House had no voice in those Treaties, directly or indirectly.

If it be admitted that the PRESIDENT and Senate can make Treaties, which ipso facto become laws of the land, without any assent of the House, without their being able even to exercise their discretion in making appropriations, then the House are a mere body for form sake. The advocates of this construction had stated, as an example, the case of the Judges' salary, which the Constitution declares shall neither be increased nor diminished while they remain in office; and they contended, that the House could no more refuse appropriations to carry a Treaty into effect, than to refuse to make provision for the salaries of those Judges. There was, he conceived, a material distinction between the two cases. In the first, the House were bound by no Constitutional tie; in the latter, they lay under an express injunction of the Constitution, from which they could not depart without perjury. When there is a Constitutional injunction to appropriate, no discretion is left to the Legislature; but when even a law is to be carried into effect, by an appropriation, the House may withhold it, and thus indirectly repeal the law. The Constitution not only intended to vest in the House this discretionary power of repealing a law by refusing appropriations; but it was so attached to it, that in one case, it cannot divest itself of it, but is bound to exercise it periodically; such is the case on the subject of military force; and notwithstanding the important light in which the Constitution views this power of appropriation, and the jealousy with which it is guarded; yet some members are hardy enough to insist, that it would be a violation of the Constitution to exercise this discretion. If the House should attempt to exercise this discretion, when they are under a Constitutional injunction to appropriate, they would be departing from the Constitution; but if they use it to effect the repeal of a law, they exercise a right the Constitution has given them, and of which they cannot divest themselves, and a Treaty cannot be looked upon in any other light than a law.

He recapitulated the principal features of the preceding remarks.

He then adverted to the charge of treason which had been thrown out against the friends of the resolution; and remarked, that the Constitution may be violated by other departments of Government as well as the House, and that if this was treason in one case, it must be in the other. It was not for the PRESIDENT and Senate that the Constitution was formed; but for the people to preserve their liberties, and that Constitution would be infringed, if an intended check was done away by a forced construction. To give a power, not intended when the Constitution was adopted, to the PRESIDENT and Senate, was as much overturning the established order of Government, as to encroach upon their authority. The aim of every man should be to preserve the happy mean; not to suffer any department to engross more power than it should have; to preserve the symmetry of the fabric, and keep the balance; for whichever way it inclined, whether too much towards democracy, or too much towards Executive energy, in either case the epithets of revolutionary, disorganizing, &c., might be applied.

An insinuation, he remarked, had been brought into view, both uncandid and unkind. It was suggested, that the present motion was brought forward, because the Treaty is made with Great Britain. Why should members impute to others improper motives? The insinuation he considered as unwarrantable and groundless. For his own part, he was free to declare, that if the Treaty was the best that could be made; if it poured a stream of wealth into the lap of our country, if made with his most favorite nation, and it was attempted to be carried into effect by a violation of the Constitution he would oppose it. Though a departure from the Constitution at one time may bestow some fugitive advantages, yet he was firmly of opinion, that such deviations would go finally to its destruction. If a single departure from the Constitution be once permitted, the Government will subject it to constant violation.

He did not conceive, that the decision of the present question went to decide any question with respect to the Treaty. Though the present resolution be adopted, he should still feel himself at liberty to consider freely the merits of the Treaty when that comes before the House; by voting for this resolution he should not consider himself committed. He did not wish to make up his mind on the Treaty hastily; when before the House if advantageous he should give it his assent; but the present is not a Treaty question, it is only a question involving certain Constitutional powers of the Legislature. He was not prepared to give his sanction to the Treaty; but if, upon full inquiry, he found it for the interest of the country that it should be carried into effect, he certainly would vote for it; but he must confess, that if the papers proposed to be called for were not obtained, it would make upon his mind a disagreeable impression with respect to that instrument.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MARCH 16.—In Committee of the Whole on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolution:

Mr. FREEMAN observed, that the resolution before the Committee had unexpectedly to him involved in its discussion a question of a serious and interesting nature. It was not his intention to consider, at present, the principle advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that on all Treaties embracing Legislative objects, the ultimate sanction of that House was necessary to give them effect. Many ingenious arguments had been adduced for and against the principle, and had created such doubts and difficulties in his mind, that he could not now solve them to his own satisfaction. He regretted that any zeal had been discovered in discussing a delicate Constitutional question. He did not think much zeal had a tendency to discover the truth. Men actuated by it were generally like bodies that were consumed by their own heat, without imparting much warmth or light to others.

In the course of debate, gentlemen appeared to have shaped the question to the observations they intended to make, instead of adapting their observations to the real state of the question. A gentleman from Massachusetts had stated the real question to be, whether that House should by construction and implication invade the powers vested in the other departments of Government. He did not think this a fair view of the question. He considered the real question to be, how far the Treaty-making power could be extended without infringing the specific powers delegated to Congress. He should follow the example of other gentlemen and take such a view of the subject as appeared to him sufficient on the present resolution; and the question with him was, whether the House when called upon to make Legislative provision for carrying a Treaty into effect, had a right to discuss the expediency or inexpediency of granting it. On this question, he contended, the House had as complete and absolute a discretion, as they had on other objects of legislation. If the granting an appropriation to carry a Treaty into effect would produce greater evils to the community than the withholding it, he certainly should consider the House justifiable in refusing to make the appropriation. Gentlemen have contended that the Representatives were under a moral obligation resulting from a Treaty to carry it into effect: But many circumstances are mentioned by writers on the Laws of Nations, which render Treaties a nullity of themselves; and each individual, when called upon to give or withhold his assent to an appropriation bill for carrying a Treaty into effect, was to examine and judge for himself of the extent of that obligation, and of the propriety of giving or withholding his assent. He must be governed by his own moral sense, and not by that which resides in the breast of another. The argument founded on the moral obligation did not amount to any thing. For in all cases of legislation where the most ample discretion was admitted, if the fitness of a measure could be demonstrated, the House were under a moral obligation to adopt it. It was true, he conceded, that a Treaty with a foreign Power was a serious thing, and ought not, for light causes, to be violated. The nature and obligation of the compact would be taken into view, on the question of the expediency of giving it operation; but gentlemen ought not to confound the freedom of the will, or the right of voting, according to the judgment and discretion of the agent, with the strong motives which may be offered to influence the decision either the one way or the other. To say that a man was under a moral obligation to do a thing without examining the subject, and ascertaining the moral obligation by his own moral sense, was absurd. He conceived that even where existing laws ascertained the compensation for certain officers, still circumstances might arise to justify the Legislature in suspending the necessary appropriation for the payment. The whole resources of the public might be absorbed in time of war in providing the means of national defence. It might become indispensably necessary to delay the payment of the salaries due even to the PRESIDENT and Judicial officers, whose compensation by the Constitution is not to be increased or diminished during their continuance in office. But cases of this kind stood upon stronger ground than compensations to other officers, and appropriations for carrying laws or Treaties into effect; neither did he agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES had the same right to refuse to fill an office created by a law, or the Judges of the Supreme Court to refuse to decide causes, that the House had to withhold their assent to an appropriation to carry a Treaty into effect. The only discretion in the first instance was not to determine whether he should obey the law, but to select a proper character; in the second, not to determine whether they should decide causes, but the manner in which they should be decided. And if either of the officers abovementioned were to refuse to obey the laws, they were impeachable; but that House was amenable to no tribunal on earth for refusing an appropriation whenever they thought proper to do so.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had said that he was advocating an unpopular doctrine. Mr. F. did not know why he should think so. The gentleman undoubtedly supposes that he has reasoned justly. If so, why should he conclude that a majority of the people will not reason as correctly as he had, and entertain the same sentiments. Mr. F. believed that a majority of the people generally reasoned justly upon political objects. But in debate he did not like allusions of that kind.

A gentleman from New York had said, that revenue officers might follow the example of that House and say, that their will was necessary, and refuse to execute a law until it had their approbation. But did it follow from the doctrine that the concurrence of the House of Representatives was necessary in passing a law, that the concurrence of revenue officers was also necessary? The same gentleman farther observed, that the people might say their consent was necessary to sanction a law. In the latter case the gentleman stood on better ground. The consent of the people was necessary, and by their Constitution the Legislature are the organ to express the public will. Imperious necessity might induce the people to demand a new organization of the Government, but he presumed the enlightened people of America would never seek an alteration in the form of their Government, in any other than the Constitutional mode, until all hopes of success in that way should fail.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has said, that the House had no right to call for the papers in question, because they were the joint property of Great Britain and the United States. They may contain secrets which could not be divulged without a breach of faith. In support of the doctrine, the gentleman alluded to some principles in Paley's Moral Philosophy and Vattel's Law of Nations. Mr. F. denied the application of the principle to the case before the Committee. Where two nations were in alliance and carrying on joint operations against a common enemy, there might be secrets which neither party could divulge without a breach of faith. But the United States are not in alliance with Great Britain. They are concerned in no operations against a common enemy. What secrets could possibly exist between them? Were the PRESIDENT and Senate the depository of the secrets of the British Court? He did not conceive that they were upon so intimate a footing. Indeed, he should conceive it to be the vilest calumny were any man to suggest that any other connexion subsisted between them than what was publicly known. A Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, was a mere bargain; and the negotiators would represent the situation of their respective countries in the most favorable point of view. Would Mr. Grenville betray the secrets of his Government? Would he represent it to be exhausted with public debt, and crumbling to pieces, or exhibit its situation in the most splendid colors? On the other hand, would Mr. Jay communicate any thing to the British Minister respecting the situation of this country, which it would be improper to be laid before the House of Representatives? Surely not.

A gentleman from New York made some further observations which he should notice. He said common sense revolted at the construction put upon the Constitution, which he said had been well understood from the school-boy to the Senator. Mr. F. did not know how well the gentleman understood it, but for his own part he had his doubts. The Judges of the Supreme Court and other gentlemen of abilities had held different opinions on several parts of the Constitution. Was it wonderful then that members in that House should entertain different sentiments with respect to the extent of the Treaty-making power? The same gentleman said it was no matter whether the Treaty was good or bad; it was all stuff. That many people were determined not to like it, before it was promulgated. Mr. F. observed, that he should be extremely unhappy that the people should suppose that their Representatives assembled to support a side, not to investigate truth; that they voted one way or the other, just as party spirit or prejudice led them. Though he believed that gentleman had made up his mind on the subject, his mind, and he believed the minds of many others, were open to receive such impressions as the arguments which might yet be adduced ought to produce.

The same gentleman had said that some persons were opposed to the Treaty, because it compelled them to pay their debts. Every one knew that the remark was pointed to a particular State. But he would ask what clause in the Treaty placed an individual debtor of the United States in a worse situation, as to the payment of his debts, than he was before? He could discover none. He could not, he said, place his eye upon a single member in that House, and say, that he believed he wished to subvert the Government, or to destroy the peace and happiness of the United States. The same member had said, that the gentleman from Virginia ought to be bold, and that he might expect to be called jacobin, revolutionist, disorganizer, &c., as removers of ancient landmarks were always ill-spoken of. Mr. F. held it to be criminal, not only to remove ancient landmarks, but to suffer them to moulder away through inattention. The present question was not intended to remove landmarks, but to ascertain and establish them; not to invade the powers of any department of the Government, but to ascertain the true boundaries, and the appropriate powers of each. The gentleman had said he should vote in the negative, because he had sworn to support the Constitution. Mr. F. said, that he should contend for the right of the House, not only because he had sworn to support the Constitution, but from a more generous principle, because he was attached to it. He could not give an impressive effect to his observations by appealing to the blood which he had shed, or to a frame mutilated in acquiring the independence of his country; but if occasion required, he was willing to mutilate the one, and to shed the other in its defence; but the man who means in these times honestly to discharge his duty, must prepare for a severe destiny; to have his reputation assailed by unfounded calumnies; to be branded with epithets which he does not deserve; to have sentiments ascribed to him which he never felt; to be charged with base, dark, malignant designs against the Government, which the human heart is hardly capable of conceiving.

With respect to the resolution before the House, when it was first laid on the table he viewed it with regret; but as the discussion had involved a different question, if the amendment, formerly moved by a gentleman from Virginia, should be renewed and obtain, he should vote for the resolution.

Gentlemen asked what benefit would result from adopting the resolution? In the first place, it would be conciliatory. Many members wished to see the papers, and he was willing they should be gratified. In the second, they might explain any doubtful parts of the Treaty. If the present resolution was considered by him an encroachment upon the Executive, he certainly should be against it. On what principle was it that the Representatives were placed at such an immense distance from the Executive, that they could not approach him with decency and respect to ask for information on a subject before them?

It had been observed that, the papers might be seen in the office of the Secretary of the Senate. Why, then, should those members who wished to see them be compelled to go into the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and depend upon the courtesy of the Clerk for information which might as well be obtained in a more direct channel? Was it improper to have that information before the House, which might be obtained in a more indirect manner?

The negotiator has publicly quoted a part of the correspondence, and, perhaps, if the whole could be seen by the House, they would be convinced of the general friendly disposition of Great Britain towards this country.

Mr. F. did not conceive himself committed, as he claimed the right of changing his opinions as often as good reasons therefor presented themselves to his mind.

[The observations made by Mr. FINDLEY were not distinctly heard on account of a high wind. He has, therefore, to prevent being misstated, favored us with the following extract of such of his notes as he spoke from. The incidental replies which fell from him in answer to observations made in the course of the debate, and the desultory enlargements which he went into in speaking from the principles he had digested previous to his taking the floor, are not included in the following sketch.]

Mr. FINDLEY.—It seems to be agreed by both

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

parties, that the express words of the Constitution will not support either position without a liberty of construction. The difference of opinion is now confined to what construction is most agreeable to the general principles of the Constitution.

That the construction which gives the fullest scope to all the powers vested in the different departments of the Government, and which, by combining their operation, is the best calculated for the preservation of the Government itself, offers fairest to be the true one, cannot reasonably be doubted.

The Legislative powers, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to levy taxes, appropriate money, &c., are specially vested in Congress, and as deposited in the Legislature, are secured by numerous negative checks, declaring what things Congress shall not do, and guards regulating the manner in which it shall exercise its powers on the proper subjects.

The Treaty-making power is not vested in Congress; the negotiating part of making Treaties is partly of an Executive nature, and can be most conveniently exercised by that department, and is, therefore, vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate. The PRESIDENT shall have power to make Treaties, two-thirds of the Senate agreeing therewith.

Even the power of negotiating, which includes the timing of Treaties, the appointment of Envoys, and instructing them, and approving of Treaties, so far as to present them for ratification, are powers of great importance, and may put the Government in such circumstances as to render it expedient to ratify a Treaty, which, if it had not been agreed to by the negotiating agents, it would have rejected—are powers of great importance of themselves; but it is acknowledged that more than this is vested by the Constitution in the Treaty-making powers.

The power of making Treaties is admitted to be so extensive as to embrace all subjects arising under the Law of Nations, for securing amity and friendship betwixt nations, and for the mutual protection of the citizens in their correspondence with each other. Authority for this purpose is not vested in Congress among the enumerated powers, but expressly given to the PRESIDENT and Senate; therefore, Treaties, to this extent, ratified under their authority, are the laws of the land, according to the Constitution.

The powers specifically vested in Congress are so explicitly checked and guarded, as to form an unequivocal limitation to the Treaty-making power, when it extends to powers specifically vested in the Legislature, consisting of the Senate and House of Representatives, with the approbation of the PRESIDENT.

The Legislature cannot transfer its essential powers, nor evade them; the exercise of its privileges it may dispense with, but if it may dispense with or transfer any one Legislative power, it may on the same principle, dispense with or transfer every power with which it is vested, and for the exercise of which the Legislature only are responsible.

The Executive cannot assume or exercise any power expressly vested in the Legislature. If the Executive may, by an extension of the Treaty-making power, regulate commerce, make laws to raise or appropriate money, &c., or, which is the same thing, command laws to be made for carrying Treaties, which interfere with the Legislative powers, into effect; or if, as is contended, the Legislature has no moral power of discretion, no power to refuse to make laws to carry Treaties into effect, or even to form an opinion on the goodness or badness of Treaties, when they relate to powers explicitly intrusted to its deliberation:—on the same principle all Legislative discretion may be exercised by the Treaty-making power without regard to the Constitutional guards provided to prevent the abuses of those powers. For there is no Legislative power vested in Congress but what may be either directly or indirectly exercised by the Treaty-making power.

If the Treaty-making power is admitted to the extent pleaded for, and the specific powers vested in Congress are admitted in the extent in which they are unequivocally expressed, we are reduced to a dilemma, and the Constitution is necessarily admitted to have instituted two interfering Legislative authorities, acting in direct competition with each other on the same subjects, and both making supreme laws of the land; which though they may be nominally distinct; have the same effect on the citizens, with this difference only, that we may be relieved from the oppression of laws by a repeal of them, but cannot be relieved from the hardships resulting from a Treaty, without the consent of another nation.

In advocating the resolution before the Committee, we admit a reasonable latitude to both the Legislative and Treaty-making powers. Where the Treaty-making power extends itself to express Legislative objects, and where Legislative aid is absolutely necessary to carry the Treaty into effect, we contend that the Legislature, in making such laws, exercise that moral power that is necessary for legislating in all other cases, and are not reduced to the situation of an executive officer, or mere treasurers of the United States. In this case, we say, that the powers are not intended to make war with each other; that the departments ought to concur in the exercise of them. This method preserves the exercise of both powers in their proper places; the other destroys the Legislative authority which is, by the Constitution, the most explicitly vested, and precisely guarded.

The 18th Legislative power vested in Congress, which has been generally called the sweeping clause, has been often objected to as, in a great measure, defeating the checks on the specified powers vested in Congress, and as endangering the powers reserved to the States, and enabling Congress to enact laws of a questionable nature. To these purposes it might have been improperly applied.

As a shield, however, against Executive encroachments, it has always been acknowledged as proper and necessary. It not only vests Congress with authority to carry the foregoing seventeen powers into effect, but all other powers vested in any department or officer of the Government. The PRESIDENT and Senate, in the exercise of the Treaty-making power, are a department of the Government, and, as such, subjected to the Legislative power of Congress, of which they are a part.

This clause would go far to prove the right of Congress to exercise a formal negative over Treaties of every description, before they become the law of the land; and this was what the minority of the Convention of Pennsylvania plead for as an amendment to the Constitution. I did not then believe it was secured in the Constitution, nor do I contend for it now.

That the concurrence plead for is not impracticable, as has been alleged, is evident from the practice of all other limited and free Governments. It is an established principle, by writers on the Law of Nations, and is agreeable to reason, that Treaties are to be made in every nation by those who exercise the supreme sovereign authority, and this is agreeable to the practice of all nations.

In despotic Governments, the Monarch who makes the Treaty exercises both the Legislative and Executive authority; therefore, Treaties made by him, are, of course, the law of the land. In Britain, Holland, &c., where the sovereign power is vested in different departments, the consent of all the departments to a Treaty, which embraces the powers vested in those departments, is uniformly necessary to make those Treaties the law of the land.

That there are inconveniences attending this concurrence in making Treaties, is admitted. There are inconveniences attending the operation of all the checks peculiar to a limited Government; but they have not been found detrimental in practice. Britain and Holland have arisen to as much grandeur in proportion to their means, and have been as successful in making Treaties, as any nations under the sun; yet Treaties, at least on Legislative subjects, in Holland, must have the approbation of the different provinces, and in Britain, of the Parliament, before they are the law of the land. That the Treaty with Britain now before this House was laid before the British Parliament for its approbation, was announced by the latest accounts from that country.

The construction which gives a latitude to all the powers vested by the Constitution, is most agreeable to the division of powers, essential to free Governments, and best suited to the preservation of the Government itself. A concurrence of powers, where they interfere in their exercise, is a salutary guard against abuses; but, if, where the interference happens, one of the powers must yield absolute and implicit obedience to the other, without limitation, as is contended, the submitting power must, in the event, be annihilated by the paramount power, or become a mere formal and inefficient agent.

In opposition to the resolution, it is asserted, that this doctrine is new. To me, the opposite opinion is novel and surprising. The minority of the ratifying Convention of Pennsylvania has been adduced to prove, that this was not believed to be the meaning of the Constitution at that time.

Only the arguments in favor of the Constitution made in that body were preserved; but, being a member of it, and in the minority, I have a good recollection of the sentiments expressed in it.

The advocates of the Constitution, one of whom was a celebrated politician, and had an eminent hand in framing the Constitution itself, maintained that an effective, though indirect check on the Treaty-making power, would naturally grow out of the exercise of the Legislative authority; that this would be a complete check on the exercise of the Treaty-making power, so far as respected the authority of Congress. This was admitted by the minority, but they objected to the effects which Treaties might have on the State Governments; and that, in some cases, the Constitution itself might be infringed by it. The State Governments have since been secured by an amendment to the Constitution. I did not, however, expect the sentiments of a minority, acting under peculiar circumstances of irritation, and consisting of but about one fifth of the members, to be quoted as a good authority for the true sense of the Constitution on this occasion.

There is a discernible difference between the mode of expression in the article by which the Treaty-making power is vested in the Executive, and in the article where it is declared to be the supreme law of the land; in the first, it is said generally, that the PRESIDENT and Senate shall make Treaties, without defining the extent of the objects to which they shall extend, nor of their obligation; this, of itself, may be reasonably construed to extend to such objects as were not previously vested in Congress. Thus, a man in making his will, bequeaths expressly such portions of his estate as he thinks proper to his children in common; and, by a subsequent clause, bequeaths his estate, in general words, to his eldest son. By a reasonable construction, this does not entitle the eldest son to the whole estate, but to such parts of it as were not otherwise disposed of.

In the article where Treaties are declared to be the supreme law of the land, they are joined with the Constitution, the laws, and the then existing Treaties, and in connexion with them, declared to be superior to the Constitution and laws of the States; but in this clause it is not said they are so simply, as made by the PRESIDENT and Senate, but as made under the authority of the United States. The different manner of expression in the two places could not have been introduced without design; it was as easy to have said by the PRESIDENT and Senate, as under the authority of the United States, if the latter had not been intended to mean, in some cases, a more extensive concurrence of authority than the former.

It is no more extraordinary to say, that the PRESIDENT and Senate make Treaties, while it is understood that, where these Treaties embrace Legislative cases, they ought, for carrying them into effect, to be submitted to the discretion of Congress, consisting of the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the PRESIDENT, than it is to say, as in the first section of the Constitution, that the powers of making all laws shall be vested in a Congress, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives, while a reserve is understood in favor of the approbation of the PRESIDENT, with out which no act of Congress can be the law of the land, even though sanctioned with the unanimous consent of both Houses of Congress.

The small States can receive no injury from the discretion of the Legislature being exercised in making laws to carry Treaties into effect; as exercised by the Legislature, there is ample security that no preference shall be given to the ports, or, by analogy, to the exports of any State, large or small; and it is evident that the Treaty-making power, not being bound by the Constitutional guards, may suppress or burden the exports of any number of States. The first instance given operates against the exports of small States; witness the restrictions on the exportation of the cotton of South Carolina and Georgia, by the Treaty as negotiated.

If the papers called for contain information concerning the state of the Union, there can be no doubt but we have a right to call for them; on this the question can only be about the expediency, and not the right, of calling on the PRESIDENT for them. It is not because the Treaty was made with Britain, or is thought a bad one, that I insist on the right of Legislative discretion: I would insist on the same right, let the Treaty be good or bad, or if it had been made with any other European Power.

Mr. SMITH, of New Hampshire, said, he had not intended to have delivered his sentiments on the question before the Committee, but as he did not fully agree in opinion with any gentleman who had spoken, it became necessary for him to express the grounds of his opinion. This he would do as briefly as possible.

The question was, shall we call on the PRESIDENT for his instructions given to the Minister who negotiated the Treaty lately made with Great Britain; the correspondence and other documents which relate to the formation of that instrument? He agreed in opinion with those gentlemen who saw nothing unconstitutional in calling for papers containing information upon subjects on which the House were called upon to decide. It was certainly within the powers of the House. He conceived they not only possessed the right, but that it was their duty to call for all papers and documents which could enlighten their minds or inform their judgments on all subjects within their sphere of agency. He had always been in favor of such calls. A Treaty made with Great Britain had lately been communicated to the House. It had been said, that this instrument was unconstitutional. If it were so, he admitted that it was not binding on the nation, and that the House were not bound to give their aid to fulfil it. There were other cases in which he should feel himself at liberty to refuse to provide the means for carrying a Treaty into effect. These might be denominated extreme cases—cases of an abuse of power, such as that of palpably or manifestly betraying and sacrificing the private interests of the State. Such Treaties, he conceived, had no binding influence on the nation, and this upon natural principles. But it would not be contended, that the papers in question were necessary to enable the House to decide on these questions. He conceived they were not.

If the House of Representatives have any agency in the business of making Treaties; if their sanction is necessary before the instrument acquires any binding influence on the nation; if it be not valid without such sanction, he conceived there was the same reason that all the papers which relate to the formation of the Treaty should be laid before that House, as there was that these papers should have been laid before the Senate. This had been asserted. If he believed in this doctrine, he should feel himself bound to vote for the call; but he denied that this was the case; and he said that in the course of his observations he should endeavor to prove that no such doctrine was to be found in the Constitution. As this question involved the Constitutional powers of the House, he viewed it as important; it was a delicate question. We were called upon to decide as to our own powers. For these reasons he thought that the discussion should be conducted with moderation, coolness, and candor; that such a temper was most favorable to truth. However gentlemen might differ, he observed, on other subjects, in this we are all agreed, that, in forming our judgments on all such questions, the Constitution must be our sole guide. It was this instrument, he said, which defines the powers given to the General Government, and which distributes these powers among the several departments. If the Constitution had not assigned to each its peculiar portion of power, these departments, like the original elements, would be engaged in a perpetual war for power. All would be confusion, disorder, and anarchy. He proposed, in the first place, to give what he conceived to be the true exposition of the Constitution, on the subject of Treaties in general. He should then, he said, state as correctly as possible the exposition or construction of the Constitution contended for by the gentlemen opposed to him. He lamented that he could not do this with greater accuracy. The gentlemen had not agreed among themselves. He could only state what seemed to be the general current of opinion. The construction which he advocated was, that, by the Constitution of the United States, the power of making Treaties is exclusively vested in the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate. That this power extends to all kinds of Treaties—of Peace, of Alliance, of Amity, of Commerce and Navigation, and embraces all those subjects, and comprehends all those objects, which can with propriety be the subject of convention or compact between nations; that is, every thing in which they have a mutual or common interest. That a compact so made which does not change the Constitution, and which does not palpably and manifestly betray or sacrifice the private interests of the State, (which is invalid on natural principles) is binding on the nation without any sanction on the part of the House of Representatives. That such a Treaty is by the Constitution paramount to the Constitution and laws of the several States; that the Judges in the several States are bound to obey it. That it is by the reason and nature of the thing paramount to a law of the United States, and abrogates and annuls all pre-existing laws contrary to it, and, as long as it remains in force, limits and restricts the power of the Legislature of the United States to pass any laws in contravention of it. That, when such a Treaty requires money to be provided, or other Legislative acts to be performed, it is the duty of the Legislature to provide and appropriate the money in the same manner as it is their duty to provide and appropriate money for the payment of our debts. That the nation must judge whether it be constitutionally formed or not; whether the stipulations contained in it be such as in good faith they are bound to execute, and whether any circumstances have happened which would justify a non-observance of it. That on these subjects they must exercise a sound discretion. That neither the nation, nor any departments of the Government, are at liberty to reject a Treaty merely because it is a hard bargain.

The doctrine on the other side is—

That the power to make Treaties is limited to such objects as are not comprehended and included in the specific powers given to Congress by the Constitution; or, that a Treaty which comprehends or embraces any such object is not valid; that is, not the supreme law of the land, until the House of Representatives have added their sanction to it; or, if this be not admitted, that the House of Representatives, by the theory of our Constitution, have check on the Treaty-making power, in providing and appropriating money necessary to carry a Treaty into effect; which power, it is admitted on all hands, they possess; and thus in this way control the doings of the PRESIDENT and Senate, and can reject a Treaty, or at least certain parts of it. That they can and ought to do this if they believe the Treaty to be a bad one, though not injurious in an extreme, such as manifestly betraying or sacrificing the private interest of the State, (which by the Law of Nations nullifies such a compact,) and which on all hands would readily be admitted as a sufficient cause for refusing to carry it into execution.

He said he had thought it proper to present to the Committee this general view of the subject to guard against all misconception, that the real difference of opinion entertained on this part of the Constitution might be discerned, and that his subsequent remarks might be the better understood. He should now, he said, inquire what were the objects embraced by the Treaty power; how far this power might be extended? The Constitution declares that all the Legislative power therein granted shall be vested in Congress, and that the Executive power shall be vested in the PRESIDENT. He said it was difficult, perhaps impossible, with perfect accuracy, to draw the line between Legislative and Executive powers. Some of these powers were of such a nature that it was easy to pronounce concerning them; but there were cases in which there was much room for doubt; there was a sort of middle ground, where in practice the power over the same subject was sometimes exercised by the one and sometimes by the other. According to the theory of most Governments, the Treaty-making power is, for obvious reasons, given to the Executive; yet he conceived that this power was, in its nature, more analogous to Legislative than to Executive power. Had the Constitution been silent as to the organ which should exercise this power there might have been plausible arguments in favor of giving it to the Legislature. But the Constitution had not been silent; it was extremely clear that the Treaty-making power, to whatever objects it may extend, is vested in the PRESIDENT, with this limitation, that the consent of two-thirds of the Senate is necessary to give validity to the act. It is also clear, that, according to our Constitution, (however the thing may be in theory,) the Treaty power is not Legislative, for all the Legislative power is given to Congress, while this is given to the PRESIDENT and Senate. It seems scarce necessary to add, that these powers are exclusively given, for Congress can no more make Treaties than the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate can make laws. Do the Legislative powers vested in Congress interfere with the power of making Treaties vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate; and if they do, which shall yield to the other?

When it is said that Congress shall have the power to do certain things, for example, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, it means no more than this, that Congress shall have all Legislative power over this subject, not that the entire power over foreign commerce is given to Congress. Laws, from the nature of the thing, cannot fully accomplish this; they can have no binding force within a foreign jurisdiction. If it be said, that under the general power to make Treaties is not included the power of regulating foreign commerce by Treaty, then there is no power vested in the General Government completely to regulate foreign commerce. Shall it be said, that the Treaty power shall be restricted to the making of such regulations as laws cannot reach, and such only? This is absurd; it would annihilate the Treaty power. For what nation would treat with us, and by compact agree to give our citizens privileges, when our contracting organ had no power to promise any thing on our behalf? From the nature of the thing it must be evident, that the Treaty power must extend to objects which may, under other circumstances, be the foundation of Legislative acts. Treaties do what laws cannot do; but in order to do this, they must extend to some things which laws can regulate, with reference to ourselves. They must, in some small degree, restrict the exercise of Legislative power. Treaties, if made by Congress, would have the same effect precisely. If they are not repealable, all succeeding Legislatures are restrained in the exercise of the power of legislation, by the stipulations which may be in the Treaty. It is not correct to say, that the Treaty power does not extend to the objects enumerated in the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution. It does to most, if not all of them; the hypothesis therefore is inadmissible, that the objects over which Congress have Legislative power are excepted out of the Treaty power; though it is strictly true, that the PRESIDENT and Senate cannot legislate on these objects in the sense in which that term is used in our Constitution.

By way of objection, it is said, that the Treaty-making power is indefinite and unlimited, and therefore the specific powers given to Congress should be considered as exceptions to it, or limitations to the exercise of it. The answer is, that it is ridiculous to talk of excepting Legislative power from Treaty power, for they are different in their nature, in their means, and in their subjects. Legislative power can always act on all subjects proper for its exercise. But it is not strictly true that the Treaty power is indefinite and unlimited. The word Treaty is a technical word, and as certain and definite in its meaning as any word in the language.

The Treaty power is in its nature limited. The PRESIDENT and Senate cannot, as has been already stated, alter the Constitution or change it. Many of the cases mentioned by gentlemen, of the exercise of this power, fall under this exception. There is a natural exception to this power which respects the abuses of it, and which comprehends many of the instances alluded to by gentlemen. In all those cases, though a treaty may have the form of a compact, yet it possesses no binding influence, and the nation must, from the necessity of the case, judge whether the compact be really binding, for there is no common tribunal to which both parties can resort. It has been argued against this latitude given to the Treaty power, and which is no more than the words really import, that a power so broad and extensive may be abused. It may be so, and is not this equally true of all delegated authority? By the same mode of reasoning we might narrow the powers of Congress, for they may also be abused; many of these latter powers are equally indefinite and unlimited, and equally liable to abuse. Mr. S. instanced the power to raise taxes, borrow money, declare war, &c.

It has been further urged, that this construction goes to annihilate the Legislative power altogether, and to render the House of Representatives an useless body. He denied the fact to be so. On the fullest legitimate exercise of the Treaty power there would be much ground for legislation, even on those subjects where the Treaty power was most necessary and would probably be the most employed. He instanced, the making regulations respecting foreign commerce.

As to many of the objects specified in the section containing an enumeration of the powers of Congress, the perfect power of legislation remained. He mentioned the case of a Treaty of Peace. This did not prevent Congress, when there was any sufficient cause, from declaring war, and they ought not to declare war without such cause. A Treaty may stipulate for the payment of a sum of money; the power and right of appropriation of this money is no more destroyed or lessened than in the case of any other contract made by the Government for the payment of money. Congress may by Treaty be restricted as to some objects of taxation, but as to many they cannot; and no money can be raised without a law for that purpose; it cannot be raised by Treaty.

Mr. S. then proceeded to inquire who, by the Constitution, are vested with the power of making Treaties; or, in other words, whose sanction or concurrence must they receive before they acquire any binding influence over the nation?

He said, he would not enter into the theory of the subject; this was a wide field. Gentlemen might amuse us, but it would afford very little instruction. We were not making a Constitution, but construing one already made. No words, in his opinion, could be clearer than those used in the Constitution, all construction seemed precluded. The PRESIDENT, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall make Treaties, and Treaties when made shall be the law of the land. Not a syllable is said about the House of Representatives. If it had been the intention of the framers of that instrument, to give the House of Representatives any agency in this business, is it not reasonable to presume that intention would have been clearly expressed? Mr. S. then adverted to the argument of a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] who had discovered this power of the House to interfere in the expressions used in that clause, which declares the effect of Treaties; that Treaties made "under the authority of the United States" shall be the supreme law of the land; and endeavored to show that this did not prove the doctrine.

But it has been said, with some show of plausibility, that the House of Representatives possess this power, because it is of a Legislative nature. But it has been shown that in the sense in which the Constitution uses the words, Legislative power, Treaty power is not Legislative. It is true it bears some resemblance to Legislative power; but is this a sufficient reason for introducing the House of Representatives into the exercise of it? Mr. S. said, if the House possessed this power contended for, there must be some way in which this power was to be exercised. He inquired, what that mode was?

He could conceive of but three modes. By a vote on the Treaty generally; by passing a law declaring it valid, or by means of passing appropriation laws.

It could not be by the first of these modes, for the House could only act on those subjects where power was given to Congress; for they could act only as a constituent part of that body, and in the way pointed out, to wit, a majority of each House possessing a negative on the other, and a qualified negative in the Executive. In this case the powers as well as the mode would be different. The PRESIDENT proposed the act, the consent of two-thirds of the Senate was necessary. Was the House to act by a majority or two-thirds? If the sanction of the House is to be given by a law, this absurdity seems to be involved in it, that a law is necessary to give that the force and validity of a law, which the Constitution declares already possesses it. Beside, this law is either repealable or not. If it be said that it is repealable, then it must follow, that, as its existence was necessary to give validity to a compact, its repeal must destroy it, and thus one of the parties can repeal a bargain. If irrevocable, the consequences stated before, of its narrowing Legislative ground, exist in full force as to all future Legislatures.

Mr. S. wished to inquire of the gentlemen who advocated the doctrine, that the sanction of the House was necessary to give validity to the compact, what was the state or condition of the instrument before that sanction was given? The Constitution declares that it shall, when made, bind the Judges in the several States, and the law and usages of nations consider it as made at the time of signing, and complete at the moment of the exchange of ratifications. Is Great Britain at this moment bound by the late Treaty? Will Great Britain be excused from delivering up the posts till they hear that this sanction is given? Suppose they should deliver them up, and then the House should refuse their sanction?

Respecting appropriation laws, at present he would only say, that these laws were always founded on the idea of a pre-existent law or compact already made and valid, and barely made provision for the fulfilling them. It was ridiculous to say, that providing the means of paying a debt or fulfilling a contract, created the debt or gave any validity to the contract which it did not possess before.

He then proceeded to inquire what were the effects of a Treaty when made? From the nature of the thing it must be evident that both parties were bound by it. He contended also, that it must be good for the whole or for nothing. He adverted to what fell from a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PAGE] that the amity part was good and the rest void. He asked how it was with that part which respected navigation? He believed the gentleman would find it difficult to separate the parts from each other. It is not pretended but that a Treaty of Peace is within the Treaty power, and not within the specified powers given to Congress; yet it is difficult to conceive of such a Treaty, which shall not contain settlement of boundary, &c., these things may be the consideration on which the peace is granted by one of the parties; shall the consideration be void, and yet the peace good? That article which one of the party chooses to consider as void, may have been the only reason, at least among the reasons which induced the making of the other articles, which are to be considered as good. This was strange doctrine. Mr. S. also contended, that a Treaty must abrogate all pre-existent laws contrary to it, from the nature of the thing. He did not derive any argument from the words of the Constitution, that Treaties should be the supreme law of the land; but he insisted as the Constitution had given them the force of laws, they must have this among other effects, that of repealing former ones, every later law repealed all former ones inconsistent with it. He saw no difficulty in this. The nation by one organ make a law, by another organ they repeal it. Treaties, he insisted, had this effect before the adoption of the present Constitution. He referred to the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the British Minister in proof of this.

Mr. S. said, he would trouble the Committee with one further inquiry only, and that was as to the nature of the check or control which this House have over the Treaty-making power in passing appropriation laws or by any other means. He agreed in opinion with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] that the Constitution was full of checks and balances, and therefore he thought we ought not to travel out of it for checks. That we could not add any not to be found in the instrument itself. In this way we might, and he was afraid would, give a check to the wheels of Government, which would make them stand still. He would not say that gentlemen intended this, but he was persuaded this was the effect their measures were calculated to produce. Over Treaties which required no Legislative act to carry them into execution, the House certainly had no control, if the Treaties were of such a nature as to be binding in good faith on the nation. The Legislature had indeed the power to violate them; they could declare war immediately after a Treaty of Peace was concluded. If a Treaty require any Legislative aid, such as money to carry it into execution, to fulfil any stipulation contained in it, the House of Representatives could refuse to give this aid, and the Treaty would be broke by the denial. He admitted there were cases where they could with propriety refuse to fulfill. The cases had been mentioned—unconstitutional Treaties, or abuses of power in any of the extreme cases, were instances of the kind to which he alluded. He would add another case, where the Treaty in the opinion of the nation is broken by the other party, or a disposition to break it is so manifest as not to be mistaken. In every such case the House must judge whether the Treaty be valid or not. The question will not be whether it is a good bargain or not, but whether it is a bargain honestly and fairly entered into. The Treaty, he believed, received all the validity or force it was susceptible of before the House of Representatives could act upon it. Our carrying it into execution added nothing to its validity; our refusing did not weaken the obligation, or destroy the compact, any more than the refusing to pay a debt we justly owe destroys the contract by which the debt has a legal existence. On the question whether the compact was of such a nature as to be binding on the nation, he had no doubt but the House had the fullest and most perfect discretion; instead of saying that we ought to act without discretion, he was of opinion that we had no right to act without it.

The power which he supposed existed in the House, existed in every other department of the Government; it is incorrect to say, that the House of Representatives exclusively possess it. Because a Treaty may really be a hard bargain this no more justifies the non-observance of it than an individual can be justified in refusing to fulfil a legal contract more favorable to the other party than to himself. He hoped gentlemen would not take the advice given them, to throw away their discretion. He was of opinion they would stand in need of all they had, and advised them to keep it, and exercise it on all proper subjects. A gentleman from Virginia had insisted on it that he would not part with his moral sense. If some of the opinions which that gentleman had just delivered might be considered as a specimen of his morality, he must say, he liked that gentleman's sense much better than his moral sense.

MARCH, 1796.]

Mr. S. concluded with observing, that he had taken that view of the subject which appeared to him to be the most proper. The arguments he had used, and the construction he had given to the Constitution, however other gentlemen might view the subject, were such as were perfectly satisfactory to his own mind.

Mr. WILLIAM LYMAN began with remarking, that the gentlemen opposed to the resolution had at first contended, that the House had not a Constitutional right to require papers of the Executive, relative to any subject whatever; and that if a requisition was made, it would be discretionary with the Executive, whether it should be complied with or not.

To this he replied, that the House possessed the power of impeachment solely, and that this authority certainly implied the right to inspect every paper and transaction in any department, otherwise the power of impeachment could never be exercised with any effect. But not to rely solely on this, he recollected one case, he said, perfectly in point, which was in the correspondence of the former Secretary of State [Mr. JEFFERSON] with the British Minister, communicated to the House. From dates and references, there appeared in that correspondence a chasm. The House, therefore, passed a resolution requesting the Executive to lay before them what had been omitted; and further, the resolution in that case was offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH,] who was now so vehemently opposed to the present. The right of calling for papers was sanctioned, he said, by the uniform and undeniable practice of the House ever since the organization of the Government; they had called for papers and information whenever it was judged expedient; and he asserted, that the House had the fullest right to the possession of any papers in the Executive department; they were constituted the especial guardians of the people for that purpose; and he would undertake to say, that this was the first time it had ever been controverted.

However, he should not longer dwell upon this point, as it had been abandoned, nor would he charge the gentlemen with inconsistency in so doing; he thought they acted very judiciously in giving up a position so untenable.

As the authority of the House was therefore admitted, the only question was, whether it should now be exercised; and this, he said, brought into consideration their Constitutional powers with those of the other branches of the Government, and what limits had been marked to each; to what objects the Legislative powers extended, and within what bounds the power of making Treaties was restrained, and in what manner they were controlled by the Legislative power.

The House would therefore contemplate themselves as sitting and acting in a judicial capacity, to determine the extent of their powers; and as, on the one hand, he trusted that no motives of an overweening partiality to themselves would in any degree influence, to give too great a scope; so, on the other, he hoped they would possess the firmness not to surrender any of those which had been delegated to them. He said, he considered appeals to fears and panics, as made for the want of solid argument; and that all addresses to the passions implied a real fear to apply to the understanding. His passions, he said, he believed, would never be so operated upon, as to overwhelm his judgment, and that all attempts of that sort would be without the least effect. Those attempts to alarm, he thought, might very well be abandoned, as wholly irrelevant; and that then the discussion would be, as it ought, the investigation of truth. If, upon a candid and temperate inquiry, the result should be, that the House had a Constitutional authority to judge of the expediency or in expediency of carrying the Treaty into effect, it must be obvious to every one, that they ought to have the possession of the papers required in the resolution. This must be admitted even by the gentlemen opposed to it; and he did not see, in that case, how they could withhold their vote.

In order to ascertain the powers of the House, he would advert to the Constitution. In the first article and first section, it was declared, "that all Legislative powers therein granted, were vested in a Congress, to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives;" and in the eighth section of the same article, the powers granted were defined and specified, such as to lay and collect taxes, borrow money, regulate commerce, and to exercise other important powers enumerated in the several clauses of that important section. He said it was unnecessary to read them, as they had been so frequently referred to in the course of the debate; but he would request gentlemen to pause and reflect whether it could be supposed that this section was not to be efficacious and operative; was it possibly conceivable that a section so definite and so important had been introduced in the Constitution merely for the purpose of being nullified and rendered nugatory by a subsequent article or section? The very supposition, he said, appeared to him the height of absurdity, and an affront to common sense; and yet this would be the case, if the doctrines advanced were true, viz: that Treaties, when made and ratified by the PRESIDENT and Senate, were supreme law, and that they controlled and repealed all laws that stood in their way. Congress could neither regulate commerce, borrow money, prescribe rules of naturalization, nor legislate on any other subject, because the PRESIDENT

DENT and Senate, by Treaty, would abrogate them all. It was in vain to consult the House of Representatives in the formation of laws, if they thus were liable to be annulled at the pleasure of the PRESIDENT and Senate. The present question, he said, was not, whether the House should make Treaties, but whether the PRESIDENT and Senate should make laws; all the power contended for on the part of the House was the power of self-preservation; it was a repelling power, a power to prevent the PRESIDENT and Senate, under the color of making Treaties, from making all the laws. A gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GRISWOLD] had said, that the Legislative power occupied all ground, and was vested in Congress; and that the Treaty-making power occupied all ground, and was vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate; and that although Congress, who were the agents for the people, should make laws, yet, that the PRESIDENT and Senate, who were also their agents, might, by Treaty, repeal them. This, Mr. L. said, contradicted a sound axiom, and one he had never before heard controverted, viz: that it required the same power to repeal as to make a law. Such incongruities as the gentleman had advanced, Mr. L. said, could never be reduced to practice; two persons could not be possessed fully and completely of the same thing and at the same time. The gentleman could never reconcile his positions, the one would certainly defeat the other; upon his construction, the Treaty-making power must absorb the Legislative power, or the Legislative power would absorb the Treaty-making power. This, then, induced the necessity of a different construction. In the interpretation and construction of laws or Constitutions, the following rules had always been deemed sound: First, to regard the true spirit and meaning, and not merely the letter. It was a maxim very ancient, and at the same time very common, that qui hæret in litera hæret in cortice; that is, that he who adhered only to the letter stuck in the bark, and never arrived at the pith. Another rule was, to resort to the context or other parts of a law or writing for a true interpretation, and not unfrequently even to the preamble and title, which had very justly and emphatically been termed a window to let in light upon the subject. By viewing certain parts, abstracted and detached from other parts of the same writing or instrument, it might be rendered absurd and contradictory. An example he would offer from the Constitution of the United States: In the second article and third section it was declared, that in case of disagreement of the two Houses of Congress, with respect to the time of adjournment, that the PRESIDENT might adjourn them to such time as he should think proper; but was it supposed that he could adjourn them for two, ten, or twenty years? No, it could not be pretended; for, in another part of the Constitution, it was declared, that they should meet once every year, and that such meeting should be on the first Monday of December, unless they, by law, should appoint a different day or time. Taking both these parts of the Constitution together, it resulted, that in the case of disagreement between the two Houses with respect to the time of adjournment, that the PRESIDENT could adjourn them to such time only as he should think proper within the time fixed in the Constitution, or by law, for their annual meeting. Even the gospels of Heaven might, he said, by disconnecting and considering only detached parts, be rendered blasphemous. For example: "the fool hath said in his heart there is no God." If only the latter part of this verse or clause should be read, the position would be, that there is no God; whereas, when the whole verse or clause is taken together, it imputes the conception only to a fool.

It appeared, therefore, to him, that Constitutions, laws, and all writings, ought to receive such interpretation and construction as to render them consistent with themselves; and that it was highly presumptive a construction was erroneous when it produced an absurd conclusion. If the several parts of the Constitution were compared and critically examined, the determination must be, that, although the PRESIDENT and Senate could make Treaties, yet it could not be intended, those Treaties that intrenched on the specific Legislative powers of Congress, unless with their concurrence and consent; otherwise, it followed, that, although the three branches were consulted in the enacting laws, two might repeal them. But it had been asserted that this power, insisted upon on the part of the House, was a novel doctrine, introduced merely upon the spur of the present occasion; notwithstanding which, it had been proved by several gentlemen who had spoken upon the question, that this interpretation was given to the Constitution in most of the State Conventions at the time of its adoption; that the same interpretation had also been given at that time, by the writers both for and against its adoption. It had appeared, from the extracts of publications at that period, that whatever might have been the diversity of opinion in other respects relative to the Constitution, that, in this construction, at least, both its friends and opposers perfectly agreed. This principle, then, being thus settled and understood, it remained only to show that it had been invariably admitted and recognised from the first organization of the Government until this time. The first Treaty that had been made under this Constitution, he said, was that with the Creek Indians, in the year 1789; previously to the making of which, the PRESIDENT communicated the subject to Congress; an extract from which communication he would read, viz: "If it should be the judgment of Congress, that it would be most expedient to terminate all differences in the Southern District, and to lay the foundation for future confidence by an amicable Treaty with the Indian tribes in that quarter, I think proper to suggest," &c. Here, Mr. L. said, he wished it might be particularly noticed, that this subject was expressly referred to the judgment of Congress to determine on its expediency or in expediency, and for what purpose, he would ask, was it referred? If the Senate and PRESIDENT possessed the full power of making Treaties, there could be no occasion for consulting the House of Representatives; and yet, in this ease, the first that presented itself, it had been conceived necessary. In consequence of this communication, Congress had judged it expedient to hold the Treaty, and on the 20th of August, the same year, enacted a law in which the sum of twenty thousand dollars was appropriated for that purpose; and, in conformity thereto, the PRESIDENT appointed Commissioners and gave them instructions, which instructions had been also communicated to Congress, from which he would also read one paragraph; it was as follows: "You will observe that the whole sum that can be constitutionally expended for the proposed Treaty shall not exceed twenty thousand dollars." On this, he said, any commentary was unnecessary, as the principle that the Legislative power operated to restrain the power of making Treaties, was so fully and explicitly recognised and admitted by the PRESIDENT himself. By pushing inquiry further, it would be found that, in January, 1790, in consequence of communications from the Executive which were referred to a select committee, and a report made thereon, the House came to the following resolution, to wit: "That provision ought to be made by law for holding a Treaty with the Wabash, Miami, and other Indian tribes Northwest of the river Ohio." In March following a law was made, the title of which was "An act entitled an act providing for holding a Treaty to establish peace with certain Indian tribes."

In March, 1791, the sum of twenty thousand dollars was appropriated for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty with the Emperor of Morocco. In March, 1793, one hundred thousand dollars were appropriated to defray the expense of a Treaty with the Indian tribes Northwest of the river Ohio.

Thus it was apparent that laws had always been deemed necessary to provide for holding Treaties and for defraying the expenses thereof. However, still to continue the investigation: in the Messages of the PRESIDENT, on the 6th December, 1794, the following paragraphs would be found, to wit:

"I lay before you a Report of the Secretary of State on the measures taken for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty with the Emperor of Morocco."

"Also, I must add, that the Spanish Representatives now perceiving that their last communications had made considerable impression, endeavored to abate this by some subsequent professions, which being among the communications to the Legislature, they will be able to form their own conclusions."

But this, he said, was not all that might be adduced, from even the Journals upon the Clerk's table, to illustrate the question. In the Report of the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamilton, (made to the House on the 6th January, 1791, in conformity to their order of the 15th day of January, 1790,) of a plan for the establishment of a Mint, he would beg leave to notice, for the consideration of the Committee, a few clauses, as follows:

"In order to a right judgment of what ought to be done, the following particulars require to be discussed: 1st. What ought to be the nature of the money-unit of the United States? 2d. What the proportion between gold and silver, if coins of both metals are to be established? 3d. What the proportion and composition of alloy in each kind? 4th. Whether the expense of coinage shall be defrayed by Government, or out of the material itself? 5th. What shall be the number, denomination, sizes, and devices of the coins? and 6th. Whether foreign coins shall be permitted to be current or not; if the former, at what rate, and for what period?"

Another paragraph was in the following words:

"The foregoing suggestions respecting the sizes of the several coins, are made on the supposition that the Legislature may think fit to regulate this matter; perhaps, however, it may be judged not unadvisable to leave it to Executive discretion."

And another yet, as follows:

"It may, nevertheless, be advisable, in addition to the precautions here suggested, to repose a discretionary authority in the President, to continue the currency of the Spanish dollar, at a value corresponding with the quantity of fine silver contained in it, beyond the period above mentioned for the cessation of the circulation of the foreign coins."

Mr. L. said he would make but one citation more, and that was from a Report of the first Secretary of State, [Mr. Jefferson.] of the 14th of April, 1790, on the letter of John H. Mitchell, reciting certain proposals for supplying the United States with copper coinage. In that Report the Secretary observed:

"Coinage is particularly an attribute of sovereignty; to transfer its exercise into another country is to submit it to another sovereign. In fine, the carrying on a coinage in another country, as far as the Secretary knows, is without example, and general example is weighty authority."

From both these Reports, it was evident, he said, that as the regulation of the coins was among the specified powers of Congress, it was the opinion of the two Secretaries that they could not be regulated otherwise than by an act of Congress; but from the Treaty-making doctrines now advocated, the PRESIDENT and Senate might authorize the currency of foreign coins, or even a coinage in a foreign country. For example, could they not, in the Treaty with Spain, have agreed, that the Spanish dollar should be current in the United States? Certainly they could, if their Treaty doctrines were well founded; if the interpretation of the Constitution now insisted on in the House had depended solely on theory, and unsupported by the multiplicity of precedents on their own Journals. The charge of innovation that had been so constantly sounded by the opposers of the resolution might have created, perhaps, some real apprehensions. But now he thought the world must be convinced, that the principles by which the resolution was defended, were clothed with both Legislative and Executive sanction; that so far from being tenets but of yesterday, they had been generated by the Constitution, and matured and ripened under its operations. To whom, then, did the charges of innovation and usurpation attach? Surely to those who, in the exercise of the Treaty-making power, were endeavoring to aim at the Legislative power. Those were the new fangled doctrines; they were the tenets of yesterday, and foisted into the Constitution upon the spur of the present occasion. From some researches and inquiries that he had made, he was induced to think that the right or power of making Treaties was of the nature of those rights which had obtained the name of imprescriptible rights; that is, the cases in which it was or might be necessary to treat, were so many and various, that it was impossible to prescribe certain rules antecedent to the case, and that could only be done by the whole people, or by their Legislature. Mr. Marten, in his Law of Nations, in speaking of the validity of Treaties, says:

"Anything that has been promised by the chief or his agent beyond the limits of the authority with which the State has intrusted him, is at most no more than a simple promise, which only obliges the person who promises to use his endeavors to procure its ratification, without binding the State, which of course may refuse such ratification. Thus the stipulations of a monarch, though he should be absolute, cannot be valid, if it militates against the fundamental laws of the State, at least unless it be ratified by the nation."

At the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713, which was made with the view of settling the succession to the French and Spanish Crowns, and to prevent their union in the same person, it was considered as an indispensable prerequisite that the letters patent of the Kings of France and Spain, also the Dukes of Berri and Orleans, renouncing and abjuring their several claims and pretensions, should have the Legislative approbation of the Parliament of Paris and the Cortes in Spain. In short, the Treaty-making power was not vested (in so absolute a degree as contended for on the part of the Executive here) in the Kings of France under the ancient Government, or the Kings of Spain and England, countries which had been continually depicted as oppressed and vexed in a manner that forced their inhabitants to seek refuge upon our shores.

Mr. L. then said he would consider a little some of the arguments and objections that had been offered on the other side of the question. The gentleman from Rhode Island, in behalf of the small States, had set up a claim to his construction of the Constitution, in order to preserve individual State sovereignty. To him, Mr. L. said, the argument appeared to stand thus: that small States must possess the means of dissolving large States, to prevent the latter from absorbing the former. That is, to secure the people in their State Governments, you must destroy their rights in the General Government. It would be the case, he observed, upon that gentleman's interpretation of the Constitution, that a small proportion of the people of the United States might make all the laws. The small States, by their representation in the Senate, could dispose of the large States by bargain or contract. It was not a little singular, indeed, that the small States, not content with an equal suffrage in the Senate, should claim the right of wresting all power from the House of Representatives, in which alone the large States had any proportionate weight and influence. It would have been unnecessary, Mr. L. observed, to have noticed this argument, had it not appeared calculated to excite local jealousies and State prejudices. Certainly the inhabitants of the small States could not possibly have any reasonable fears when they reflected that not only they were represented in the House in proportion to their numbers and population, but also in the Senate equally with the larger States. If any apprehensions were to be entertained, it must be by the latter. But the gentleman from Rhode Island, to confirm his doctrines, affirms, that at the adoption of the present Constitution, in the State of Massachusetts, it was understood in the same sense; as to that fact, Mr. L. said, he would not determine; but this he could say, that the gentleman, so far from finding any countenance for his assertion, would find the contrary in the debates of their Convention. In those debates, one member, Mr. King, said:

"That the Treaty-making power would be found as much restrained in this country as in any country in the world."

Another member, Mr. Choate:

"That as the regulation of commerce was under the control of Congress, it could not be regulated by Treaty without their consent and concurrence."

He would now pass to an objection of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. SMITH] who had just sat down, viz: that the advocates of the resolution must be wrong, because they disagreed in their own interpretation. Possibly, he said, every one might not have given the same exposition; it was not always so easy to state what we would, as what we would not have: there was, nevertheless, no diversity of sentiment; at any rate, they were agreed in one thing at least, that the construction of that gentleman was wholly wrong.

Mr. L. then said he would advert, for one moment, to the assertion of his colleague, [Mr. SEGWICK] "that confidence in Government ought to be unlimited." This, he said appeared to him to induce another consequence, viz: that of passive and absolute obedience. It was, in fact, the revival of the long exploded doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance; and, although such tenets might constitute a claim or pretension to the confidence of some Governments, he hoped it was not yet the case in this, and that such sentiments would never be prevalent here; for it was his opinion that there never either had been or would be a Government perfectly pure and uncorrupt, without a little watchfulness and even distrust, and that societies oftener discovered too little than too much. There was a natural effort in all societies to confer power and wealth on a few, at the expense of the many. This tendency the most required to be counteracted; from this quarter danger was first to be apprehended, and not from another, as had been contended. Popular branches and assemblies never usurped, they never encroached on other departments, until they were challenged, and even forced to the conflict, by some inordinate attempts for power. Every department should, then, exercise great caution and moderation not to excite and provoke jealousies and discontents, that possibly would issue in resistance.

He should make but a few remarks more, as it was now considerably later than the usual time of adjournment. The remarks were relative to the late Treaty; not indeed whether it was a very bad or good Treaty, for that was not now the question before the Committee; but that the Treaty itself recognized the principle he was contending for. He then read from the 12th article these words: "that during the continuance of this article, the United States will prohibit and restrain the carrying molasses, sugar," &c. Why, said Mr. L., is this language and phraseology used? Upon the principle of the unlimited power of making Treaties, and that they repeal laws, the language and phraseology ought to have been thus: the United States do prohibit and restrain; or, it is hereby prohibited and restrained. It was, he said, unnecessary to reply, for the Minister who negotiated the Treaty, well knew that he possessed no such authority. He knew that from the source he derived his appointment no such power could flow. Mr. L. said that he hoped, therefore, that the resolution would be agreed to by the Committee, and that it would pass in the House; for, as they would be obliged to discuss the Treaty to which the papers mentioned in the resolution related, it was necessary they should be possessed of all the information, and have the whole subject before them. And he declared, that although heretofore he had entertained sentiments very unfavorable to that instrument, yet, notwithstanding, if any papers or arguments could explain either the policy or necessity of acceding to the measure; if it could even appear that although there had been sacrifices very important on the part of the United States, yet that they were rendered inevitable by the necessities of our situation; if it should be evident that the terms and conditions on which we now stood with other nations compelled us to find a shelter in a compact of this sort, he must give his vote for carrying it into effect: but if, on the other hand, it should be found that the Treaty was neither promotive of our interests nor imposed by necessity, it never should, with his consent, have any operative effect in this country, while his exertions could prevent it.

MARCH 17.—In Committee of the Whole, on Mr. Livingston's resolution.

Mr. REED said, he saw no necessity for the papers referred to in the resolution. If the constitutionality of the Treaty should be questioned, or the propriety of making appropriations, these questions, he conceived, must be determined by comparing the Treaty with the Constitution, and by attending to those stipulations contained in the Treaty itself.

It was not his intention to have troubled the Committee by speaking on this occasion; but perceiving that some gentlemen, in the course of the debate, had gone further into the opposite extremes than he was prepared at present to follow them, he felt as if he ought to express his own sentiments with regard to the Constitutional rights of that House relative to the Treaty in question. The Treaty was undoubtedly negotiated, ratified, and promulgated by Constitutional authority. The President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, was, in his opinion, unquestionably that authority which the United States had authorized to make Treaties. But still it seemed taken for granted that some agency of that House, in its Legislative capacity, would be needed in order to carry the aforesaid Treaty into effect. A question, therefore, arose, viz: Was that House, in all such cases, bound and obliged to put so implicit and absolute a confidence in the Executive or in Treaties as would render it entirely unnecessary to have any opinion of their own about them, or the probable consequences of their operation? For his part, if he had never seen the Treaty in contemplation, and were perfectly ignorant of its contents, or, if he fully believed, as a citizen, that it was unconstitutional, or calculated to ruin, or very materially injure the country, he should not think himself justifiable in voting to appropriate money for the purpose of carrying it into effect. It had been conceded by gentlemen that if a Treaty were evidently unconstitutional, it would not be wrong to withhold appropriations; and he conceived that a Treaty might possibly be so injurious in its effects as to justify such a measure. Supposing such a possible event should ever actually happen, did not the right of refusing to legislate in support of the said Treaty involve the right of previously examining all Treaties which need the aid of the Legislature, and of judging for themselves whether it would be proper or improper to make laws for the purpose of carrying them into effect?

In making Treaties the Executive would use his own discretion, keeping within the limits prescribed for him by the Constitution. In making laws the Legislature must use their own discretion, always keeping within those limits and bounds which the Constitution had fixed for them. He said, the discretionary right here contended for was not the right of doing wrong; it was not the right of violating the Constitution; it was not the right of supporting a Treaty which ought to be defeated, nor of defeating a Treaty which ought to be supported; but, simply the right of judging for themselves, whether they ought, by their own act and deed, in the character of legislators, to appropriate by law such sums of money as would be needed in order to support an existing Treaty, all things and circumstances relating thereto being suitably examined and properly considered. Perhaps it would be objected, that the Constitution no where expressly gave the legislators that right. He answered, the right was not precluded, but implied, and, in some respects, evidently one of the original and essential rights of man; a law of nature, prior and superior to all other laws; a law never to be transgressed in any station whatsoever. Individuals, in many cases at least, had a right to exercise their own discretion with respect to the propriety of submitting to a civil law or of risking the penalty, the consequence of disobedience; and, as a branch of the Legislature, he believed they had a right to deliberate and consult among other things, the expediency and duty of making or of refusing to make appropriations, even in the case of a Treaty. It appeared to him that, in legislating, the Legislature should have this right of judging for themselves with respect to the propriety of making or refusing to make any law whatsoever. In most cases their duty would perhaps appear plain and obvious, particularly in the case of appropriating money where a law or Treaty actually existed. However, the obligation did not arise wholly from the circumstance of an existing law, but partly from the nature, reasonableness, and tendency of the thing itself.

A Treaty negotiated by Constitutional authority was, he contended, a solemn compact between two nations. It was an important consideration; but he thought they might, with propriety, attend to other considerations, for and against it, especially when their own aid was required, in order to carry it fully into effect. This he conceived was the right of the House, and no encroachment upon the prerogative of the other branches. An appropriation was a specific sum, appropriated by a particular law to a particular purpose.

The right of appropriating the public money was not a natural right, but a right derived from the Constitution; and the Legislature was to exercise that right according to the honest dictates of their own best discretion; excepting those instances in which they were expressly restricted by the Constitution itself, as in the cases of compensation for the services of the President of the United States, and for the services of the Judges. Congress might deliberate and act discretionally in stating at first their salaries.

With respect to the Judges: if after their salaries had been stated they should be deemed insufficient, Congress has a discretionary right to increase them; but the Constitution said they should not be diminished during their continuance in office. With respect to the President's salary, Congress had no discretionary right to make any alteration; for the Constitution said it should not be increased nor diminished during the period for which he was elected. With regard to compensations and appropriations in general, wherein there was no restriction or limitations, the whole affair seemed left to the direction of those whom the Constitution had authorized to transact such business. He said, the case of an existing establishment of law might be a very good reason why each branch of the Legislature should deliberate and decide with peculiar caution; but, as the Constitution no where expressly said that appropriations should be made in all such cases, and as mankind had a natural right to alter their opinion or differ from others, each branch of the Legislature had a Constitutional right of judging for themselves, and of making appropriations according to the dictates of their own honest judgment.

He said, it was acknowledged by all that the Constitution was their rule, but still some difficulty remained, for different persons understood and explained the Constitution, in some instances, very differently. There was often an unavoidable ambiguity and obscurity in words made use of to express certain definite ideas. New and unexpected cases would frequently occur. The best definitions would soon need defining. There was no other way, therefore, but for every one to investigate and understand the Constitution for himself, and to follow that construction which appeared to him, upon the most careful examination, to be the true and proper meaning.

He said, with respect to the Treaty in contemplation, there were many petitions on the table, some in favor and others against its being carried into effect. When the Treaty, therefore, came under the consideration of the House, gentlemen would undoubtedly be able to judge for themselves with respect to its constitutionality, and the propriety of making appropriations, by comparing it with the Constitution, and by attending suitably to those stipulations which it contained.

Mr. TRACY said, he felt a diffidence in giving his sentiments in that House, which was much increased when he considered the ability with which the question had already been discussed, and the length of time it had consumed; but the magnitude of the question would justify him, in his own opinion, for asking of the Committee to indulge him with a small portion of their time and attention.

This was the first time, since the adoption of the present Government, that a discussion of the important Constitutional question of the extent of the Treaty-making power could have taken place, as it respected a foreign nation; and, of course, would probably form a precedent for all future inquiries of a similar nature.

The call for papers contained in this resolution was new and delicate; the papers were ordinarily considered as of an Executive nature; and ordinarily it would be agreed, on all hands, the House of Representatives had no right to them. Ought not then a call of this extraordinary kind to carry on its face the special reasons which induced it? He asserted that the object of the resolution was new, although it had been said it was similar, in point of principle, to that of calling on Heads of Departments for papers and documents to assist the House in Legislative business, which he contended was not a correct idea. The House certainly had a right to call for any papers or statements from its officers, created under the laws, which it had participated in making. No former practice or decision of the House could give a lead in this case; and were there no Treaty made with a foreign nation, now before the House, no gentleman would pretend there existed a right or propriety to call for the papers in question. He objected to the form of this resolution: it is a request for all papers, such as may be secret in themselves, and may affect future negotiations; the only discretion left to the President is such papers as may relate to any present negotiation. If a requisition of this kind could be ever justifiable, it certainly would be proper to accompany it with precise and specific reasons, stating the real objects.

A Treaty, said to have been made with Great

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. of R.]

Britain, had been committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. If, when that matter should be taken up, all parties should be perfectly satisfied with the Treaty, and no laws should be necessary to carry it into effect, and none to be repealed, would any person pretend we wanted these papers? If, when that period should arrive, the House judged a declaration of war or impeachment of the negotiator was expedient, he would not say, a call in substance like the present, but in form specifying its exact object, might not be proper.

But, if the present call was proper, it could be so only on the ground that the House of Representatives had a right, in their official capacity, to examine a Treaty in its passage, before it became a Treaty with binding force.

To examine it as a constituent power, without whose sanction it can have no validity. This right in the House of Representatives had been claimed; and, if this was a just definition of their right, and once became established, he agreed the call contained in the resolution would be completely justifiable. It has been said, a publication of those papers was necessary to allay public ferment. If so, specify the intention in the call. But the opinion of the PRESIDENT might in this view of the subject, be safely trusted. There could be neither necessity nor propriety in the House going to the PRESIDENT with information that a Treaty he had formed was unpopular, and advise him to take measures, by publishing papers, to allay the fermentation; or, with a kind of compromise, such as, if you will let us see your papers, we will carry your Treaty into effect. On such ground he thought him justifiable in pronouncing the call impertinent.

The Constitutional rights of the House of Representatives to interfere with Treaties, might properly be considered in two points of view:

1. Had they a right to assist in the formation of Treaties in such a manner as that a Treaty would be incomplete without their sanction officially given? And,

2. Had they a right to refuse appropriations of moneys, (if necessary to carry into effect some provisions in a Treaty,) and in that way defeat its operation?

He acknowledged, if the first position could be supported, the right to call for the papers would be conclusive; but, he contended, they could not be wanted on the latter ground.

If the Constitution was examined, it would be found the Treaty-making power was given to the PRESIDENT; and no interference, or right given to any other men or body of men, but to two-thirds of the Senate, and that by way of consent or advice. Could it be pretended there was a shadow of authority given to the House of Representatives?

In the Constitution it is said, "all Legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress," &c. Would it be pretended, had the Constitution gone no further, that the then thirteen independent sovereign States, by that part of it, had parted with the Treaty-making power? No!

they reserved a great share of Legislative power to themselves, and delegated to Congress only in certain cases, best calculated, in their opinions, to advance their own happiness; and unquestionably reserved every right, power, and sovereignty, which they did not expressly give away by the Constitution itself. The powers of legislation are the powers of making statutes in all cases respecting men and things within the jurisdiction of the Legislature; but it could by no means in its nature comprehend the Treaty-making power, which is the power of contracting or making bargains in the name of a nation, as a moral person, with another nation or moral person, for their mutual benefit, and to be binding and operative on them, as parties to the contract or bargain. And although this had binding force on the nation, when once formed and completed, yet it was not a Legislative act. But the Constitution went further: it had actually designated the PRESIDENT, with the advice of the Senate, to be a Plenipotentiary for the formation of Treaties. Vattel, page 179, speaking of the various customs of nations, in the deposit of this power, says:

"All conductors of States (meaning the Executives) have not the powers, of themselves, of making public treaties: some are obliged to take the advice of a Senate, or of the Representatives of a nation. In the fundamental laws of each State we must see what is the power of contracting, with validity, in the name of a State."

He supposed by "fundamental laws," Vattel must mean the Constitution of a State; if so, it will not follow that the supreme Legislative or executive power of a State, as such, have necessarily the power of making Treaties; it might be, and in most countries was, an object of precise delegation, and probably always, or certainly more commonly, given to the Executive. This Constitution had precisely given it to the Executive, subjoining the advice and consent of the Senate; and in this particular, and in no other, had the individual sovereignties delegated all their power without limitation. It was necessary and proper this power should be lodged somewhere, and equally necessary it should be entire and unlimited, to meet every exigency that the welfare of the nation might require. It had been said, that general expressions of power would be limited by specific: this was a general truth, but he denied the application which had been attempted. It was said, the Treaty-making power is a general power; the Congress has a specific power to regulate commerce, &c. Of course, the specific power to regulate commerce will check the operation of a Treaty of a commercial nature. He said this part of the subject had been so ably and conclusively managed by a gentleman from New Hampshire, yesterday, [Mr. SMITH,] that he would not exhaust the patience of the Committee by going over the same ground. He would however observe, that by the common rule of construction, all the powers given to the PRESIDENT which could, and in their nature would, check or operate on legislation, must be considered as a specific portion of power carved out of the general power given in the former part of the instrument. The general powers of legislation first given to Congress, and in the next place specific powers given to the PRESIDENT, could not fail to lead the mind directly to such a construction. "All Legislative powers, &c., are vested in a Congress," but the PRESIDENT has a qualified and specific check. Power to regulate commerce with foreign nations is vested in Congress, yet the specific power of contracting, bargaining, or making a Treaty, is, so far forth as it may touch Legislative points, a specific check upon it. Yet he acknowledged this was not his chief reliance. The nature of the case was such, that whatever internal regulations, or those relating to external and foreign commercial subjects, which may have become objects of Legislative attention, oppose or come in competition with a contract or bargain about the same things, must give way. It does not exclude legislation from the object of foreign commerce, but establishes certain points within which it shall operate, and which it cannot violate. The thirteen sovereignties possessing all the power, gave to Congress a certain portion of Legislative authority; but they certainly could give to the Executive, or any other body, the power to make Treaties. This he contended they had done, by the words of the Constitution, in an unlimited manner.

Treaty with Great Britain.

If we were to travel out of the Constitution to support any opinion, he urged the old Confederation in support of his construction. In that Constitution, almost all the commercial power was retained by the States. An explicit article was inserted, that all powers not expressly given, were by the individual States retained. The power to make Treaties was there directly given to Congress, with a proviso, which would show plainly that the authority to make Commercial Treaties was meant to be given.

The words of the ninth article are: "The United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on war," &c.—"entering into Treaties and alliances, provided that no Treaty of Commerce shall be made," &c.—adding a restriction which acknowledges the general power to extend to Commercial Treaties. A similar construction to the one now contended for would have left the co-operative power with the State Legislatures. This, some of the Legislatures supposed they did possess, if we were to judge from their public conduct. But the sound and correct opinion, he thought, was clearly as he had stated. To enforce this idea, he quoted Mr. Jefferson's correspondence with Mr. Hammond, pages 48, 49, and 50; from which, he said, it appeared that the opinions of the best informed men in almost every State concurred in the construction of Treaties being supreme in their operations, and paramount to the laws of any or all the States. He then quoted the proceedings and resolutions of Congress on the same subject—two resolutions passed March 21, 1787; a circular letter sent to the Executive of each State, dated April 13, 1787; and a resolution passed October 13, 1787, respecting a law passed in Virginia, in contravention of the second article of the Treaty with France. He said, the following idea was universally to be found in all these proceedings in substance, and more than once in words, viz.: "When a Treaty is constitutionally made, ratified, and published by us, (Congress,) it immediately becomes binding on the whole nation, and super-added to the laws of the land, without the intervention of State Legislatures." He supposed nothing could be more natural than for the framers of the Constitution which is now in operation to give at least as much force to Treaties as was, or ought to have been, given under the old Confederation; for which reasons they gave the Treaty-making power most explicitly to the PRESIDENT, with this only check of advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate: and added in the sixth article, that when Treaties were made under this authority, they should be the supreme law of the land.

The idea suggested by a gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BOURNE,] that this power of making Treaties was, by the framers of the Constitution, meant to be placed out of the House of Representatives, on account of the jealousy of the small States, was undoubtedly just. Thirteen sovereignties were about to deposite the most important of their concerns in hands which, in their opinions, would first promote their happiness. The sovereignties were equal, as each State was completely sovereign and independent, and the quantum of sovereignty brought into common stock was, notwithstanding any Territorial difference or inequality of numbers, equal; therefore, as the Treaty-making power was considered an act of sovereignty, the States were all to participate equally in it, by force of their equal representation in the Senate. He said, personally he could have no such jealousy, as the State of Connecticut, which he had the honor with others to represent, was singularly situated—holding just the same proportion in the House of Representatives as she did in the Senate—one-fifteenth part of the whole. If any proof could be necessary, he thought the almost unanimous understanding of the members of the different Conventions in the States, who were called to discuss the Constitution for adoption, was in favor of the construction he had given: that a Treaty, when made by the PRESIDENT, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate—ratified and promulgated in the usual manner—was complete, without any assistance or co-operation of the House of Representatives.

To this point, he quoted the Debates of the Virginia Convention, vol. 3, page 89. A gentleman, active and eminent in that body, says, speaking of that part of the Constitution which defines the power of making Treaties—

"The Representatives are excluded from interposing in making Treaties, because large popular assemblies are very improper to transact such business, from the impossibility of their acting with sufficient secrecy, despatch and decision, which can only be found in small bodies; and because such numerous bodies are ever subject to factions and party animosities. It would be repugnant to Republican principles to vest this power in the President alone; it is therefore given to the President and Senate (who represent the States in this individual capacity) conjointly. In this, it differs from every Government we know," &c.

He acknowledged, that, from such debates, the real state of men's minds or opinions may not always be collected with accuracy; but he was induced to quote the above in this part of his argument to show that whatever might have been thought by the members of that Convention to be checks on the operation of Treaties, by virtue of the power of withholding appropriations, yet no one took such extensive ground as is now contended for by some of the supporters of the resolution under consideration. The principal objection to the Treaty-making power in that Convention seemed to be grounded on a fear that Territory might be ceded by the PRESIDENT and Senate without the consent of the whole Legislature. Consonant to this idea is the amendment agreed to by the Convention: For in that they connect the House of Representatives with the PRESIDENT and Senate, in forming all Treaties which are to cede Territory. But in another sentence of the same amendment, when they mention Commercial Treaties, they only wish to add, that two-thirds of all the Senate shall consent, and not two-thirds only of those present. It had been said, that the Constitution was similar to that of Great Britain in the part respecting Treaties. This, he contended, was an incorrect statement: in his opinion they were very different. The Constitution of Great Britain was formed almost entirely of usages. It had been, for a great length of time, the usage for the King to lay before Parliament, for their approbation, Treaties—especially those of a commercial nature. If this was a usage, all that could be said of it was, that it was a part of their Constitution. He supposed this right had been given by the Crown, at some time, to obtain a grant of money; but he could not recollect that the Parliament, with all their pretensions to a right of rejecting Treaties, had ever exercised it. They generally made a pretext of dislike to a Treaty to change the Administration. This had been often done: it was on the Treaty of Peace of 1783. The Treaty of Utrecht, which was concluded in 1713, had been cited as an instance of rejection by the British Parliament. It was a fact, in that instance, that nothing was rejected but a conditional Treaty. In forming the Treaty, there were many distinct parts: one part of it was a Commercial Treaty between England and France, separately signed, and conditional—that is, "within the space of two months after a law shall pass in Great Britain, whereby it shall be sufficiently provided, &c., the general tariff made in France, &c., shall take place there again, &c." The law did not pass in Great Britain, and of course the Commercial Treaty failed. Mr. T. said he had searched all the Treaties made by Great Britain since the Treaty of Munster, which, if his memory was accurate, was concluded in 1648, and could not find an instance of the Parliament's refusing their assent to a Treaty made unconditionally; and he really believed, if they practised fully on the right they claimed, it would very soon destroy their Government. It had been said, Blackstone in his Commentaries had defined the powers of the King of Great Britain to be unlimited in the making of Treaties. He observed, that, let Blackstone or any other Crown lawyer say what he would in favor of prerogative, it was well known the usage had been to submit to Parliament the consideration of Treaties, and that usage was a part of their Constitution; and he rejoiced, that in that particular the Constitution of his country was different. Gentlemen had said, Shall this House not have as much power respecting Treaties as the House of Commons in Great Britain? This question was both improper in itself, and calculated to mislead. Were we in Convention, and forming a Constitution, it might have weight; but in a cool discussion of a Constitution already formed and adopted, and the question is, What powers are given? it could not be proper. And it ought to be remembered that Parliament, and not the Commons alone, had this right in Great Britain. In defining the relative powers given by the Constitution, there was danger of the popular branch making encroachments on the other branches, under pretence of favoring the liberties of the people. This pretence, however grateful it might sound in debate, he thought was but a pretence. It was the duty of the House to make a stand against all encroachments on their own rights, if any were attempted, but it must equally be their duty to exercise great caution not to encroach on others. He said, he considered the responsibility which was so very necessary on those in the exercise of the Treaty-making power could not exist if it was extended to the House of Representatives.

The remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [MR. GILES,] that he, and those who advocated the same opinions, by constant association and thinking on one side only, had become, like pulpit reasoners, inattentive to the weight and force of what might be said in opposition, might be just in application to himself; for he acknowledged he had been accustomed to hear but one opinion on this subject; and from the first appearance of the Constitution to this time, it had been a uniform opinion with him, and those with whom he generally associated; and he confessed he could not retort the observation on the gentleman, for the opinion advanced by him was a new one, and probably the gentleman had not been in habits of hearing it often declared or advocated. He thought it singular that, in a discussion of this nature, there should be a resort to the British Constitution, and still more so, that a very exceptionable part of it should be claimed. Could any man seriously wish that Treaties, generally made in some critical period of national affairs, after being settled with a view to existing circumstances, should in a length of time afterwards be subject to the consideration of any other branch of the Government who could not know many of the motives for a particular cast it may have? Those who thought with him on this subject, he said, had been accused of a design to give up the exercise of rights properly vested in them by the Constitution to the PRESIDENT and Senate, and this was called sacrificing the rights of the people. He thought it not the first time he had heard a struggle for power, dignified by the name of a virtuous attempt to protect the liberty of mankind. Could it be supposed that he or any other man could wish to resign rights given by the Constitution? Power, it was said, was intoxicating; but it must be a singular operation of the human mind, under the fascinating influence of power, to seek every opportunity to give it up, and become a slave. He wished gentlemen to apply their own maxim of the intoxication of power to the present struggle, and discern on which side its influence will most probably carry them. He asked why a parallel was drawn between this House and the British House of Commons?

In that country, the immediate representatives of the people had been for a long time obtaining privileges from an hereditary Executive and nobles, which by them had been usurped. In this country, the Executive and Senate were the representatives of the people, possessing powers exactly marked out and defined by a written Constitution; and the attempt to give an alarm against the despotism of the PRESIDENT and Senate, by comparing them with King and Lords, could not, on any principle, be proper, delicate, or justifiable.

He had often heard before he came into the Government and since, that we had a Constitution, giving portions of power, exactly defined, and that if we thought it might even become beneficial to the people, to take a constructive latitude, in the exercise of power, yet to step off of the written and defined limits given us would be improper in the extreme: this doctrine, although used on occasions, which in his opinion were inapplicable, was weighty and important. He asked gentlemen to reflect in what way this power, now contended for, was to be obtained? Was it found in the Constitution, or by a construction, which, if not directly in violation of terms, was nearly so?

He said, that a writer, under the signature of Publius, in a series of papers called the Federalist, had been quoted as favoring this doctrine of associating the House of Representatives in the formation of Treaties. He said it was an unfounded assertion: what that author had said upon the subject was contained in two chapters; the first begins with page 201, and the other in page 272, both of the 2d vol. He requested gentlemen to read those two chapters, and he was much mistaken if all would not acknowledge that the opinions of the Federalist were not to associate the House of Representatives with the PRESIDENT in the making of Treaties. What was said in page 133 of the same volume he would notice in the other branch of the argument.

But gentlemen had said, if this extensive right must be abandoned, yet a constitutional check remains with the House of Representatives, to defeat all Treaties, which may require appropriations of money to carry them into effect. If this was called a right of co-operation in making Treaties, he did not understand it; to say, a payment of a debt was part of a contract, and a refusal to pay made void a contract was to him perfectly unintelligible. He considered a Treaty a bargain or contract complete, when made by the PRESIDENT and Senate; and if money was necessary to carry it into effect, it did not invalidate the contract to refuse an appropriation; it was only saying the nation had made a contract, and then refused to fulfil. He requested a few minutes' indulgence on the subject of appropriation, which was the second and last view he had proposed to take of the subject.

Gentlemen had exclaimed, with some warmth, "Are we to be machines perfectly at command of the PRESIDENT and Senate; and are appropriations to be made without exercising any discretion?"

He considered this House, in all Legislative acts, to possess a full and unlimited discretion, with some few exceptions, which he would point out. A bill comes under the consideration of this House to establish trading-houses with the Indian tribes. Full and perfect discretion to accept or refuse is certainly vested in this House. Suppose they, in concurrence with the other branches, pass the bill, and employ an agent, with a promise contained in the same bill to pay him one thousand dollars for certain services, and this agent renders the services and produces his account, it is well known he cannot be paid without an appropriation by law. Can any man say, that, in considering the bill of appropriation, a complete discretion is left to pass or not? Would it be called a correct idea to assert that a man was possessed of full and complete discretion to embrace truth or falsehood, after both were distinctly held up to his view? Would not the truth force his acceptance? Suppose there was a clause in the Constitution subjecting the United States to a suit, and suppose a suit instituted and judgment rendered against them, would this House say, before we appropriate moneys to pay this judgment, we will look into the merits of the case, and if the decision is not, in our opinion, grounded on proper testimony, we will refuse an appropriation? Or would they say, the sum of the judgment has now become an obligation on us, declared to be such by the constituted authority, and we are bound in good conscience and by the rules of morality to appropriate? The salaries of the PRESIDENT and Judges had been acknowledged to be situated by the Constitution itself in such a manner that we are bound to appropriate. He considered all Constitutional obligations, and those arising from laws and Treaties constitutionally made, on the same footing. He said there was now a Treaty concluded with the Dey of Algiers contracting to pay him an annuity of 12,000 sequins. Suppose, ten years hence, the House of Representatives should not think proper to appropriate this sum, war would be the consequence, and in this exercise of discretion, as it was called, one branch of the Government would have it completely in its power to declare war. The difficulty would not rest here; for by taking this ground the Senate will have the same power of refusing appropriations, and they exclusively make war; whereas the Constitution has given that power to Congress, with a view that each House should be a check on the other. If the House should believe at any time it was better to go to war with the Algerines than pay the annuity, their duty would be to institute a bill of the kind; if the Senate agree, a Treaty can undoubtedly thus be annulled; but if the Senate negative the bill, the duty of this House would become very strong, if not irresistible, to appropriate.

Treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. T. said he would not detain the Committee any longer than to hint at what was said of a sentence in page 133 of the Federalist, which is—“And although the House of Representatives is not immediately to participate in foreign negotiations and arrangements, yet, from the necessary connexion between the several branches of public affairs, those particular branches will frequently deserve attention in the ordinary course of legislation, and will sometimes demand particular Legislative sanction and co-operation.” He conceived that laws might become necessary in the various exigencies of a Government in consequence of Treaties being made that might be called sanctioning them, and yet not so immediately connected with them as to preclude a full or nearly a full and complete discretion whether to pass them or not; but he could not agree that in the act of appropriation which might be the only desideratum in a Treaty, that a full and complete discretion to appropriate, or not, was left to any one or all branches of the Government. He acknowledged if a Treaty was unconstitutional, it was not then a contract of binding force, and of course contained no obligation of any kind whatever; if a Treaty was so terrible in itself, and manifest consequences ruinous to the nation no argument could be drawn from such a statement to establish general rules. The moral law had said, we shall not kill, and yet a man may be placed in such a situation, as that he not only may but it becomes his duty to kill; could it be said a general right to kill is proved by this concession? But could gentlemen seriously say, we now wanted these papers, mentioned in the resolution, to assist us in determining upon the question of appropriation? He thought not. He supposed the first extensive and unlimited right of interfering in the making of a Commercial Treaty could alone justify the call, and he believed that ground must be given up. He said his colleagues [Messrs. SMITH and GRISWOLD] had asserted no other doctrines than such as he now advocated, and yet they had been accused of saying that this House had no will of their own, but must in all cases implicitly obey the PRESIDENT and Senate. The construction he had given to the Constitution he believed to be just, and trusted he could be under no necessity of declaring the purity of his intentions, as he did not doubt but every member of the House was guided in the investigation by the purest motives.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that at the present state of the discussion, little was left but gleanings, and to hear testimony against a doctrine that appeared to him big with consequences fatal to the true interests of the country. He would not pursue the sophistry of the gentleman last up [Mr. TRAcy] through all its windings and turnings; he would only observe that the gentleman had read some, and quoted much to prove that Treaties were the supreme law—a doctrine that was admitted by all, that is, when under the authority of the United States. He also had taken much pains to convince that a contract being by authority of Congress for 1,000 dollars, money ought and would be appropriated to pay the contractor. Does any one deny this to be sound doctrine? Yet he thought he had seen conduct which might be construed against it.

He said the resolution requested certain papers to be laid before the House. What had been the custom of the House heretofore? Invariably to ask for all and every paper that might lead to information. He well recollected that, in 1793, a great ferment had arisen in the public mind in consequence of the Proclamation of Neutrality, (which had always appeared to him to be a wise measure,) that on the meeting of Congress a great number of useful papers relative to our situation with respect to foreign nations were submitted, some of them of a most confidential nature, relating to Treaties then depending, particularly that with Spain. The PRESIDENT was not afraid to place his confidence in that House, and he was right; the public mind was restored to quiet, and the people of Kentucky (then restless) were satisfied that the Executive were doing every thing in their power to obtain the free navigation of the Mississippi. The PRESIDENT went farther; he sent a special agent to Kentucky to communicate to that Government the line of conduct then pursuing for their welfare. Had the public mind been less disturbed on the late Treaty than in 1793? He thought not; and that every paper which would tend to satisfy that the Treaty was expedient, or to give information on a subject that must be discussed before that House, might with propriety be asked for.

A gentleman from Vermont [Mr. BUCK] repeated by another from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] said, to vote for this resolution would be treason against the laws and Constitution. Why this harsh language? Did it lead to a discovery of truth? Where did these gentlemen find that definition of treason? Not in the Constitution, for there it was properly defined.

A gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] had said, that none of the various town meetings, relative to the Treaty, had asked for papers; the various Legislatures who had judged of the Treaty, had they requested papers? Did the gentleman mean this as good reason why that House should not ask for them? If he did, it was certainly argument not worthy of refutation. Another gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] had said, the House might institute an inquiry into the conduct of the Envoy; and he challenged the opposers of the Treaty on that ground, it may investigate the Treaty itself. Mr. S. would ask, whether the papers were not necessary to such inquiry and to such investigation? The same gentleman said, that if these papers were necessary, he would demand them as a right, not ask for them in the milk-and-water style proposed. Here the gentleman felt bold. But this has not been the custom. It had been usual, and he hoped always would be, to approach the Chief Magistrate of the Union with proper respect and decorum. To ask for the papers (he added) was unconstitutional, because unnecessary; he might as well have endeavored to convince by saying, it is so, because it is so. A gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GRISWOLD] had opposed the passing of the resolution in a masterly manner. He had never, at any time, listened to any man in that House with greater pleasure than to him; but, upon re-examining what he heard, he found the merits of the orator lay in the ingenuity, not in the strength of his reasoning.

From the papers, Mr. S. said, gentlemen had taken a ground that appeared alarming, viz:

That the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate may, by the aid of a Treaty, do anything, and everything, not morally impossible, (provided they do not infringe on the Constitution,) and that the immediate Representatives, forming this House, have only to be informed thereof, and to obey.

Let us pause for a moment, and ask, Was this possible? Could this be the fair construction of our so much boasted Constitution? If it should be, he would not regret the services rendered his country during the late glorious Revolution, nor the part he had taken to promote the adoption of the Constitution; nor would he, by inflammatory speeches within, nor his actions without doors, do anything that should tend to destroy the harmony then subsisting, or to disunite a people whom nature and relative wants seemed to have connected together; but he would endeavor, in a Constitutional manner, to obtain amendments to the Constitution, which would prevent the evil in future. But is there occasion for amendments to the Treaty-making power? He thought not. There were checks and balances sufficient in the Constitution to prevent the evils that might arise out of it. He said, he could offer nothing new, but would pursue the train of reasoning begun by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON.]

In the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, Congress have power to lay duties, &c., &c., but all duties shall be uniform throughout the United States:

Can regulate trade with foreign nations:

Can establish a uniform rule of naturalization.

Congress, then, although they have the power to lay taxes and duties, and to make laws of naturalization, are bound to make them uniform; and in another article, are prevented from giving a preference by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. But the Treaty-making power is not so confined; it may relieve one of our ports from this uniformity of duties, or one of the States from the uniformity of naturalization: that is, it may relieve goods imported in British bottoms into New York, from the one-tenth extra duty, and let it remain on all the other ports of the Union. But say gentlemen, it is unfair to reason against the use of power by its probable abuses. He thought it advisable to guard against abuses: but has this abuse not already taken place? He thought it had. Not with respect to a port of the consequence of New York; that would have been too palpable; but on the Lakes, by the third article of the Treaty, goods imported to the territory in that quarter, in British bottoms, are subjected to no higher duty than goods imported in American vessels to the Atlantic ports. Here appeared a departure from that uniformity required by the Constitution; here appeared a preference given to the ports of one State over those of another; and yet gentlemen contend, that the House have no right to inquire into the business. Indeed, so delicate was one gentleman [Mr. BUCK] on the subject, that he opposed committing the Algerine Treaty, lest it should establish a claim to investigation! It was true, the trade on the Lakes was small, but it would increase. Thus, although Congress were very wisely restricted, when laying duties, to make them uniform, yet the PRESIDENT and Senate would be capable, by the assistance of a foreign Power, to destroy that uniformity.

Again: he said, the Treaty-making power, as contended for, may prevent the export of rice, tobacco, fish, flour, or any other article, and that House must not interfere, must not inquire. But this would be the abuse of power. True; but it will be found, by the twelfth article, that the Envoy agreed that laws should pass to prevent the export of all West India goods. Nay, even of cotton, one of the objects of our growth. It was true, the Senate did not consent to this: but if they had, and the PRESIDENT had ratified it, that House, it was contended, must have passed the laws. It would have had no option.

Again: Mr. S. said, Congress passed a law (in his opinion a wise law) granting a bounty on the fishery, as a nursery for seamen, and another for promoting navigation by restrictions on foreign bottoms. Suppose a power jealous of our rapid increase of navigation, should, by a Treaty, repeal those laws. Would that House have no right to inquire the reasons why? Gentlemen say no: but that the Senate would be too wise to consent to such a Treaty. And yet it will be found, the law giving advantages to American vessels over foreign, and laying an extra duty on tonnage, will be virtually repealed by that part of the Treaty which gives a right to the British to countervail, and preclude the United States from legislating further on that subject. But the Treaty has not touched the fishery bill, if it had, submission ought (it is contended) to have followed from that House. The subject may thus be followed under the Treaty-making power, until every power granted by the people to Congress would be swallowed up, and that House reduced to a registering office.

He asked what could stop the Treaty power thus construed; he trusted that House would, and he was happy that the subject was brought forward under the Presidency of the greatest man

Treaty with Great Britain.

on earth, because a doctrine established whilst he was at the helm of the nation, would carry so much weight with it, that it would probably never be again disputed.

But, said he, are those papers secret? No, they are known to thirty Senators, their Secretary and his clerks, to all the officers of Government, and to those of the members of this House who choose to read them. Then, say gentlemen, where is the necessity of calling for them? He answered, because it was more proper and more respectful to themselves that they might form a document which the members might quote in support of their arguments, when the Treaty came under discussion; otherwise they might be called to order, or their quotation denied. For instance, suppose he should assert that the Envoy had no power to effect a commercial Treaty; that he was to try what terms relative to commerce might be obtained, but positively prohibited from signing anything until it should first be reviewed by the PRESIDENT. Suppose he went further, and should say that the signature of the Envoy committed this country to a situation so delicate, as in some measure compelled the Senate to consent, and the PRESIDENT to ratify: What would be the consequence? Why, some member might deny it, and the one assertion would stand against the other.

A gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEDGWICK] had applied his arguments to three points: 1st. That the doctrine of that House having any check or control over Treaties entered into by the PRESIDENT and Senate, was new, never before heard of, and never mentioned in the different Conventions which adopted the Constitution. 2d. That the Senate was composed of men, the most virtuous and enlightened; men, who had always been forward in the hour of the greatest danger; chosen by the elect of the people; by the Legislatures of the different States; not by an ignorant herd, who might be cajoled, flattered, and deceived; not even by the enlightened citizens of America. 3d. That the opposition arose not from the provisions in the Treaty, but because it was made with the British. From the first point he had been completely driven by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BREX] who had proved that the doctrine was not novel, but as old as the Constitution, and generally admitted in the Conventions.

On the second point, no person would deny the good qualities of the Senate; but without any disparagement to the Senators from Massachusetts, he should be at no loss to find two gentlemen from the same State of equal abilities and of patriotism as well tried, and he presumed the gentleman would not disagree with him, when he was informed that he would probably fix his eye on him as one. The same gentleman said, Who are we that we should attempt to judge over the heads of those wise men—we, who are collected from the remote corners of the Union? We, said Mr. S., are the immediate delegates of the people, collected from the different districts of the Union, to aid and assist the wise men above stairs in making wholesome laws, and to retain those privileges given to the House by the Constitution, which he trusted they would hand to their successors inviolate. He then took a view of the members who came from the remote parts of the Union, and declared them to be men of sound judgment and real abilities.

The third point was a very serious charge indeed, no less than that the opposition which had been made, was not to the instrument, but because it was made with Great Britain; and the gentleman asks, why a similar opposition had never been made to the Treaty with France? Why this language? Can such reflections assist in the discovery of truth? Was the gentleman aware how this might be retorted? Did he reflect that some gentlemen of as little temper as himself might have said, that such a Treaty would not have been signed by the Envoy with any other nation, nor consented to by the Senate. Nay, he might, if very irritable, have said, that if it had not been British, it would not have been supported on the floor of that House, and might have quoted in proof the great delicacy of certain gentlemen on the resolution relative to American seamen impressed by the British.

But it was with pleasure he had seen, that no reflection, no insinuation, no threats, had been uttered by any gentleman on that side of the question which he had espoused. He hoped that nothing but fair arguments would be adduced. If he should be in the minority, it would be his duty, and he would (as a Republican ought to do) acquiesce in whatever might be the determination of the majority. As to the Treaty with France, it was made before the formation of their Constitution, which wisely provided that all engagements, heretofore made, should be binding on the new Government; of course, neither the PRESIDENT and Senate, nor that House, had any power over it.

Mr. S. then stated, that he did not mean, and he hoped he should not be understood to preclude himself from voting to carry the Treaty into effect. He held himself entirely open to conviction; and if he should find that the same was expedient, whatever might be his opinion at present on the instrument (and in truth he did not think it good) yet he would keep himself at full liberty to act as he might think most fit to the interest of this country, when that subject should come before the House.

MARCH 18.—In Committee of the Whole, on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolution:

Mr. ISAAC SMITH did not pretend to prescribe limits to other men's faith, but he never could believe that men, as wise as those who composed the Convention, would have left so important a regulation, as was now contended for by some gentlemen, to mere uncertain construction. He believed, if they intended that House should have had an agency in the making of Treaties, they would have said so in express terms. Had they done so? Nothing like it. So far from it, that they had unequivocally appropriated the Treaty-making power to the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate, in terms as express and positive as words could form: and the gentleman in opposition could not, did not deny it. But, say they, this power may be abused, shamefully abused, and, therefore, we will construe it out of the hands the people have placed it in. We will assume and declare ourselves the sole guardians of the people, and we will cry out liberty, liberty; and, as the people love the sound (he hoped they would always love the substance,) perhaps they will believe us. Here rests the fallacy. The people knew, whether they know or not, that they chose the PRESIDENT, and they firmly believe, as well they may, that he is their guardian. The people knew, also, that they chose the Senators, and they likewise think they are their guardians. How we, said he, became sole guardians, will require a modesty superior to that of New England to explain. The people have declared that the PRESIDENT and Senate shall make Treaties, without a single exception, and, lest there should be any mistake or cavilling about it, they have put it in written words, as they thought, too plain to be doubted, too positive to be contradicted. It appeared to him that it was a sufficient answer, though a short one, to all the laborious arguments had in favor of their interference, to say, that the people wills it otherwise: sic volo, sic jubeo, stat pro ratione voluntas. If they had under consideration alterations or amendments to the Constitution, those arguments might, perhaps, be proper; but, as matters now stand, they are mere inapplicable declamation.

A gentleman from Virginia told them that the Government of the United States was a Government of checks, but said, that, in the short time it had existed, they were completely routed. Nevertheless, he mentions several checks that still stand their ground: among others, biennial elections were a check upon the Executive. According to his calculation, he said, they were a check upon that House, in the ratio of four to two and of six to two, and, therefore, the people trusted them less than any other branch of Government, and he most cordially adopted that gentleman's own words, "if the opinions now contended for prevail, nothing will remain to be done by checks." Construction will answer every purpose.

Several gentlemen had adduced arguments from the Government of Great Britain, and had attempted to assimilate the American Government to it, to give them the greater force. He would examine that matter. Did the people of England choose their King every four years? Was he impeachable? No, he can do no wrong. Did they elect their House of Lords or Senate? No, they are hereditary as well as their President. Must two-thirds of them approve every Treaty before it can become valid? No such thing. How a parallel, then, could be formed out of such diverging lines he left to wiser men; it was greatly beyond his poor abilities, and he was equally incapable of comprehending arguments drawn from so mysterious a source.

A gentleman from Virginia boasted much of the superabundant love of liberty that prevailed in the State he had the honor to represent. The groans of three or four hundred thousand black people held in bondage, he said, afflicted his ears, and made him hesitate, although he wished to believe the encomium he had bestowed. He did not like boasting, it provoked retort, and offence followed. He should not say one word in praise of New Jersey; it did not need it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that the very able support this resolution had received, might seem to release him from any obligation of speaking in its defence; nor would he now trouble the Committee with any observations on the subject, if those he made on the introduction of the business had not been misstated, and his subsequent explanation partly suppressed. He had stated, when he had laid the resolution on the table, as a reason for requesting the papers, that important and Constitutional questions would probably arise on the discussion of the Treaty. It had been represented, (certainly from misapprehension, not design,) that he confined the use of the papers to the elucidation of a Constitutional question only; and it had been asked, with an air of great triumph, how the instructions and correspondence could throw any light on the question of constitutionality, to decide which nothing was necessary but a comparison of the Treaty with the Constitution? Mr. L. said he had not confined the utility of the papers to that point, but that, if he had, it would not be difficult to suppose a case in which they were necessary to determine the constitutionality of the Treaty. The Constitution, he said, gave to the PRESIDENT the power to make Treaties, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Men, respectable for their talents and patriotism, had supposed that, by the true construction of this clause, the PRESIDENT could make no Treaty unless by the previous advice and consent of the Senate; in other words, that the Senate should advise the making of a Treaty, which they could only do before it was commenced; and should consent to it by a ratification after it was concluded. He would give no positive opinion on this subject, but supposed it a point worthy the attention of the House. The construction, he said, appeared reasonable, and had been heretofore sanctioned by practice. Two instances he could recollect; one was in the Treaty of Holston, where Governor Blount was "vested with full powers and specially empowered by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." The other instance was found in the answer of the PRESIDENT to the French Minister, who offered to enter into negotiations for a Treaty of Commerce, which the PRESIDENT declined, by referring him to the meeting of the Senate, which was not then in session. If the PRESIDENT supposed he could not commence a negotiation without the concurrence of the Senate, it gave force to this construction; and, if it was a true one, nothing was more demonstrable than that the papers were necessary to determine whether the Treaty in this point had been constitutionally made.

But whatever doubts, Mr. L. said, might have been occasioned by the general expressions with which the motion had been introduced, they must certainly have been removed by the explanation which had been very properly demanded by the member from Connecticut [Mr. TRACY.] He had, on that occasion, declared that the papers were required for general information, to be applied as that information might render it proper.

Treaty with Great Britain.

[II. OF R.]

1. To the superintending power which the House had over all the officers of Government; and,

2. To guide their discretion in giving or refusing their sanction to the Treaty in those points where it interferes with the Legislative power.

Gentlemen had found it convenient, because some others had disavowed any intention to impeach, to consider the first ground as wholly abandoned: but, in the nature of things, this could not be the case. It was impossible to determine that we would not impeach until the papers were seen. Facts might then appear that would render that an unavoidable measure which was not now contemplated. If, for instance, he said, instead of a Treaty with Great Britain, we were now discussing one formed with the Porte, where it is the custom for Ministers to give and to receive presents; and, on the production of the correspondence, it should appear that our Minister had received a douceur on the signature of the Treaty, he asked whether, in such case, that House would not think themselves obliged to impeach? If they would, he thought the obligation could not be denied, when cases might exist, where, without any previous intention, an impeachment was unavoidable. The integrity of the gentleman who had formed this Treaty was, he said, too well established to lead any one into a supposition that any thing of the kind could have occurred in this instance; but it might in others. The idea of impeachment, therefore, though not at present contemplated, could not be formally abandoned.

Before he considered the second and most important ground of opposition, Mr. L. said, he would take notice of an objection to the form of the resolution by a gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER.] It was of a kind which he had not expected from the quarter in which it arose. He had objected to the humble style of request. If we had a right to the papers we should demand them. "I would plant my foot here," says the gentleman, "and require the papers as a right." Mr. L. said that the resolution was couched in the respectful terms with which that House had always addressed the first Magistrate of the Union; that civility and respect were always due to him; and that he was persuaded the member would see the propriety (on this, as he had on other occasions,) of transferring into public life that urbanity and politeness for which he was so remarkable in his private intercourse. The same gentleman had observed, that there was no reason for requesting the papers, because any member might inspect them in the Clerk's office of the Senate. He could not suppose, if this were the fact, that the publicity of the papers was a good reason to prove that they ought not to be communicated. Mr. L. did not, however, think that individual members ought to owe their information to the courtesy of an officer of the Senate, which they had a right officially to receive in a body. It had been stated that he (Mr. L.) having had access to these papers, could not want any information they might contain. He would state the facts relative to that transaction: It was true, he said, that, as Chairman of the committee appointed to inquire into the case of impressed seamen, he had been indulged with a view of the instructions and correspondence; but engrossed by the important object then referred to him, he had paid little or no attention to such parts as did not relate to that subject. After an interval of some days, he went with an intention of completing the perusal of them, but was told that he could not see them without leave of the Senate. What I did see, added Mr. L., convinced me of the propriety of the whole being laid before the House. I found, in so much of the instructions as I did read, a positive direction to conclude no Treaty of Commerce unless certain important articles were agreed to which are not found in the instrument before us. Among them, if I recollect right, was a stipulation, that free bottoms should make free goods. He had been informed that these instructions were altered, and a fuller discretion given to the Minister; but this was a point which he thought it essential the House should be informed of. Leaving, however, the ground of superintendence, which would make this inquiry necessary, gentlemen had chosen to put questions at issue on the other point; and had endeavored to show the impropriety of the demand, by denying any discretionary power in the Legislature, either to judge of the Treaty itself, or decide on the propriety of carrying it into effect. Mr. L. said, he was not unwilling to meet them on this ground, and to consider the decision of this motion as declaratory of the sense of the House on that important question, whether it is constitutionally bound to give its sanction to every Treaty that may be formed by the other branches; and to provide all the sums necessary to fulfil every stipulation they may make; for, to this extent, did all their arguments go.

Two positions had been assumed, differing not materially in the power ascribed to Treaties, but distinguished chiefly by the mode of applying this power.

By some it was contended, that the interference of the Legislature was necessary in some instances, but that the Treaty operated by way of moral obligation, to enforce the necessary steps to give it validity; and that though there is a physical power of refusal, yet it ought in no case to operate against the superior obligation.

Others had asserted, that Treaties being the supreme law, might operate directly, without the intervention of any other body. That where existing Legislative acts opposed their execution, the Treaty was paramount, and could repeal them.

These positions were in fact the same, because, if a Treaty was, at all events, to have effect, it was perfectly immaterial, whether it operated directly by its own power, or indirectly by the instrumentality of another body; both, he thought, equally subversive of the principles of the Government; but the first was most degrading to the Legislative dignity. Nor could he discover from what part of the Constitution it was inferred. Wherever, in that instrument, a duty was imposed, it was clearly and explicitly assigned, as in case of the President's compensation, that of the Judges, and many other instances. It is not, then, to be conceived, that so important an obligation as this should have been left to implication. If it had been intended so to annihilate this discretion, the same language would have been used. "Congress shall pass laws to carry every Treaty into effect," but nothing of this kind appears. Again, if it had been intended to make Treaties paramount over laws, it would seem to have been the more simple mode, to have dispensed with their interference. Why leave a phantom of discretion, an unreal mockery of power, in the hands of the Legislature? In order to get rid of this difficulty, some gentlemen seem willing to allow a species of volition, but it was a pittance that would be scarcely worth accepting. In cases of extreme necessity, and in others, where, from corruption or other good cause, the compact is void, this House, they say, may refuse to carry it into effect. In the first case, where it is impossible to give efficacy to a Treaty, the power of refusing it was surely of little value. And where the compact is void in itself, the liberty of not being bound by it, would scarcely be contended for. If the subject were less serious, Mr. L. said, one would be tempted to smile at the efforts that are made to reconcile the Constitutional predestination contended for, with the free agency of discretion. It was as difficult to be understood, as the most entangled theological controversy, and, like most disputants in that science, they concluded with anathemas against all who could not comprehend, or would not believe them. We have a discretion, whether to act or not, say they; but we are under an obligation to act, and if we do not, we are guilty of treason and rebellion. This was the same kind of discretion a man has, whether he will commit murder or let it alone; he may do it, but if he does he will be hanged. This was a worse alternative than that generally called Hobson's choice—that was, "this or nothing;" but here we are told, "do this, or be hanged for a traitor." So that hereafter, when any one intended to express an inevitable necessity, he would call it Congressional discretion.

If, then, the Treaty does not operate by way of obligation on the Legislative power, let us, said Mr. L., examine, whether, as is contended, "a Treaty is paramount to a law, and can repeal it, though it, itself, cannot be acted on by the Legislative power; this, he said, was the most important question that had ever been agitated within these walls. It evidently tended to the substitution of a foreign Power, in lieu of the popular branch; it was replete with the most serious evils. He could never suppose so great and pernicious an absurdity was contemplated by the Constitution; but, if such was the true construction, great as the evil was, we must submit, until it could be legally amended.

The Constitution gave all Legislative power to the Congress of the United States; vested the power of making Treaties in the President and Senate, and declared that the Constitution, the laws made in pursuance thereof, and Treaties made under the authority of the United States, should be the supreme law of the land. He had always considered the order in which this enumeration was made as descriptive of the relative authority of each. 1st. The Constitution, which no other act could operate on. 2d. The laws made in pursuance thereof. 3d. Treaties, when they contradicted neither; for, if no weight was given to this argument, Treaties would be superior, both to the Constitution and the laws, as there is no restriction with respect to them as in the case of laws, that they be made pursuant to the Constitution. He did not believe gentlemen would contend for this absurdity; they must therefore refer to the order of the enumeration to measure the relative effect of the Constitution, laws, and Treaties. If the objects of Legislation and of Treaty compact could be kept distinct, no question would arise, there would be no pretext for interference, but they could not; almost every object of legislation might also become that of compact with a foreign Power.

He then read the enumeration of powers vested in Congress, and said, that many of these had already become the objects of Treaty; many more probably would be; and the whole, directly or indirectly, were liable to be embraced by it. If, then, all, or even any one of these objects may be regulated by the Treaty, without any interference of law, the Constitution, said Mr. L., has contained the evident absurdity of submitting the same object at the same time to the control of two distinct powers. An absurdity that could not be destroyed but by supposing, that it was intended these different powers should operate under this Constitution as they do in that of England; so that every Treaty operating on objects submitted to the Legislative power should receive its sanction before it took effect. This construction would reconcile all the parts of the instrument to each other; whereas, the other would set them at variance, and, by degrees, deprive the House of Representatives of all the share in legislation. This was not reasoning, he said, from an abuse of power. If it was properly vested in the President and Senate, it was not only permitted, but it was their duty to use it, and no one could call the exercise of a Constitutional right an abuse of power. He admitted that, if the text were explicit, reasoning from consequences was a bad mode; but, as that was not pretended in the present case, it would be well to weigh the serious evils that attended the construction gentlemen contended for, and to inquire whether there is more danger in trusting the Representatives of the people with a check on all Treaties relating to those objects which are specially vested in them by the Constitution, than in making those Representatives subservient to the will o twenty-one men, who may be leagued with a foreign Power?

In looking for the true construction of this instrument, we should consider the state of things at the time it was proposed and adopted. The opposition it met was well known, and the power given to the Senate and PRESIDENT was considered as one great cause of opposition. It cannot be supposed, as the sentiments of the people were known by the framers of the Constitution, that they would have proposed any plan more energetic than the Government of Great Britain.

But it was probable, Mr. L. said, that the Treaty power was intended to be placed in the PRESIDENT and Senate to the same extent only in which it existed in the Executive of Great Britain. The words of our Constitution on this point were the same made use of by British writers in defining the corresponding power in their Government, and it seemed evident that some of its features (and this was none of the least prominent) were drawn from that original. He was happy that the parallel was not perfect in other instances. He thought it completely so in this; and that the practice therefore of that Government would, in some measure, lead to the true construction of this. Aware of the weight of precedents drawn from English history, gentlemen endeavored to weaken them by a very ingenious argument: "The British Constitution," say they, "is not written, it is formed of usages; if you prove, therefore, that it is the usage for British Parliaments to sanction Treaties, you prove it to be their Constitution, but you do not prove it to be ours." It was true, Mr. L. observed, that the English Constitution was formed partly of immemorial usages; but it was also true, that those usages were collected in books of authority, and that the different powers of Government were generally designated, so that the leading points in their Constitution were as well known and defined as they were in that of America. It had been shown by a reference to writers of the best authority, that, by the Constitution of England, the power of making all Treaties was in the King; but as the power of making all laws was in the Parliament, this latter, as the greater power, controlled the former, whenever it affected objects of legislation. Thus, in the Constitution of the United States, he contended, the power of making Treaties, that is, all Treaties, vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate; but, as all Legislative power is vested in Congress, no Treaty operating upon any object of legislation can take effect until it receives the sanction of Congress. The practice, too, was the same. The King asserted his right of making and completing Treaties, by not only concluding, but ratifying them, before they were submitted to Parliament, but he believed no Commercial Treaty was proclaimed as the law of the land before it had received the sanction of Parliament. Indeed, it was impossible, in any country, and under any Constitution, where the Legislative and Treaty-making powers are lodged in different hands, that any other construction can be given without running into the absurdity he had before hinted at, of making two different powers supreme over the same object at the same time. Our ideas had been confounded by referring to the practice of Governments where the two powers were united, and where a ratification gave the consent of both.

If, then, there was a perfect analogy between the power vested in the Crown in England, and that delegated to the PRESIDENT and Senate in America, on the subject of Treaties; and if the Parliament, by virtue of its general Legislative authority, was in the practice of giving or withholding its sanction to Treaties concluded by the King, it was but a fair inference to say, that the same discretion existed in Congress.

Some instances of the exercise of this power by Parliament had been before quoted by others. The inexecution of the Treaty of Utrecht, in consequence of Parliamentary opposition, and the difficulties with which the Commercial Treaty with France was carried through the House of Commons, in 1787, had been already noticed. He would mention two other precedents drawn from the same source equally striking, or perhaps more so, as the course of proceeding there followed was precisely that which was proposed by the resolution in debate. The first was the proceeding on the Barrier Treaty, taken from the 5th vol. Parl. Debates, p. 43, where the House of Commons began, by a resolution to address the Queen, "that all instruction and orders given to the Plenipotentiaries that transacted the Barrier Treaty, and also all Treaties mentioned and referred to in the said Treaty, might be laid before the House, except such Treaties as they already had." We are told in the subsequent page, that on the 13th, that is, only two days after the request, "Mr. Secretary St. John presented to the House, by Her Majesty's command, a copy of the instructions to the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Townsend, about the Barrier Treaty, extracts of letters from Mr. Boyle to Lord Townsend, concerning the said Treaty; also, a copy of the Preliminary Articles, signed at the Hague; the titles of which copies and extracts of letters were referred to the Committee of the Whole House. After this, it was resolved to present an address to Her Majesty, that the letters written by Lord Townsend to Mr. Boyle, the Secretary of State, dated the 1st and 26th of November, 1709, might be laid before the House, which Mr. Secretary St. John accordingly did on the 14th of February." After having obtained the papers, Mr. L. said, the House of Commons proceeded to the consideration of the Treaty in Committee of the Whole, and voted, 1st. That the Treaty contained articles destructive to the trade and interest of Great Britain. 2. That the negotiator had acted without authority. 3d. That the advisers and negotiators were enemies to the Queen and Kingdom.

The Treaty being thus obstructed, the States General remonstrated to the Queen on the subject; but, conscious that the Parliament were only exercising a Constitutional power, they make no complaints in their memorial of any breach of faith, though the Treaty had been ratified. They enter into the merits of the Treaty, offer to negotiate on the obnoxious articles, and conclude with "entreating the continuance of Her Majesty's friendship."

This instance, then, said Mr. L., is complete to show the propriety of a call for papers by the House of Commons; a ready compliance on the part of the Crown, a deliberation on a ratified Treaty, a rejection of it, and an acquiescence on the part of the foreign nation, without remonstrance.

The other instance was an address in the year 1714, requesting "the Treaties of Peace and Commerce between Her Majesty and the King of Spain, and the instructions given to Her Majesty's Ambassadors thereupon, together with the copies of the King of Spain's ratifications of the said Treaties, and the preliminaries signed by the Lord Lexington and the Marquis of Bedmar, at Madrid, and all other agreements and stipulations which had been made concerning the commerce between Great Britain and Spain. 2dly. An account of what engagements of guaranty Her Majesty had entered into by virtue of any Treaty with any foreign Prince or State, from the year 1710. And 3dly. An account of what instances had been used by Her Majesty for restoring to the Catalans their ancient privileges, and all letters relating thereunto. And then it was resolved, to take into further consideration the Message that day sent from the Lords upon Thursday next following."

Objections had been raised to this construction, drawn from three different sources.

1. From the prevalent construction at the time of establishing the Constitution.

2. From the practice of the Government since that period.

3. From the present ideas entertained by the people of the United States.

1st. As to the construction generally received when the Constitution was adopted, Mr. L. did not conceive it to be conclusive, even if admitted to be contrary to that now contended for; because he believed we were now as capable at least of determining the true meaning of that instrument as the Conventions were: they were called in haste, they were heated by party, and many adopted it from expediency, without having fully debated the different articles. But he did not believe the general construction at that time differed from the one he had adopted. A member from Virginia [Mr. BREX] had shown, by recurring to the debates in the Convention of that State, and to other cotemporaneous productions, that the framers and friends to the Constitution construed it in the manner that we do; whilst its enemies endeavored to render it odious and unpopular, by endeavoring to fix on it the contrary construction. And as the friends to the Constitution were the most numerous, we ought rather to take the explanation under which a majority accepted the Constitution, as the true one, than to look for it in the bugbears by which anti-Federalism endeavored to prevent its adoption.

2d. The second argument that had been used to deprive the Legislature of any right of interference, in cases of this kind, was drawn from the uniform practice of the Government ever since its formation. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] who made this objection, had cited one instance of this practice in the resolution directing Treaties to be published with the laws, and had adverted to the appropriations for the Indian Treaties, (under the general head of the Military Establishment,) as favoring his principle. As to the resolution, Mr. L. said, there was no doubt that Treaties, when properly sanctioned, ought to be observed, and therefore the resolution was proper, that they ought to be promulgated. On the subject of appropriation, it had been well observed by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] that the House exercised as much discretion in granting the supply, by way of addition to the military appropriations, as if it had been given specially for the purposes of the Treaty. But the truth is, said Mr. L., that an accurate examination into the communications of the Executive in analogous cases, and the proceedings of this House, will form a strong, I think an irresistible, argument in favor of the resolution. It would appear, he said, from the view he was about to take, that from the first establishment of the Constitution until the negotiation of this Treaty was begun, the Executive had been in habits of free communication with the Legislature as to our external relations; that their authority in questions of commerce, navigation, boundary, and intercourse with the Indian tribes, had been expressly recognized, even when difficulties on these questions were to be adjusted by Treaty.

The first case related to a provision for an Indian Treaty, and was suggested by the PRESIDENT, in a Message of the 7th of August, 1789, in which he says: "If it should be the judgment of Congress that it would be most expedient to terminate all differences in the Southern District, and to lay the foundation for future confidence by an amicable Treaty with the Indian tribes in that quarter, I think proper to suggest the consideration of the expediency of instituting a temporary commission for that purpose, to consist of three persons, whose authority should expire with the occasion." In consequence of this Message, Congress took into consideration the expediency of the measure recommended to them, and passed the act of the 26th of August, in the same year, appropriating twenty thousand dollars for defraying the expense of negotiating and treating with the Indian tribes, and authorizing the appointment of Commissioners. The PRESIDENT having appointed Commissioners to treat under the direction of the act, gave them instructions, which were communicated to the House, and from which this is an extract: "You will please to observe, that the whole sum that can be constitutionally expended is twenty thousand dollars, and that the same cannot be extended." Nothing having been effected by the Commissioners, the PRESIDENT mentioned the subject again in his Address to both Houses, on the 1st of January, 1792. In the month of March, in the same year, the House of Representatives adopted the following resolution, recommended by a select committee: "That provision ought to be made by law for holding a Treaty to establish peace between the United States and the Wabash, Miami, and other nations of Indians, Northwest of the river Ohio; also, for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and the mode of extinguishing their claims to lands within the limits of the United States." On the 29th March, following, a bill passed the House of Representatives, the title of which was amended in the Senate and passed, appropriating twenty thousand dollars for purposes expressed in the preceding resolution.

Treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. L. said this case was important, as it was the first communication relative to a Treaty made under the Constitution. An attentive examination of its different parts would show that very different ideas were then entertained from those which were now enforced. He would first observe, that the discretion of the House of Representatives as to commerce with foreign nations, stood precisely on the same footing with that which they ought to exercise in regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes; that if one could be done without their concurrence, by Treaty, the other might also; and that therefore, when the PRESIDENT recognized their right to deliberate in one case, he virtually did it in the other. Let us then attend to the language of the Message, said Mr. L. and we shall find that right of deliberation most expressly referred to. "If it should be the judgment of Congress that it would be most expedient"—what can be more explicit than this language? And again, "I think proper to suggest the consideration of the expediency of instituting a temporary commission." Here the same discretion is not applied to, but the PRESIDENT, at that time supposing that no implicated power could deprive Congress of the right to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, submitted to their consideration the expediency of appointing Commissioners. They passed the necessary laws, and he instructed the Commissioners, not in the language that is now held, that they might stipulate for the payment of any sum, and that Congress would be obliged to find the means; but he tells them, "the only sum that can be constitutionally expended is twenty thousand dollars, and that the same cannot be extended." Why, (if the doctrine is true that we are under an obligation to comply with the terms of every Treaty made by the PRESIDENT and Senate) why did he say no further sum could constitutionally be expended? If that doctrine were indeed true, his language would have been, Use what money may be necessary, contract for the payment of it in your Treaty, and Congress are constitutionally obliged to carry your stipulations into effect.

The resolution above quoted, Mr. L. said, was important, as it proved that Congress then supposed that they ought not only to provide by law for holding Treaty with the Indians, but that they also had the power, and ought to exercise it, of regulating trade and intercourse with the same people, and of prescribing the mode of extinguishing their claims to lands within the United States; but all this, said he, it is now discovered may be done without their aid, by Treaty.

The second instance of the exercise of this dreaded discretion was in the law of March 3d, 1791, appropriating twenty thousand dollars to enable the PRESIDENT to effect a negotiation of the Treaty with Morocco. This originated in the Senate, and is a decided proof that neither the PRESIDENT nor Senate had at that period any idea of the moral obligation that is now discovered, or they would, without the formality of a law, have at once stipulated with the new Emperor for the payment of the necessary sum, which must have been provided by the House.

In a third case, the PRESIDENT had thought proper to take the sense of that House in a matter that of all others demanded secrecy, and under circumstances that would have prevented his making the application, if he had conceived himself at liberty to act without their concurrence. He adverted to the Message of the 30th December, 1790, where the PRESIDENT says: "I lay before you a Report of the Secretary of State, on the subject of the citizens of the United States in captivity at Algiers, that you may provide in their behalf what to you shall seem expedient."

No act having been passed by Congress in consequence of this Message, the PRESIDENT did not conceive himself authorized to bind the United States by Treaty, for the necessary ransom of their citizens; and therefore nothing was concluded until after a subsequent Message and previous appropriation, in the year 1793, when another Message was sent relative to the negotiations with Morocco and Algiers, then pending: "While it is proper [he says] that our citizens should know that subjects which so much concern their interests and their feelings, have duly engaged the attention of their Legislature and Executive, it would still be improper that some part of this communication should be made known." Part of this Message, therefore, was confidentially communicated, which shows, Mr. L. said, on some occasions, it was not deemed imprudent to trust this House with the secrets of the Cabinet; and in consequence of this Message a law was passed, appropriating one hundred thousand dollars for the purchase of a peace with the Algerines. It was ostensibly appropriated to a more general purpose, but the intent was well understood.

The next transaction that he should quote, Mr. L. said, as favorable to his doctrine, was the Message of the PRESIDENT of the 5th December, 1793, and the measure to which it gave rise. The PRESIDENT says: "As the present situation of the several nations of Europe, and especially those with which the United States have important relations, cannot but render the state of things between them and us matter of interesting inquiry to the Legislature, and may indeed give rise to deliberations to which they alone are competent, I have thought it my duty to communicate to them certain correspondence which has taken place.

This Message, Mr. L. said, accompanied the papers relative to France, to Great Britain, and to Spain; and a question would immediately occur, what were the deliberations to which the PRESIDENT then thought the Legislature alone was competent, and which he therefore thought it his duty to communicate. All our disputes with the nations referred to in the Message, were such as on the new construction of the Treaty power he could have adjusted by compact, without any reference to the House of Representatives; but it is plain, by the express words of the Message, that he did not believe that construction. It was no answer, Mr. L. said, to the argument drawn from this transaction, to say that the PRESIDENT only submitted the question of War or Peace to the Legislature by this Message:

1. Because the Message related to the three principal nations in Europe and he never could have imagined that Congress would have deliberated on going to war with them all.

2. This was evidently not his intention, because as soon as measures were proposed in that House, which he supposed would lead to a rupture with one of those nations, all these measures were palsied by the appointment of an Envoy, and the commencement of negotiation.

It was clear, then, that the PRESIDENT thought the matters communicated by his Message, which related to commerce and boundary, were constitutionally vested in the discretion of Congress. The idea was corroborated by the words of a Message relative to the negotiation with Spain:

"And therefore, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, I appointed Commissioners Plenipotentiary for negotiating and concluding a Treaty with that country on the several subjects of boundary, navigation, and commerce, and gave them the instructions now communicated."

Why, said Mr. L., communicate the instructions to the Ministers? Because they related to commerce, to navigation, to boundary, on all which subjects the PRESIDENT must have thought the Legislature had a right of decision. He must have thought so at that period; but, unfortunately, all precedent of free communication ended here: Mr. Jay's negotiation began, and a different construction was assumed.

From this view of the acts of Government, Mr. L. said, he trusted that a far different impression would be made, than that the doctrine he contended for was a new one, originating in opposition to the English Treaty, and a desire to disorganize the Government. That, on the contrary, it had been declared by the PRESIDENT, acquiesced in by the Senate, and acted upon by the House of Representatives.

3. One other test of construction remained for examination. It had been relied on by a member from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] he would therefore notice it; it was the present opinion of the citizens of the United States, as expressed by their town-meetings, and by their Legislatures. Mr. L. said, he did not suppose that the sense of the people on this subject could be perfectly collected, it could only be known by their applications to this House; and in those, he said, an appeal was made to that very discretion which it was contended did not exist. The petitions in favor of Treaty, and those which were presented against it, both acknowledged the right of the House to interfere. The Legislatures spoke the same language; some had approved of the conduct of those who made the Treaty; but all he believed were silent as to the power of this House. As to the town-meetings, he did not expect to hear them quoted as authority by the gentleman who had introduced them. His fellow-citizens of New York, Mr. L. said, would be surprised when they heard the name of the gentleman who had ushered them on the floor of that House; since they were there, however, said Mr. L., let us hear the language of their Address to the PRESIDENT. They need not be ashamed of it, and he would answer for its contradicting the position of the gentleman who quoted it. [He then read several extracts from the New York resolves to show that they thought the rights of the House were infringed by the Treaty.]

Thus, said Mr. L., to whatever source of argument we refer, we find the Constitutional power of this House fully established; whether we recur to the words of the Constitution, where the power is expressly given, and is to be lost only by implication; whether we have recourse to the opinions of the majorities who adopted the Constitution; to the uniform practice of the Government under it; to the opinions of our constituents, as expressed in their petitions; or, to the analogous proceedings in a Government constructed, in this particular, like our own. Yet, after all this, we are told, said he, that if we question the supremacy of the Treaty-making power, we commit treason against the constituted authorities, and were in rebellion against Government. These were serious charges, and made in improper language. He had not been so long in public life as the gentlemen who made them; but he would boldly pronounce it unconstitutional and improper. Besides, said Mr. L., this language is wrong in another view; it may frighten men of weak nerves from a worthy pursuit; for my own part, said he, when I heard the member from Vermont compare the authority of the PRESIDENT and Senate to the majesty of Heaven, and the Proclamation to the voice of thunder; when he appealed to his services for his country, and showed the wounds received in her defence; when he completed his pathetic address by a charge of treason and rebellion, I was for a moment, astonished at my own temerity; his eloquence so overpowered me that,

"Methought the clouds did speak and tell me of it,
The winds did sing it to me, and the thunder,
That deep and dreadful organ pipe, pronounced
The charge of treason."

I was, however, relieved from this trepidation (continued Mr. L.) by a moment's reflection, which convinced me that all the dreadful consequence arose from the gentleman's taking that for granted, which remained to be proved. He had only assumed that the measure was unconstitutional, and then the rest followed of course. From my soul, said Mr. L., I honor the veteran who has fought to establish the liberties of his country; I look with reverence on his wounds; I feel humbled in his presence, and regret that a tender age did not permit me to share his glorious deeds. I can forgive every thing that such a man can say, when he imagines the liberty for which he has fought is about to be destroyed; but I cannot extend my charity to men who, without the same merits, coolly re-echo the charge. Another observation had escaped from the same member in the heat of debate, which another from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to whom he before alluded had repeated with high encomiums. It was this, that encroachment was more to be apprehended from the popular, than from any other branch of Government. This doctrine Mr. L. considered as highly pernicious to liberty; and as unfounded in fact, as it was improper. Where, he asked, will gentlemen find facts to justify their opinions?

If it were true, there would now be none but popular Governments in existence; they would have encroached on the Kingly power, until all power was centered in them alone. The sad reverse, however, was the fact. All Europe had once been free; all Europe, with the exception of France and Switzerland, were now in chains. Where, then, would historical facts be found to justify the charge? In the obsequious Parliament of Britain? In the houseless assembly of Naples? Or, the degraded Cortes of Spain? In the hundred years' struggle that had involved the States of Portugal? Would gentlemen look for them in the tyranny of Russia and Germany? In the military despotism of Prussia, or the ecclesiastical one of Rome? Why, then, if unsupported either by theory or fact, are the people told, be on your guard against the popular part of your Constitution? shut your eyes to the conduct of the Executive and Senate, they can never encroach, but beware of the ambition of your Representatives!

He would notice one other objection that had been raised, and then conclude: It was said, if the President supposed these papers necessary, he would have sent them; and that we might offend him by this request. Mr. L. said, this was not the first time that measures were endeavored to be carried, by appealing to the character of the President. He sincerely admired and respected the character of that great man; he was jealous of his reputation, and, as an American, was interested in his glory; no consideration should ever tempt him to destroy one leaf of his well-earned laurels; but, while he had the honor of a seat in that House, he would resist every attempt to cover improper measures by the splendor of any man's reputation.

He had before remarked the singular tendency of argument in this question towards the mystery of theology; it was not only predestination and free agency, we are now told that we must have full faith in the President, and that he and the Senate can do no wrong. What, sir, said Mr. L., has faith, banished by modern infidelity from religion, taken refuge in politics? Has this doctrine of human infallibility been transferred from the ritual into our Constitution?

Mr. L. concluded, begging the pardon of the Committee for the unavoidable length of his investigation; he felt how utterly incompetent he had been to the task, but he was consoled by reflecting on the eloquence and ability by which the motion had been supported by others.

MARCH 21.—In Committee of the Whole on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolution:

Mr. WILLIAMS observed much had been said upon the subject of the present resolution, and so much time consumed, that he should confine his observations within a narrower compass than he at first intended.

It was contended that in a Republican Government there ought to be no secrets; but he would ask whether it was not specified in the Constitution that secrecy should be observed on particular occasions? and, had not his colleague [Mr. LIVINGSTON] quoted the secret Journals of the House? He believed if the Constitution of France were examined, it would be found that their system admitted of secrets. He had the honor, he said, to be upon a committee, before whom many papers were laid, which it would be improper to publish. With respect to the present papers, he did not think there were any secrets in them. He believed he had seen them all. For the space of ten weeks any member of that House might have seen them. It was not merely with respect to the present papers that he opposed the motion, but because it would be establishing a bad precedent; and, as they were a young Government, they ought to be cautious how they established bad precedents. It was well known that in the negotiations in time of war, confidential communications were necessary; but if no papers were allowed to be kept secret, what person would ever venture to make any such communication? Hence this country, when in the greatest danger, may be much injured by improper precedents.

He quoted authorities to prove that there never was but one precedent in Great Britain of a negotiator's papers being given up, that was in the last year of the reign of Queen Anne, when the Ministry were soon afterwards obliged to fly their country. He was sorry that a gentleman returned by the Republican interest of one of the first cities of the Union should have had recourse to a desperate Tory faction for a precedent.

Some gentlemen had observed that the papers ought to be obtained, because the President had intimated, in his Speech, that he would lay the papers before the House with the Treaty; but they were mistaken in their observations, because the papers had not been laid before us.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania said, because the King of England laid the papers relative to a negotiation before Parliament along with the Treaty to which they related, they had also a right to papers, the Governments being similar; but when the King did this, he informed them that he had concluded such a Treaty; and after a thing was concluded, he did not know what could remain for Parliament to do. He would refer to a recent authority, and not go back to 1714; it was to the case of the Treaty with Great Britain respecting American loyalists, when papers were refused to be given up, and it was deemed a most inconsistent thing to require them. This business caused great debates in Parliament, and the motion for papers was lost, their being only sixty-three for it, and one hundred and four against it. Mr. W. read the observations of different members of Parliament on the occasion, and observed, that although he was unwilling to quote precedents from a Government not similar to ours, yet this was a case in point, and this treaty was negotiated between Mr. JAY, on the part of the United States, and Mr. OSWALD on the part of Great Britain.

The resolution before them called for all papers, whether public or private, except such as related to any existing negotiation; but as the Treaty was completed the resolution included all papers. He should have had less objection to the motion, if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia had been adopted. He did not see the use the papers would be of if they were got. The House was not vested with either the power to alter or amend the Treaty. But, say gentlemen, they are wanted for information. But he believed they ought to form their judgments of the Treaty from the instrument itself. Suppose I were to employ an agent, and give him instructions to make a contract for me, on condition that it should not be binding until I had approved it; and my agent return and I approve of the contract, what light can be thrown upon it by the instructions which were given to the agent? The instrument alone was what must be had recourse to; because he had it in his power to have withheld his sanction.

If his information was right, when certain resolutions were brought forward in the year 1793, a gentleman from Virginia said that Great Britain would refuse to negotiate with this country; but immediately upon the Treaty being made known, it was everything that was bad.

He would endeavor to answer some observations which had fallen from a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES.] It was asked if the Treaty power could receive any check? He conceived the will of the people ought to be obeyed. They had given power to the PRESIDENT and Senate to make Treaties, which if not complied with, would be to oppose their will. In speaking of the amendments proposed to the Constitution by the Legislature of Virginia, it was said they were only intended to make the check more certain than at present; but he read the resolution, viz.: "That no Treaty containing any stipulations upon the subject of the powers vested in Congress by the eighth section of the first article, shall become the supreme law of the land, until it shall have been approved in those particulars by a majority in the House of Representatives: That the PRESIDENT, before he shall ratify any Treaty, shall submit the same to the House of Representatives;" and insisted that it might be clearly deduced from them, that they did not conceive the Treaty power to have any check in that House. That State had kept uniformly the same ground in all their actions; but the different State Legislatures, to which their amendments had been proposed, had determined the Treaty power rightly placed where it is at present. But because the people will not agree that they should have a check upon the Treaty power, gentlemen seem disposed to usurp it by their present doctrines.

The same gentleman [Mr. GILES] observed, that the checks in the Government of the United States had been completely routed for these six years. He was exceedingly sorry that the PRESIDENT could bind that House, but he said that was a sword that cut two ways. It was too late in the day to assert this doctrine, when the people were become so enlightened as to be better acquainted with the nature of Government, and better educated than the people of any other nation in the world. They would, therefore, take care of themselves.

He said that a gentleman from South Carolina had observed that the Treaty was put into operation by the Proclamation of the PRESIDENT, and made a part of the laws of the land. An honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] granted that, when completed, the Treaty ought to be annexed to the laws. Mr. W. asked, was this not done? It had been promulgated in the way in which Treaties are directed to be promulgated; and he would ask, if a case were to come before the judges upon it, whether they would not be bound to consider it as the law of the land? If the member from Virginia [Mr. GILES] had been opposed to the Treaty going into operation, why did he not take the proper mode to prevent it? He knew of the resolution which directed how Treaties are to be promulgated and annexed to our code of laws, he knew the Treaty had arrived, and he might have had the subject discussed. If a majority were for preventing the Treaty from being promulgated in the ordinary way, then the resolution might have been done away, and some other mode adopted which was thought most prudent.

The same gentleman next contended that law can annul Treaties. But he believed that the Constitution decided that there was no other way of repealing Treaties but by mutual agreement of the parties, or by war. To break one article of a Treaty was to break the whole, and war, or a new Treaty, must be the consequence. The reason he gave why laws could repeal Treaties was, because laws were the will of the people. Treaties, Mr. W. said, were as much the will of the people as laws. The people had fixed barriers to the different branches of the Constitution, which could not be overleaped without endangering the whole fabric.

In speaking of power, gentlemen say it is more likely to be abused in the Executive than in that House. But, in the year 1789, when amendments were first proposed to the States, a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] asserted "that it was less necessary to guard against abuse in the Executive department than any other, because it was not the stronger branch of the system, but the weaker; it therefore must be levelled against the Legislative, for it is the most powerful, and the most likely to be abused, because it is under the least control;" and Mr. W. quoted several laws which had originated in that House, by which very large sums of money had been expended to little purpose, which he would explain when they were in a Committee of the Whole on the report from the Committee of Ways and Means.

But gentlemen say, "Have we not as much power as the House of Commons in Great Britain?" He answered, their powers were limited; the Constitution was their guide. He thought gentlemen proceeded as if they were about to form a Constitution rather than discuss a Constitutional question. Some gentlemen had said, Treaties of Amity ought to be vested in the President and Senate; others, that Treaties for a cessation of arms ought to be vested in the Executive; thus they wander, well knowing the ground they had taken was not tenable. It brought to his mind an observation made by an Indian chief, in a Treaty at Albany, since the late war, who, after thanking the Great Spirit for directing them back in the good old path, which made them happy, lamented, that ever since they had wandered from that path, they had been miserable. So it would be with them if they left the Constitution; they would wander from the right path, and involve themselves in difficulties. Appropriations for the army and navy in Great Britain must be made annually, without which they must be discharged. By our Constitution, we may appropriate for two years for the Army, and no mention as to what time for the Navy; so that we can make appropriations for a longer time for our Army and Navy than in Great Britain.

The gentleman [Mr. GILES] further observed, that the opinions entertained in that House three years ago, were not to influence them now; it was necessary, however, in Mr. W.'s opinion, that whenever nations changed their customs, some notice ought to be given of the change, that it might be known by nations with whom they may have any transactions. To prove this, he quoted Marten's Law of Nations. The Treaty had been laid before them, that they might appropriate money for carrying it into effect. On the first of June, the British were to give up the Western posts; if money was not appropriated, would they not be deceived?

Before he proceeded to remark on what had fallen from his colleague [Mr. LIVINGSTON] he would mention, that they had for some years, in general concurred in their political opinions, and during the present session they had varied very little; in the question before the House, however, they should differ very considerably. Soon after the Constitution was framed, a Convention was held in the State of New York, in which he had the honor to be a member. He was fully of opinion at that time, as he was now, that the Treaty power was a dangerous power, and, in consequence, gave his dissent to it.

He would proceed to remark on what had fallen from his colleague. He had said, how could they determine whether the Treaty was Constitutional or not, or whether an impeachment was necessary without information! The papers, as he had said before, were open for ten weeks, during which time gentlemen might have had access to them. But that gentleman said, they had denied him of late, and so they had been to him; but he understood they were at the Secretary of State's office, and might be seen there. He mentioned a case of a Treaty with a foreign country, in which their Minister might have received presents; but declared, that he did not believe there was any corruption in the negotiation of the Treaty in question. It appeared to him, therefore, inconsistent still to talk of impeachment.

Suppose, for instance, his colleague was Attorney General of the State of New York, and a man were to charge another with being guilty of burglary, whose character, reputation, and standing in life were irreproachable, would he subpoena him to meet the charge? No, he would not. And still the case is exactly similar to the present.

If, said Mr. W., his colleague or any member of the House wanted the papers, they had only to rise in their place and declare there were grounds of suspicion for an impeachment; would any member refuse the call? But he presumed no such thing was thought of. Why, then, expend so much precious time unnecessarily? The gentleman believed that the Minister had deviated from the instructions originally given him; but that he received new instructions. Whatever instructions were given to him, it appears, by the Treaty being ratified, that he executed them to the satisfaction of his employer.

It may be, said Mr. W., that this House may determine that it has a check on the Treaty-making power; but the next Congress may say there is no such thing. Whether there is or there is not this check, it is necessary for the stability of the Government to have it determined; and he would join in sentiment with the gentleman from Maryland in a wish that it might be settled. But he would have the amendment constitutionally made; for, if we ourselves do not understand the Constitution, it is not likely that our constituents at large should understand it. If I am wrong now in the true meaning of the Constitution, I have been wrong since its adoption. The people are the sovereign; their will shall be my guide, from which I will not, knowingly, depart. I live in the midst of a body of plain but intelligent freemen, whose employment is the cultivation of the earth, and who prize nothing beyond the freedom they enjoy. They are jealous of their liberties, but they are obedient to, and willing to respect and support the laws of the land. How will they know the laws, if we do not understand the Constitution after it has been in operation for nearly eight years?

Gentlemen observed, that if the Treaty-making power was meant to be vested solely in the President and Senate, it would have been said so explicitly; but, he thought, if the Constitution had intended that House to have interfered in Treaties, that would have been expressed, as a few words would have done it.

His colleague asserted, that that House had the power of carrying into effect or not any Treaty; but he thought the House obliged to carry into effect all Treaties constitutionally and completely made. To support his doctrine, Mr. LIVINGSTON had referred to the practice of Great Britain, and singled out the Treaty of Utrecht.

In England, said Mr. W., the Treaty-making power is in the King. A Treaty, when made by him, pledges the public faith and binds the nation; but the Courts of Law and the officers of the revenue do not consider Treaties as the supreme law (when they change the regulations of commerce or interfere with previous acts of Parliament) until Parliament has passed acts conformably to such stipulations of a Treaty. The propriety, and, indeed, necessity of this rule, results from the monarchical form of that Government, the power of the King alone to repeal existing laws being a just ground of apprehension. From a like apprehension, a Treaty, though negotiated and made in all its parts by the PRESIDENT, must be submitted to the Senate for their ratification. The Senate is a popular assembly, and representing the States. The concurrence of two-thirds is equal on every principle of combining the public will with the acts of the constituted authorities to the sanction of Parliament.

In England, Treaties of peace, of Alliance, and, perhaps, many others, are perfect and binding without co-operation of Parliament. The opinion of some is understood to be, and Blackstone seems to be of the number, that every Treaty, when made by the King, is obligatory without the concurrence of Parliament. The practice, however, is to lay Treaties before Parliament when laws are necessary to carry them into effect, and for Parliament to pass such laws. And, although a very broad discretion has been claimed in Parliament to pass or reject such laws, the uniform practice, except in one instance, has been to pass them. The faith of the nation is considered as pledged. The case where laws to carry the Treaty into effect have been refused, is the Treaty of Utrecht, in 1714. The credit of the example is much abated by the circumstances of the times when it happened. The Duke of Marlborough had been displaced, but his friends were powerful; a Tory Minister was in power and much hated; Queen Anne was decaying, and died that year, and the succession to the Crown was doubtful. Parties were ready to draw the sword against each other, and the most distinguished Ministers were soon proscribed and fled the country. A civil war broke out in 1715, the next year. One only example in such times, and the forerunner and cause of such events, weighs little against the course of practice in numberless cases, all issuing another way. It proves that the practice of Parliament corresponds with our doctrine. If, however, their maxims are different, so is their Constitution in this particular. The act of the King should be compared with the act of the PRESIDENT alone; and the ratification of the Senate should be, and, by our Constitution, it must be, considered equal to the sanction of Parliament. The doctrine ascribed by Mr. GALLATIN to the Parliament affords a reason for their calling for papers; because, he says, they are to act upon them. Yet such call is seldom made, and would probably be refused, if made without manifest occasion for the papers. Our Constitution has settled a different doctrine; and, as the papers cannot be needed, they cannot properly be asked for.

He doubted not that the Treaty lately concluded with Great Britain had ere now been laid before Parliament, and a sum of money granted for recompensing spoliations committed in this country. Should they then attempt to refuse appropriations for carrying the Treaty into effect, on their part, where would be their national honor, their national faith? Suppose the Treaty were a bad bargain, that would not authorize them to break it. No: if a bad bargain be made to-day, make a better to-morrow. Neither should they determine the thing before it came before them. Probably they may not find it so bad as it had been represented; for though it might, in some respects, narrow our commercial intercourse, yet, perhaps, by so doing, the agricultural interest would be proportionably benefited. He was convinced that the agricultural interest was the true interest of this country. If by the Treaty we find that it tends to the welfare of the farmer, we may conclude our negotiator had the true interest of his country in view; and it was his (Mr. W.'s) opinion that a man taken from the plough and put on board a vessel was a man lost to the true interest of this country. This country is not like that of Great Britain; they are confined to small islands, we have a country extensive and fertile; and it is our duty to encourage settlers, increase our numbers, and, by so doing, we shall soon be in a situation to bid defiance to all the world. He was willing to encourage commerce to its full proportion, but not so as to injure the agricultural interest. The third article in the Treaty had been quoted by a gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] as having a tendency to operate unequally in our impost duties; Mr. W. observed he did not think that was very exceptionable, so far as it had been explained. He did not think the third clause of the Treaty a bad one; it only went to this, that when Great Britain carried goods through our country they were to pay the same duty as American citizens. And would not this be a greater advantage to the United States than if they went up the rivers St. Lawrence or Mississippi, and paid no duty? All the duty received of them would be so much gain to the country.

His colleague [Mr. LIVINGSTON] went on too contemporaneous a construction, and said that the House were better able to judge of the meaning of the Constitution than the Conventions which were held to consider upon its adoption. He did not think so. He said, he had always been called an anti-Federalist, and was so considered to this day. He would willingly join to obtain an amendment to the Constitution with respect to the Treaty power; but, because he did not believe the Constitution contemplated an interference in that House in respect to Treaties, he could not agree to the proposed doctrine.

MARCH, 1796.]

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. W. said, it was not necessary for him to go into the argument which induced the Convention to fix the Treaty-making power; it need only be mentioned that they knew how and where that power was exercised in Great Britain; and, in order to avert the difficulties which had arisen there, the Convention vested the power with the PRESIDENT and Senate; and, to guard against undue influence, directed that two-thirds of the Senators present should concur with the PRESIDENT. The Convention had many difficulties to surmount in this article; they had to do away the equal power the small States shared, under the Confederation, with the large States. But, to do away the discordant interests of the different States, and to give the small States satisfaction, agreed that all the States should be equally represented in the Senate. In the Treaty-making power each State hath an equal voice. To extend it further, for another check, without the consent of the smaller States, would be doing away, in part, that power which the small States had retained.

He read the observations of one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, when debating on the merits of the Constitution in the Convention held in that State, to prove that Treaties were considered to be paramount to any law. Among the several passages from the debates of the Convention of New York, Mr. W. read the following proposed amendment by Mr. Lansing, who was a member of the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States, whose abilities and candor were not doubted by any who knew him:

"Resolved, As the opinion of this committee; that no Treaty ought to operate so as to alter the Constitution of any State; nor ought any Commercial Treaty to operate so as to abrogate any law of the United States."

He believed that the amendments proposed in the Virginia Convention, arose from their considering that there was no check in that House: the contrary supposition, he said, would be like rowing a boat one way and looking another.

His colleagues read extracts from the Journals to prove that the PRESIDENT had laid before that House instructions which he had given his Ministers employed on the Treaty business. He believed, when much money was likely to be wanted, it was prudent and right to do so. It was as if he asked that House whether it would agree to a proposed negotiation or declare war—as if he had said, "I cannot unlock your Treasury; which way would you have me act?" It was inconsistent to say that he had diminished his power by asking advice. Books, he said, might be produced without number; but nothing could be brought to justify the breaking of a contract constitutionally made. It has become the law of the land. The House has, indeed, the physical power to refuse to appropriate to carry such a Treaty into effect; but the Constitution meant that what was done by one branch of the Legislature should be confirmed by the others, except the act was unconstitutional. If a Treaty was Constitutional, they were therefore implicitly bound to carry it into effect.

His colleague denied that any danger lay in the popular part of the Government; he thought differently. To say there was more danger to be apprehended from the Executive than the Legislative branch of Government was unsound doctrine. He should enlarge on this subject when the Treaty came before the House, and he trusted he should clearly show that the greatest danger of abuse lay in that House. Have there not bills originated in this House which have caused the expenditure of much money to very little purpose? Is there not more responsibility in one man than in large bodies? and was not the member from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] of this opinion, as I have before stated?

Where have (said Mr. W.) the acts originated that have caused so much money to be expended, by reason of which the report of the Committee of Ways and Means states the necessity of borrowing such large sums to meet the necessary demands—the laying additional taxes and duties? Did these acts originate with the Executive? No. Where then? In this House. All money bills must originate in this House, being so directed by the Constitution.

Though his colleague represented Great Britain as being in chains, yet he was drawing precedents from their Government. At first, he thought he had fallen in love with the Government, but he afterwards found his mistake. In that Government, said Mr. W., one precedent creates another, and they soon accumulate and form laws; but his friend was drawing precedents from that nation to support the checks, which Mr. GILES said, had been for six years completely routed from the Government of the United States. He feared, if the gentlemen were permitted to take their course, we should soon have a curious sort of Constitution.

But, to conclude, the ruin or prosperity of the nation depended much on the present Government. He said, if the people flourish and are happy; if they are industrious and at peace, they will not complain of their Government. If this be the case, it will scarcely be admitted that the checks in the Government have been completely routed for these six years; if they were, however, he thought the nation could not be better than happy.

Mr. MILLEDGE observed, that as the hour of adjournment was drawing near, he would not detain the Committee long. The length of the debates, on both sides of the question, had left him little room for observation; but as a Constitutional question had been involved in the resolution before the Committee, and as all Constitutional questions were important in their nature, he could not think of giving a silent vote. He perfectly agreed with the gentleman who had spoken last, from the State of Connecticut, that we ought not to put our foot from off the Constitution, and on that, he said, he would stand. Nor did he think it necessary to resort to this or that Government to know their usages, or to know what was said in this or that State, or what was written by this or that man—but, according to the common and most obvious meaning of words contained in the Constitution, to draw our conclusion. That part of the Constitution which had been often mentioned, he begged that he might be permitted to read—that all Treaties made by the authority of the United States should be the supreme law of the land. He asked, what was the authority of the United States? Powers derived from the Constitution. What are these powers? Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. The better to understand these, let us see, said he, in what order they present themselves to us. In the Constitution, we find that, in the very first section, all Legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. This, then, is the Legislative power, the statute-making power, the ordaining power, the enacting power, or any other name by which it may be called. Now, then, said he, let us see the extent of this power. In the 8th section, Congress shall have power to make all laws. It would be necessary, he said, to attend to the monosyllable all. If the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate have a right to make a law, do Congress make all laws? Certainly not.

The Constitution being his guide, he felt supported by a just confidence in his opinion; but he would not say but he might be mistaken, and was unwilling to commit himself. It was his opinion, then, that Treaties ought to be bottomed on a law before they can have any binding influence. To elucidate this, he said, it would be necessary to read the whole of the clause: Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, (which are, he said, seventeen in number, particularly expressed,) and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. Here, again, he observed, we find the monosyllable all. What does it import? Every one—the whole. Of what? Of all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. What is the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate? The Treaty-making department. Therefore, being a department, whatever powers are vested in them by the Constitution cannot be carried into execution but by a law, otherwise the clause in the Constitution means nothing. What is a law? The will of the people made known. Where is that will to be found? In the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled. Are the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate Congress? No; therefore they cannot make a law.

The gentleman from New Hampshire asked, what do the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate operate upon? I answer, with him on Treaties; but in their nature they are only a department, and whatever a department does, cannot, he repeated, be carried into execution but by a law. The Treaty-making power is an intermediate department, and no instrument they can make can operate the repeal of a law, the same force being required for a repeal as to enact. The gentleman from Rhode Island observed, that if the House of Representatives was to have a control over Treaties, small States might be injured in their commerce, because the representation on that floor was unequal. Mr. M. observed, that though his State was not a small State, yet it was small in representation, but he apprehended no danger. Under the Articles of Confederation, it was a Government of States; under the present Government, it was a Government of departments, of checks. He said, the local interest of one State was so blended with another, that the security of the one became the security of the whole, founded on a proportion of sovereignty surrendered by each to the whole, and each drawing from the whole its proportion of security. Let us, then, said he, examine the compact made by each with the whole on the score of commerce. Here he read part of the 9th section: No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State; no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. He said, the negotiators of the Treaty, in the 12th article, had lain a prohibition on the exportation of cotton to any part of the world except in British vessels. Cotton, the growth of our own soil, an important staple in the two Southern States, particularly in the one he had the honor to represent. But it is said, and so we find it, that this article is suspended, and open to further negotiation. He called on the Committee for any member to deny that the principle did not still exist. He said, then, if a principle still exists in that Treaty which militates with a fundamental principle, a principle in the Constitution, he left to the Committee, which ought to yield. Was this principle to prevail, it would destroy a vital part of the Constitution, and injure the agriculture of the States. He called on that gentleman to beware of admitting such a principle; for, if once allowed, it would extend not only to the cotton of Georgia, but to the flaxseed of Rhode Island, the flour of Pennsylvania, and the tobacco of Virginia.

Mr. M. concluded by observing, that, from all he had said, it was to be understood that the powers of legislation were only with Congress, and that the House of Representatives could not, on the subject before them, legislate without information. Before he sat down, he could not help observing that it was somewhat strange that the first Treaty negotiated under the present Government with an European nation, should produce such a contrariety of sentiment on the meaning of the Constitution, and that he was reminded by this circumstance of the pertinent words of a celebrated writer:

"The works of human invention are progressive, and are not completed but by degrees. At the last improvement we are apt to sit down satisfied, and vainly imagine that we have accomplished the end we have proposed, but time soon unravels the fine-spun system, and we find ourselves obliged to interweave fresh materials to repair the disordered texture."

Mr. KIRKPATRICK observed, that he could not think of giving a silent vote on so important a question as this had become; but he should not go into an argumentative discussion on the subject, nor should he inquire into the opinions held in different Conventions at the adoption of the Constitution, or refer to Great Britain for precedents. He would look at the Constitution alone, and see what were the powers given to the different branches of Government. When it says that such and such powers are vested in Congress, and such in the Executive, he would abide by that decision. Where that instrument says Congress shall lay and collect taxes, regulate commerce with foreign nations, establish a uniform rule of naturalization, provide for the common defence, &c., and that the Executive shall have power, by and with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, to make Treaties, appoint Ambassadors, &c., the directions of the Constitution must be abided by.

He would inquire what Treaties could be entered into by the PRESIDENT and Senate, without infringing upon the powers placed in Congress? He believed Treaties of Peace, of Amity, and Friendship, could be made by them. If this could be done, he said, those were the powers meant to be vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate, and not that Treaties should embrace objects which are expressly appointed to the management of Congress. In this view, the PRESIDENT and Senate would not have the power to influence that House in their proceedings; but commercial or other Treaties which embraced objects the regulation of which was placed in Congress, must be laid before them for the purpose of their passing or refusing to pass laws to carry them into effect, in the same way as Treaties with the Indians had been laid before them.

He did not think the question of itself before the House important, as it related to the production of papers, but only as it involved in it an important principle, viz: that when Treaties were made by the PRESIDENT and Senate, and presented to that House, they had nothing to do but appropriate money to carry them into effect. It was true gentlemen had seemed willing to allow them what they called discretion; but it was such a sort of discretion as a criminal might be said to have, who was told he might choose this or that posture of suffering, but that he must die.

It had been said that the PRESIDENT and Senate were equally the Representatives of the people with that House. He would inquire how they became so? The Constitution has appointed that Representatives shall be chosen by the people in proportion to their population. Were the Senate so chosen? No. The people have no vote at all in choosing them. Are they amenable to the people for their conduct? No. Therefore, in no shape can they be called the Representatives of the people. The Senate, he said, represented the several State Legislatures, and that House the people at large. He was sure, therefore, that every thing in which the interests of the people at large were concerned should be submitted to their consideration, before it was carried into effect.

A great deal, he observed, had been said upon this subject, some things well said, and a good deal that might have been as well unsaid, for any good effect they were likely to produce. He was sorry to hear what had fallen from a gentleman from Rhode Island with respect to the interests of small States. He said he was himself a Representative of a small State, and he believed his constituents were well satisfied with the present distribution of power, and did not wish that of the PRESIDENT or Senate to be increased.

He did not think what fell from his colleague, when he said gentlemen wished to amuse the people with the cry of liberty, liberty, and spoke of the groans of three or four hundred thousand slaves assailing his ears, was meant as a reflection upon any gentleman in that House who might hold slaves; but an earnest wish that the people at large might never bend their necks to slavery.

He did not think the subject of the Treaty at all before the House. He should give his vote for the papers; not so much on account of their being of great importance in themselves, but in order to repel the doctrine, that they had no right to discuss the merits of any Treaty whatever.

MARCH 22.—In Committee of the Whole on Mr. LIVINGSTON's resolution:

Mr. CORRIE said, the attention of the Committee was doubtless fatigued with the subject before it; to those gentlemen who had already delivered their sentiments upon the occasion, he need not make any apology; and to those who had not done so, he would assure them that he would not occupy much of their time.

Most of the gentlemen who had gone before him, he observed, had regretted that the debate had taken the turn it had, but he was happy it had taken such a turn. It appeared to him, that the motion was intended as a stepping-stone to a violation of the rights of the other branches of the Government by that House. It became him when he made a declaration of this kind to say, that he did not impute other than pure motives to any member of that House. He believed the general wish was to discover the true sense of the Constitution; yet it was not extraordinary, if in doing this, men were actuated by the sentiments which they had long been in the habit of considering as well-founded, to lean to that construction which most favored their favorite opinions. He had no idea that any gentleman meant to make inroads on the Constitution; but it was his opinion that if the doctrines now insisted upon prevailed, they would have that effect.

He was happy, for two reasons, that the true ground of the present motion was made to appear. Because, if the resolution had passed without discussion, the motives which led to it would not have been seen; and because he wished the question of what were the powers of that House, with respect to Treaty-making, to be discussed, independent of the Treaty, which was likely soon to come before them. They stood now on the pure ground of an abstract Constitutional question.

Treaty with Great Britain.

Some obscurity, Mr. C. thought, had arisen from not distinguishing the application of arguments to the different principles on which the resolution had been advocated, which he should endeavor to avoid. He considered the Treaty-making power as absolutely vested in the PRESIDENT and Senate; still, that when Legislative acts were necessary to carry a Treaty into effect, the Legislature were not without discretion in the passing of them; if the Legislature had a hand in making Treaties, there could be no question of the propriety of calling for papers; he should, then, in the first place, examine the propriety of calling for papers, taking for granted that the Legislature had no hand in making Treaties.

If they were to consider the power by which a Treaty was made, there would be found two nations concerned, whose consent would be also necessary to repeal it. But were there no other ways of cancelling a Treaty? There were certainly ways of breaking a Treaty. There were circumstances in which the breaking of a Treaty would be justifiable. For instance, if, before a Treaty was carried into effect, there was such a change of circumstances as to make it necessary to declare war; could they not discuss the subject, whether it were more advisable to carry into effect the Treaty, and keep at peace, or break it and declare war? If a question of this kind came up, there could be no impropriety in looking into it; not with an idea of having any concern in making the Treaty, but because such alterations had taken place in the state of affairs, as to make it necessary to discuss the propriety of going to war.

There was another point of view in which that House had a check on Treaties. Granting that a Treaty is completely made, the subject of appropriation must come before them. Gentlemen had been understood to say, that no discretion could be exercised in appropriating the necessary money for carrying a Treaty into effect. But he was of a different opinion; he believed, that though they had nothing to do with the making of Treaties, yet when they were called upon to appropriate, they must exercise their discretion. It was true, that in general when Treaties were made, it would be the duty of that House to carry them into effect, in the same way as they found it their duty to carry into effect existing laws; but he said, there were justifiable grounds of refusing to appropriate money to carry into effect both laws and Treaties.

Mr C. referred to the case of appropriations for the army. Suppose, said he, an army was raised for four years; at the end of two years a fresh appropriation is requisite to support it; but the Legislature has a discretion in doing this, or where was the use of the Constitutional regulation of confining appropriations to two years? He considered, that there was some analogy between such cases of appropriation, and those requisite for Treaties. When a Treaty is made, the nation is bound by it, and its organ has an obligation upon it to carry it into effect. It might, in general, be said that there was an absolute obligation; but still there were particular cases in which that obligation did not hold. It appeared to him that a Treaty might possibly be of so ruinous a nature, as to justify the refusing to carry it into effect. Nay, he would say, that if half the lies and calumnies which had been spread throughout the Union with respect to the late Treaty with Great Britain were true; if the negotiator had been bribed; if he had given up the rights of his country; if their liberty and independence had been sacrificed; if the PRESIDENT and Senate had been bribed by British gold; if he had any idea of that kind, he would not agree to carry the Treaty into effect; nor should he conceive the national faith bound by such an instrument; no matter what grounds were taken to justify the refusal, whether Constitutional or Revolutionary.

If these principles were just, he said, it would be allowed that the House had a discretionary power with respect to appropriating to carry a Treaty into effect, though it had nothing to do with making it. No cause, he said, had been shown for calling for papers. Why, then call for them? Gentlemen talked about impeachment. They might impeach without papers. But, did they want to bring forward an impeachment? No such thing; it was only to cover the real drift of the motion that this was mentioned.

Did any gentleman think there was sufficient evil in the late Treaty with Great Britain to authorize them in refusing to carry it into effect? It appeared to him, that that House had a right to call for any papers which might throw light on their deliberations. But they must also consider, that there was a discretion to be used by the Executive in giving up papers in his hands. When there are papers in his hands which that House had real occasion for, it was important that they should be brought forward; but, he said, as long as a proper confidence subsisted between the two branches of the Government, if that House asked for papers which the PRESIDENT thought it improper to send them, he would decline doing it. But it is not contended, that the papers which are the object of the present resolution will be of any real use to the House. The gentleman who brought forward the motion had read them through, and the most that he said on the subject was, that the negotiator had not complied with some of the first instructions which were given to him. Another ground of calling for the papers, which was to him a pleasing ground, was that of publicity; for he fully agreed with the gentleman from Georgia, that the more public Governmental proceedings could with propriety be made, the better; but that House had not the right to direct the PRESIDENT on that head, they ought rather to leave it to him to publish the papers, or not, as he pleased; for, if they considered the PRESIDENT as attentive at all times to the duties of his office, it would be arrogance in that House to attempt to influence him in that particular.

But the main point in dispute was the force and effect of the Treaty-making power. What were the powers and privileges of the House on the subject? In pursuing this inquiry, he was pleased with the remark of the gentleman from Georgia,

Treaty with Great Britain.

that in examining into the meaning of the words and phrases, they must take the meaning that was generally given to them, and if they could find out the true import of the phrase make Treaties, it would remove all doubts on the subject. He hoped, for this purpose, that gentleman would have examined the proceedings of his own country; but, instead of doing this, they find him referring to the practices of Great Britain.

The PRESIDENT and Senate, Mr. C. observed, were expressly authorized to make Treaties. To what should they compare Treaties? Might they not say, that they were betwixt nations what bargains were betwixt individuals? And, after he had employed an agent to make a contract, with full discretion, and he had in pursuance of his authority made it, was it not binding? Though in public as well as in private contracts he acknowledged there might be circumstances which would justify a non-compliance with the terms of the bargain; yet, in case all the circumstances had been fair, the contract must be complied with.

It appeared to him not unimportant to consider, whether, when Treaties were made, they were not the laws of the land. A power to make carried, in his mind, a power to complete. But if this were doubtful, where should they look for information? He expected the gentleman from Georgia—knowing him to be well acquainted with the proceedings of Government for a long time—would have referred them to the old Confederation. It would certainly have been more natural to have referred them to the old Congress than to the Parliament of Great Britain. If they looked into the powers of the old Congress, they would find that they had the Power to enter into Treaties and Alliances, which he apprehended to be the same power as that placed in the PRESIDENT and Senate in the present Government; and it was natural to conclude that a Treaty made by the present power was equally binding with those made under the old Government; for it will be recollected that the general power was delegated to the General Government; and if they had the same powers, he could not see that there should be any difference in the exercise of them. If it had been intended otherwise, the Convention, at the forming of the Constitution, would have added a proviso that no Treaty should be made by the PRESIDENT and Senate which included commercial regulations.

It appeared to him that a subject of such recent date as their Constitution could not receive much elucidation from the opinions held concerning it in the Conventions, at or about the time of passing it. He confessed he found little aid to assist his mind to form a judgment on the matter from any other source than the Constitution itself; indeed, he thought the light was there so clear that nothing more was wanted. There were four members, he said, in that House, who were members of the Convention who formed the Constitution. The sentiments of two of those gentlemen he was not acquainted with; but two of them had spoken on this subject. If those gentlemen had come forward and declared that such a power as the Treaty power was contended to be was not intended to be placed in the hands of the PRESIDENT and Senate, but that the House was meant to have certain powers with respect to Treaties, he would not say but that such a declaration would have shook his faith on the subject; for, though he should still have been guided by the instrument itself, yet authority so respectable would have had its weight on his mind. But what did the gentlemen who have delivered their sentiments say? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BALDWIN] mentioned the necessity of inquiring into the true meaning of the phrase, "make Treaties;" and, instead of telling them what had been the practice in the old Government, he went over the water to Great Britain. What did they get from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON?]? He produced five sets of doubts and one problem upon the construction of the Constitution. This had the same effect on his mind as if they had declared that the meaning of the Constitution was well understood, in the Convention which formed it, to vest the Treaty-making power completely in the PRESIDENT and Senate. It was certainly matter of great importance where the different powers of Government were placed, and caused considerable debate in the Convention. Some thought the Treaty-making power should be placed in the Legislature, but that was greatly objected to; it was urged by others that the powers should be in the PRESIDENT and a majority of the Senate; it was again proposed that two-thirds of the whole number of the Senators should consent to a Treaty—but finally passed as it is found in the Constitution. He was far from accusing those gentlemen with impropriety of conduct on the occasion. If they think it would be better for the interests of the people that that House should have a share in the making of certain Treaties, and believe the Constitution will bear that construction, it was not for him to impeach the purity of their motives or propriety of their conduct; but it would require strong arguments to convince his mind that the Constitution placed any such power in that House, contrary to the unanimous understanding of the members of the Convention who formed it.

The arguments which had been urged for placing certain powers in that House with respect to Treaties were drawn from the practice of Great Britain, and from the danger of the Treaty-power being vested wholly in the PRESIDENT and Senate. He did not think that the Government of Great Britain had been introduced for any other purpose than illustration, though other use had been made of it out of doors. With respect to the principles of that Government, let them inquire into its sovereign power; for it was a just position that Treaties must be made by the sovereign power of a nation. Where should they find that power in Great Britain? The King and Parliament were allowed to be omnipotent: Parliament have altered the continuation of their existence from three to seven years. Where must they look in the United States for the sovereign power? They must go to the people at large; for in them it lay alone. Their Constitution limited the powers of every branch of Government, and it was therefore improper to apply foreign ideas to their Constitution. But if a Treaty were made by the agents of a sovereign power, authorized for the purpose, the end was answered: in the United States, the sovereign power can act only by its agents.

The Legislature of Great Britain, he said, it was true, consisted of three branches, and that was almost the only feature in that Government resembling that of the United States. In Great Britain, their Executive is an hereditary Monarch, whereas the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES is elected every four years. Their House of Lords consisted of bishops and an hereditary nobility—the bishops appointed by the Crown, and the nobility were increased at the King's pleasure; whilst the Senate of the United States is elected every six years. Gentlemen say that Senators are not elected by the people, but they are chosen by the Legislatures of the different States, who are elected by the people. The House of Commons in Britain, which is the only representation of the people their Government contains, is elected by a very small part of the people; and the Crown has such an influence in it as to be able to carry most questions at its pleasure. How could it then bear a comparison with that House, who were chosen by the whole people every two years? The absurdity might be admitted, in that Government, that the King had the power to make Treaties, and that the sanction of the Legislature was still necessary to give them legal validity, because the influence of the Crown was so great in both Houses as to carry any measure it pleased through them. But it would not do in this country. The comparison, therefore, betwixt the two Governments fails, and no arguments can be drawn from it.

The other argument respecting the danger of the power being placed solely in the Executive arose from the comparison with Great Britain. If the powers of the PRESIDENT and Senate of this country could with any tolerable degree of justice, be compared to those of the King and House of Lords in Great Britain, as little taste as he had for revolutions, he would not say but he should be induced to join gentlemen, either by fraud or force, to overturn the Constitution. He looked on the representation in the Senate to be as complete as in that House. Gentlemen were very fond of calling that House the popular branch of Government. He agreed that a criticism on words was in general trifling. That gentlemen from Virginia might assert this, he allowed, as they had nineteen members out of the hundred and five in that House, and in the Senate only a fifteenth part of the body; but gentlemen did not mean, when they spoke on that subject, to have reference to particular States, but to the whole. The Senators and Representatives were regularly apportioned for the whole Union; and, though on different principles, were as completely represented in the one House as in the other.

Mr. C. concluded with saying, that he had no doubt the powers vested by the Constitution were well vested; and if the Constitution was fairly considered, little doubt could remain on the subject. But if the House passed the resolution now before the Committee, he should not consider the question as decided; but if the construction was still insisted upon, he was happy the Constitution was not wholly in their hands—that there were joined with them in the guardianship of it, the PRESIDENT, the Senate, and the people of the United States.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, it was with diffidence he rose to speak on a subject which had been so copiously and ably handled by gentlemen who had preceded him. It had been his intention to have given a silent vote on the resolution on the table, but the turn which the debates had taken—involving an important Constitutional question, relative to the powers vested in the different branches of Government—seemed to create a necessity of expressing his sentiments, lest by his vote he might seem to subscribe to certain doctrines in the latitude in which they had been laid down. And as he should differ in some respects from most of the gentlemen that had spoken, he asked the indulgence of the Committee whilst he made a few remarks on a subject which he conceived to be of vast importance, as a wrong decision might give a direction to their Government which might be of serious consequence.

On the one hand, he did not think that Treaties could not, under any circumstances, be the subject of Legislative consideration or discussion, and that they were not to look into them. It appeared to him, that they not only had the right, but that it was their indispensable duty to look into every Treaty, when called upon to aid it in its operation; to see whether it had the Constitutional forms; whether it related to objects within the province of the Treaty-making power, a power which is not unlimited. The objects upon which it can operate are understood and well-defined, and if the Treaty-making power were to embrace other objects, their doings would have no more binding force than if the Legislature were to assume and exercise judicial powers under the name of legislation. It might be proper, also, to examine the merits of a Treaty, so far as to see whether it be of such a ruinous nature as, according to the law of nations, it would be null,* and whether they would be justified in withholding Legislative provision to carry it into effect. He also considered Treaties as subject to Legislative control, so that their operation, so far as related to the people of the United States, might be suspended or annulled whenever, in the opinion of the Legislature, there was sufficient cause. And further, that the clause in the Constitution which provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but "in consequence of appropriations made by law," as vesting in the different branches of Government a check adequate to every purpose of security.

On the other hand he did not consider the House

* "Though the simple injury or some disadvantage in a Treaty is not sufficient to render it invalid, the case is not the same with those inconveniences that lead to the ruin of the State. Since every Treaty ought to be made with a sufficient power, a Treaty pernicious to the State is null, and not at all obligatory; no conductor of the nation having the power to enter into engagements to do such things as are capable of destroying the State, for the safety of which the empire is intrusted to him."—VAT. 180.

Treaty with Great Britain.

of Representatives as having a Constitutional right to interfere in making Treaties, or that a Treaty needed any concurrence of that House, or Legislative sanction, to make it the law of the land. He had always supposed that Treaties were exactly on the footing of laws in their operation on antecedent laws, suspending and repealing such as were repugnant. Treaties may sometimes require Legislative aid to carry them into effect; so may laws, and they were constantly in the habit of making laws to carry into effect laws heretofore made.

There was a great difference between giving that House a right to participate in making Treaties, and admitting them to have the same discretionary control (whatever that may be) which they have over laws; to be admitted to the exercise of such a discretion might be expected, but making Treaties is the highest exercise of sovereignty. Every one must reflect how very tenacious the States have been of their sovereignty ever since the Declaration of Independence, and have opposed every idea of consolidation, considering themselves in that respect as being upon a footing of perfect equality, being all equally sovereign, whatever might be their territorial limits. This principle is fully recognised in Vattel, who says: "A dwarf is as much a man as a giant; a small Republic is as much a sovereign State as the most powerful Kingdom." Upon this principle was the old Confederation formed; and can it be fairly presumed, then, that under this view of the subject, the States would ever have consented so to form this Constitution, as to admit that the power of making Treaties, this highest act of sovereignty, should have been lodged or submitted to the control of a body, where four States should control the sovereignty of the fifteen, and one State that of seven? This would be consolidation in good earnest.

It was of high importance to the commercial States, that the Treaty-making power should be lodged where there could be a prompt and energetic exercise of it. The United States have no maritime force to protect their trade; the principal security these States have for the immense property they have continually floating on the water, must arise from the exercise of this power, in forming compacts for commercial purposes, or alliances for mutual defence. In this way, said he, we may combine the power of other nations with our own, for mutual security and advantage; and during the sufferings which our commerce has experienced, we have found the merchants looking to the exercise of this power, as almost their only resource and hope.

After these preliminary observations, Mr. H. proceeded to inquire, not what ought to be, but what was the Constitution of the United States? We were not, he said, in Convention, but in the discharge of Legislative functions under the Constitution; and to understand the extent of the powers intended to be granted in the second article, section two; by these words, "the PRESIDENT shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," we must advert to the general definition of the Treaty-making power—what objects it may embrace, and how far it can interfere with Legislative power. A Treaty is a compact entered into by two independent nations, for mutual advantage or defence. Nothing can, therefore, come within the Treaty-making power but what has a relation to both nations, and in which they have a mutual interest. The object of this power is to secure to our citizens advantages in foreign countries which are without or beyond our Legislative jurisdiction, to enable the Treaty-making power to obtain which, it must necessarily be authorized to give some consideration or equivalent therefor. If the United States authorize an agent to make a bargain or purchase, the power of binding the United States for a reasonable consideration is necessarily given. Whenever the Treaty-making power departs from these rules, it is without its jurisdiction, and such a Treaty would be of no validity. Under this view of the subject, if we look into our code of laws, we shall find few of them that can be affected, to any great degree, by the Treaty-making power. All laws regulating our own internal police, so far as the citizens of the United States alone are concerned, are wholly beyond its reach; no foreign nation having any interest or concern in that business, every attempt to interfere would be a mere nullity, as much as if two individuals were to enter into a contract to regulate the conduct or actions of a third person, who was no party to such contract. He could, he said, illustrate his idea more readily by adverting to a law, mentioned as being affected by the present Treaty, which was the revenue law; which provides that certain duties shall be paid on goods imported into the United States, and on goods coming in foreign bottoms ten per cent. advance on the amount of such duties. This is a law no Treaty can repeal, admitting the repealing power in its fullest latitude, because no foreign nation can have any interest or concern in the duties payable by our own citizens into our own Treasury. All that a Treaty could do, would be to suspend or arrest its operation, so far as the citizens or subjects of the nations with whom we treated, were or might be affected by it. The only operation which the British Treaty has upon that law is, that in consideration of our being freely admitted to the fur trade and the trade into Canada, which opens to the enterprise of our citizens a vast source of wealth and advantage, we only give in return to the subjects of the King of Great Britain the privilege of bringing, by land or inland navigation, into the United States, goods for which they pay no more duties than our citizens pay on goods imported in American bottoms. British subjects have always been permitted to reside and trade in the United States, and peltry is to be duty free in the territories of each. According to this definition of the Treaty-making power, and as far as he could judge, he said, it was correct, it cannot have that unlimited extension which has been ascribed to it. It cannot be that monster which has been described as about to swallow up all the Legislative powers of Congress; nor can there be any danger of the PRESIDENT and Senate having it in their power, by forming Treaties with an Indian tribe or a foreign nation, to legislate over the United States. The Treaty-making power cannot affect the Legislative power of Congress but in a very small and limited degree. Because a Treaty or an Executive act may, in some instances, arrest the operation or progress of a law, it is no argument against the existence of the power. In article first, section eighth, of the Constitution, a specific power is granted to Congress to provide for the punishment of the counterfeiters of the securities or coins of the United States. In another article, the PRESIDENT is authorized, generally, to grant reprieves or pardons for offences against the United States, excepting in cases of impeachment. Can any one seriously contend that the PRESIDENT has not the power of granting a pardon to a counterfeiter of securities or coins, because it would suspend and defeat the operation of a law, on a subject specially delegated to Congress? If this doctrine be true, that all Legislative power may be exercised by the Treaty-making power, Congress, under the old Confederation, had unlimited Legislative power over the States. The old Confederation vested in Congress an unlimited power to make Treaties, excepting only that the States were to be at liberty to impose like duties on foreigners as on their own people, and that the exportation, or importation of goods was not to be prohibited. Was it ever imagined that, by this general power, Congress had a right, by forming a Treaty with a foreign Power, to legislate over the States to any extent? Suppose Congress, instead of taking so much pains to persuade the States to consent to their laying the five per cent. impost, and in obtaining which they were finally defeated by the refusal of one State, after every possible exertion, had undertaken to have done it by Treaty? Would not the measures have been reprobated with one voice, and the Treaty considered as a nullity?

The next object of his inquiry was, what was the extent of the Treaty-making power granted by the Confederation to Congress? Under what limitations, and where, was the Legislative power to regulate trade and commerce? It had been shown, he said, that the Treaty-making power had been granted to Congress in the most general terms, with only the limitation mentioned: but the most unlimited Legislative power to regulate commerce rested with the States, with one exception only, which was, that no impost or duties should be laid that should interfere with any stipulations entered into in pursuance of any Treaty then proposed to France or Spain. Each State did also, by the second article, "reserve its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." There was no mention made in the Confederation that Congress should have a right to make Treaties repealing laws, yet it was considered as necessarily granted by the general grant of the Treaty-making power. Under this power, Congress did make Treaties of every description, which received no other ratification or sanction than that of Congress; which Treaties were declared by Congress, considered by the States, and admitted by the ablest lawyers and adjudications of the highest courts of law in every part of the Union, as the law of the land, and as having operated as a repeal of all laws that were in opposition thereto. To evince this, he read two extracts from an Address of Congress to the several States, containing a resolution expressive of their opinion, passed April 13, 1787:

"When, therefore, a Treaty is constitutionally made, ratified, and published by us, it immediately becomes binding on the whole nation, and superadded to the laws of the land, without the intervention of State Legislatures. Treaties derive their obligation from being compacts between the sovereigns of this and of another nation; whereas laws or statutes derive their force from being the acts of a Legislature competent to the passing of them."

"Resolved, That the Legislatures of the several States cannot of right pass any act or acts for interpreting, explaining, or construing a National Treaty, or any part or clause of it; nor for restraining, limiting, or in any manner impeding, retarding, or counteracting the operation and execution of the same: for that, on being constitutionally made, ratified, and published, they become, in virtue of the Confederation, part of the law of the land, and are not only independent of the will and power of such Legislature, but also binding and obligatory on them."

Notwithstanding, he said, the Courts construed the Treaty as having repealed all laws repugnant to it, and had so decided in all cases that came before them, yet to remove the smallest ground of complaint, (for there had arisen dissatisfaction on account of the non-execution of the Treaty of 1783 with Great Britain,) Congress, in that Address, recommended the passing a general repealing law, which, though it could be of no use here, might give perfect satisfaction to Great Britain, that every obstruction was removed. Secondly, he read from the letter written by Mr. JEFFERSON, when Secretary of State, a letter which did honor both to the author and to the United States, the following passages, viz:

"For indeed all this (speaking of repealing laws opposed to the Treaty) was supererogation. It resulted from the instrument of Confederation among the States, that Treaties made by Congress according to the Confederation, were superior to the laws of the States. The circular letter of Congress had declared and demonstrated it, and the several States, by their acts and explanations before mentioned, had shown it to be their own sense, as we may safely affirm it to have been the general sense of those at least who were of the profession of the law. Besides, the proof of this, drawn from the act of Confederation itself, the declaration of Congress, and the acts of the States before mentioned, the same principle will be found acknowledged in several of the documents hereto annexed for other purposes."

Speaking of a letter from the Governor of Rhode Island, relative to the operation of the Treaty, Mr. JEFFERSON says:

Treaty with Great Britain.

[H. OF R.]

"Plainly implying that the absolute parts did not depend upon Legislative discretion."

"Mr. Canning, the Attorney for the United States (Rhode Island.) This act was considered by our Courts as annulled by the Treaty of Peace."

"Governor of Connecticut. The Courts adopted it as a principle of law."

"Mr. Lewis, Attorney for the United States (Pennsylvania.) The Judges have uniformly and without hesitation declared in favor of the Treaty, on the ground of its being the supreme law of the land."

"Virginia. Mr. Monroe, one of the Senators in Congress, and a lawyer of eminence, tells us, that both Court and Council there, avowed the opinion, that the Treaty would control any law of the State opposed to it."

"In New York, Mr. Harrison, Attorney for the United States, assures us, that the act of 1782, of the State, relative to debts due to persons within the enemy's lines, was immediately after the Treaty restrained by the Superior Courts of the State, from operating on British creditors, and that he did not know a single instance to the contrary. A full proof that they considered the Treaty as a law of the land, paramount to the law of the State."

"The case of Rutgers vs. Waddington. Waddington pleaded the Treaty, and the Court declared the Treaty a justification, in opposition to the law of the State."

"The case of John Smith Hatfield, New Jersey. Mr. Boudinot. His friends, confident in the opinion of their counsel, and the integrity of the Judges, have determined to plead the Treaty, and not give themselves the trouble of asking a release from the Legislature."

"In Georgia, in a case wherein the plaintiffs were Brailsford and others, British subjects, whose debts had been sequestered (not confiscated) by an act of the State during the war, the judges declared the Treaty of Peace a repeal of the act of the State."

And that this was a well-founded and correct opinion, Mr. H. said, had since been confirmed by an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. It may be said, that these were State laws that were repealed. This makes no difference as to the principle; whether there be the check of thirteen independent Legislatures to pass the laws or three branches of one Legislature; it only creates a greater difficulty in getting the law through, but does not add to or diminish the Supreme Legislative power, which must be admitted to have been possessed by the States, in as full and ample a manner as it can now be by Congress, and when similar laws were passed by the Legislatures of the several States on any subject, they had as great an operation, and as binding a force, as any law that possibly can be made or passed by Congress.

Mr. H. further said, that in May, 1787, the Convention, composed of the best informed and most respectable of our citizens, and who were the framers of our present Constitution, met for that purpose, and being perfectly acquainted with all the above recited facts, opinions and judgments of Courts, and there being seven of their number who were members of and present in the old Congress, when the Address and resolution just now mentioned was promulgated, which was done only one month previous to the meeting of this Convention, and having before them all the Treaties which had been made under the old Congress, they proceeded to draw up this Constitution.

In the first place, in Art. I., organizing a Legislative body, and delegating to them, not all, but a part only of the Legislative power of the States, in these words: "All Legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress;" and among the specified powers, the right of regulating commerce with foreign nations. How were they to regulate commerce? Not by the exercise of the Treaty-making power. This article of the Constitution has not the least relation to that kind of power; it was Legislative power only that was meant; it vested Congress with the whole power, as far as the object could be accomplished by a Legislative act; but this power would embrace but a small part of the objects which come within the term of regulating commerce with foreign nations; it could extend no further than the bounds of our own jurisdiction. There is not a single expression that looks like authorizing them to act in any other than their Legislative character.

The Constitution then proceeds, in the second Article, to the establishment of an Executive power, to be vested in a President, and in the second section, says: "the PRESIDENT shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." The most general terms are used, and such as under the old Confederation had been understood to embrace every kind of Treaty, Commercial as well as others, and had been exercised in the most ample and unlimited manner, and the Treaties thus formed had been declared and adjudged to have the force and operation of a law, and that they repealed all laws that were opposed to them; and these Treaties were then in full force and operation, and were the supreme law of the land. It cannot be presumed that the framers of our Constitution were ignorant of the laws of the land, or that they had not well attended to and examined Treaties, which, by the Constitution, they were again about to declare to be the supreme law of the land under the new Government. Now, if it really was intended that the Treaty-making power should not be as broad, and have the same extension and operation as had been exercised under the old Confederation, or that there was to be a distinction between Commercial Treaties and others, or that Treaties generally should not so operate as to repeal pre-existing laws, or that the concurrence of the House of Representatives, or sanction of Congress, should, under any circumstances, be necessary to give validity or force to a Treaty, how can we account for the total silence of the Constitution on this subject, and that there should not be a single sentence in the whole instrument that even looks that way? If any limitation was intended, the Convention certainly knew that it was necessary it should be inserted. When we examine the Constitution, and see with what accuracy and care it is drawn up, how wonderfully every part of it is guarded, that there is not a single word but appears to have been carefully examined, and when we call to mind the members of that Convention, and find them to have been the ablest and most accurate men of our country, we cannot presume that we should have been left to the sad alternative, for the purpose of explaining so important an article of our Constitution, which might have been so easily made definite, to be obliged to resort to the British House of Commons for precedents, and those too which were derived from the most turbulent periods of the Government of that nation; when, it is a possible case, that the change of a Ministry, or the rage of party, might have been more immediately the object of pursuit than the true interests of the nation; more especially as the practice of our own Government, and the legal opinion of our own country, were directly opposed to such a construction. But if all this might be supposed not to have had sufficient weight to have induced the Convention to have introduced such a limitation, or some intimation that such limitation was intended, they must have supposed it necessary when they handed out with the Constitution, which were declared by the ratification thereof to be the supreme law of the land, Treaties of every description, Commercial as well as others. To me, the language of this transaction is, we have, by one article of this Constitution, granted the Treaty-making power, in general terms, to the President and Senate, and here are samples of the Treaties we mean to authorize them to make. This was also, as far as he could learn, the understanding of the State Conventions and people generally, and appears clearly to have been the understanding of the Convention of Virginia. He would not resort to the debates of the Convention, or the observations or opinions of individuals. That would not be an infallible criterion to decide what was the opinion of the people; but he would advert to the amendments of the Constitution, which were sanctioned by the Convention which adopted this Constitution, and proposed those amendments thereto, which were sent on to Congress with the Constitution, and entered at large on the records or Journals of Congress. These amendments must have been the expression of the opinion and will of the people, otherwise the Constitution cannot be considered as an expression of their will. In those amendments are these remarkable clauses, viz:

"That no commercial Treaty shall be ratified without the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole number of the Senate; and no Treaty, ceding, contracting, restraining, or suspending the territorial rights or claims of the United States, or any of them, or their, or any of their rights or claims to fishing in the American seas, or navigating the American rivers, shall be made, but in cases of the most urgent and extreme necessity, nor any such Treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively."

"And the Convention do, in the name and behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress to exert all their influence, and use all reasonable and legal methods to obtain a ratification of the foregoing alterations and provisions, in the manner provided in the fifth article of the said Constitution; and in all Congressional laws to be passed in the mean time, to conform to the spirit of those amendments as far as the said Constitution will admit."

Here is the voice, not of a few individuals, but of the people of Virginia, expressed, not on a sudden or trivial occasion, but when they were called for the express purpose of deliberating and deciding on an instrument the most important ever offered to the consideration of a nation; an instrument which was to bind thirteen independent sovereignties into a confederated Empire. Here are the standing instructions of the people of Virginia to their Representatives in Congress. These instructions have never been revoked or annulled, and speak in a voice too loud not to be heard by the gentleman [Mr. GILES] if he really feels that reverence, nay adoration, for the voice of the people, as he declares; he now has an opportunity of manifesting to the world, that he did not use those strong expressions as mere words of sound, without meaning, as the words, the "voice of the people," and "love of country," are too often used, by conforming to those instructions, and aiding a provision for carrying into effect a Treaty which has been made under the constituted authorities of the country, and has been ratified with the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate, and has become of binding force even according to the true spirit of those amendments. The late Legislature of Virginia had acted a more consistent part, and though he did not approve of the object of their resolutions, yet he thought that in admitting the construction of the Constitution to be according to its obvious meaning, and to the understanding of the people, expressed by their Convention at the time of its adoption, and not attempting to rob it of what, in his opinion, is one of its brightest gems, by explaining away an express and important part of it by construction, though to obtain objects which they appeared to be seeking with great anxiety, but resorting to an amendment of the Constitution, that assembly had done honor to themselves and the State. This practice of doing away the Constitution by construction, if once admitted, would lead to the most dangerous consequences.

Upon the construction contended for by some gentlemen, it would have been improper to have used the word make; unless the Treaty was to be completed by the President and Senate, it undoubtedly would have said, the President and Senate shall have power to negotiate Treaties, which, when sanctioned, according to the forms prescribed by the Constitution, &c. That this House can, by their own act, sanction a Treaty seems to be pretty much given up. The Constitution no where authorizes them to manifest their Legislative will, but by an act or resolution concurred in by the Senate, and sent to the President for approbation. If any sanction of the Legislature was intended, two-thirds of the Senate would not have been made necessary in the first instance.

Great stress has been laid on the words, under the authority of the United States, and in the sixth Article, which declares, "That the Constitution, and laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States," as importing something more than what could be done by the PRESIDENT and Senate, and as pointing to the Legislative powers of Congress; a little attention to the subject will show, that those words are not used in that place for the purpose of limitation, but as descriptive of the kind of Treaties intended. Under the Confederation the States had reserved a right, with the consent of Congress, to make Treaties; it would not have done, therefore, to have used the word Treaties only, for that might have included other Treaties than those made by the United States. The word Congress would not answer; for that would have excluded Treaties made under this Government; it would not have done to have used the words President and Senate; that would have excluded Treaties made by the old Congress. The words, under the authority of the United States, are the only words that would give a definite and concise description of the Treaties intended. It will be well to inquire where is the authority of the United States? Not in Congress, but in the people. He was happy that he was born in a country where there was no supreme power, but what rested in the people, who have manifested their will by this Constitution, which they have made and promulgated as a rule to guide all the administrators of the Government. This Constitution, which was intended, and he hoped would prove, the permanent foundation of a free and happy Government, delegates certain powers to each branch, and each is independent of the other, excepting as far as the nature of the case, or the Constitution authorizes or gives a control or check. What part of the Constitution authorizes Congress to claim the right of being considered as the authority of the United States? In the first Article, they are vested with certain Legislative power, but their power is limited, and even Congress, in the discharge of its Legislative functions, acts under the authority of the United States. In the second Article, the PRESIDENT, with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint Judges of the Supreme Court. Under what authority do they act? The PRESIDENT is made Commander-in-Chief of the Army. Does he not act under the authority of the United States, independent of Congress? Could not a pardon be plead in a Court of the United States, as being given under the authority of the United States? in short, every act done under the Constitution, is done under the authority of the United States.

Making laws and making Treaties are very different and distinct in their nature, one being a declaration of the will of the nation by a Legislative act, and the other being a compact entered into by two independent nations. Both are very
